Defense lawyers said that Mr. Pellicano routinely taped his own phone calls, and that he frequently played previously recorded conversations for his clients over the phone, rather than in person. Thus, they say, the recording of Lisa and Tom Gores could actually have been a second-generation recording, rather than an original wiretap.

"Pellicano's position has been, all along, there are no wiretaps," Mr. Gruel said.

With a trial set for Oct. 24 and the federal investigation far from complete, both the strengths and the weaknesses of the government's case were on full display Monday.

Beyond whether the Gores recording is an original wiretapped recording, for example, there is the question of how strong a witness Alec Gores will be, given his own admissions that he knew of Mr. Pellicano's illegal activity. In his F.B.I. interview, Alec Gores said he paid Mr. Pellicano at least $50,000, lent him at least $50,000 more that was never repaid, and paid for a Hawaii vacation for Mr. Pellicano's whole family as a bonus for his work. He said Mr. Pellicano had worked for him for five to six months. And he said that "on at least two occasions, and possibly a third, Pellicano played Gores recordings of Lisa and Tom Gores talking on the telephone."

DOJ_NMG_0033414

Mr. Miller, Alec Gores's lawyer, insisted that his client "has done absolutely nothing wrong." Asked about the summaries of Mr. Gores's statements to the F.B.I., Mr. Miller said he wished he could "comment to correct and/or clarify some of the information" contained in them, but "since my client is a witness, I cannot do so."

Even without a single undisputed wiretap to play for a jury, Mr. Saunders and Mr. Lally argued in court that they had plenty of ammunition with which to convict Mr. Pellicano and his co-defendants. They said they had "dozens of witnesses" who listened to wiretaps or even helped implement them, and "hundreds of calls" in which Mr. Pellicano played previously wiretapped conversations. In many of those recordings, the prosecutors said, Mr. Pellicano boasted to clients of what he had heard on his wiretaps — often reporting that he had eavesdropped on their legal adversaries discussing their litigation strategy.

Defense lawyers on Monday made much of the government's failure thus far to break the password protection on many of Mr. Pellicano's audio files. Prosecutors said they could at least provide a breakdown of the call times, participants and subject matter, because Mr. Pellicano incorporated that information into his computer file names.

But defense lawyers complained to Judge Dale S. Fischer of United States District Court that Mr. Pellicano's still-encrypted files could contain vital exculpatory evidence. "We're just wandering in the fog right now, without much clarity," said Terree A. Bowers, who is defending Terry N. Christensen, the lead partner in a Century City law firm, who is charged with wiretapping and conspiracy.

Mr. Saunders retorted that "passwords don't change the content" of Mr. Pellicano's digital recordings. "They don't make Terry Christensen say, 'Oh, please wiretap her, when he said, 'No, please don't wiretap her,' " he said.

Mr. Bowers pleaded with the court to order the government to provide a breakdown of all the recordings prosecutors had not turned over, detailing what they contain and the government's reason for withholding them from the defense. Judge Fischer agreed, ordering that an outside referee be appointed to review the government's evidence and decide whether it should be turned over to the defense.

Mr. Bowers scolded the prosecutors, saying they had moved ahead with indictments while still unprepared for trial.

"We need to know what they're withholding and why they're withholding it," Mr. Bowers said of the government. "We urged the government not to go into this prematurely. Here we are still waiting for the tapes to be decoded."

Mr. Saunders, in response, said that if defense lawyers were so eager to crack the code, they could simply consult Mr. Pellicano, who sat opposite the government's table, in chains and a green jailhouse jacket. "The man with the passwords, your honor, is sitting right there across the courtroom," Mr. Saunders said.

Many Of Pellicano's Recordings Still Secret (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

Hundreds of the private eye's tapes have not been decoded, U.S. lawyers say. Defense says feds are withholding evidence.

Federal prosecutors said Monday that they were still trying to unravel more than 275 encrypted recordings made by Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano.

Although the exact nature of the contents of the tapes will only be known if government cryptographers successfully break the powerful encryption software that Pellicano used to scramble the conversations, they could provide new evidence in the case against Pellicano and his six co-defendants or other Pellicano clients and associates not yet indicted.

Prosecutors disclosed the existence of the still-encrypted recordings at the outset of an acrimonious hearing before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer as they clashed with defense attorneys who alleged the government was intentionally withholding evidence that might exonerate their clients.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Kevin Lally told the crowded courtroom that authorities recovered about 1,300 audio files from Pellicano's offices and have turned over 367 of them to defense lawyers. As many as 400 other Pellicano recordings are considered privileged communications, primarily between Pellicano and his attorneys, and are not part of the case. About 250 recordings relate to the government's ongoing probe but are not relevant to any of the named defendants, Lally said.

That leaves just over 275 recordings that have yet to be decoded. Commercially available encryption software enables computer users to protect digital information using mathematical formulas, or algorithms, that require powerful computers to break.

In addition to the recordings that have been turned over to defense attorneys, Lally said the government has to date turned over 100,000 additional pages of documents in the case.

Lally's statement triggered a sharp reaction from defense attorneys, who suggested that authorities are purposely dragging their feet. "It is clear we have a major problem," said attorney Chad Hummel, who represents Mark Arneson, a former Los Angeles Police Department sergeant accused of participating in Pellicano's alleged conspiracy to wiretap and intimidate others on behalf of the private eye's clients.

"I have great concerns at this point," added Terree Bowers, who represents another defendant, prominent entertainment attorney Terry Christensen.

"We are still waiting, astonishingly, for discovery of a great number of tapes…. I don't see how we are in that position this late in the game," Bowers added, referring to the scheduled October start of the trial. "We need to know what they are withholding and why they are withholding it."

Lally and co-prosecutor Daniel Saunders disagreed with the contention that they had purposely withheld evidence from defense attorneys. To the contrary, Saunders told the judge, authorities have turned over huge volumes of evidence and have been stymied in producing more tape-recordings because of the complexity of Pellicano's encryption methods.

If defense attorneys "are so desperate to get those files … ," Saunders said, glancing at Pellicano, "the man with the password is sitting right there."

The private eye, who grinned often during the courtroom discussion about evidence in the case, has been in federal custody for three years — first for pleading guilty to possession of illegal explosives and, since February, on the current charges that he directed a racketeering enterprise that included wiretapping, witness tampering and other crimes.

During his time behind bars, federal authorities have been poring over tens of thousands of documents taken from his Sunset Boulevard offices, as well as the 1,300 recordings seized by FBI agents.

At Monday's court hearing, prosecutor Saunders alleged the recordings include "at least one" illegally intercepted conversation as well as "hundreds of calls" in which Pellicano allegedly spoke to clients about wiretaps. Saunders also said there was evidence from dozens of witnesses alleging that Pellicano had engaged in wiretapping.

Saunders did not provide details on the techniques used by the FBI to decode the encrypted recordings but acknowledged that the methods were not ones that the government would want to share in open court.

Other law enforcement sources have said for months that the FBI brought in encryption experts from other federal agencies to help crack the codes allegedly used by Pellicano to safeguard his recordings.

Whether authorities will ever decode all of the alleged evidence remains a mystery.

Last week, one person close to the federal investigation said it was possible that the government will never decipher the remaining recordings because Pellicano's encryption methods "are that good." But the same person considered that possibility insignificant in the overall scheme of the case.

"We're going to keep moving forward, but we've already got plenty of evidence," said the source, who declined to be identified because of an ongoing protective order in the case.

Steven Gruel, Pellicano's attorney, took umbrage at the government's suggestion that Pellicano himself holds the key to evidence sought by the defense.

"They have had almost four years to do this," Gruel said, referring to the time since the FBI's first search of Pellicano's office in late 2002. "And Mr. Pellicano is not going to make their job any easier."

Before the end of Monday's hearing, the judge told attorneys for both sides that she would authorize a special master, possibly a retired federal judge, to help expedite disputes over evidence still being sought in the case.

Outside court, prosecutor Saunders rejected the suggestion by defense attorneys that the government was moving slowly, because it is still putting its case together. "We are prepared to go to trial tomorrow if that is what the defense really wants," he said.

He's No Angel, He's A Private Investigator (LAT)

By Rachel Abramowitz, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

John Nazarian shares Pellicano's profession, but his reputation is cleaner. Even if he does dig for DNA in rich people's trash.

It's 10 p.m., and John Nazarian, a burly 53-year-old private eye, is hurtling around Beverly Hills in his immaculate red Scion looking for garbage. Nazarian treats trash as his private archeological site, the detritus of human existence that exposes all our hidden vulnerabilities — financial documents, prescription bottles, booze bottles and anything, anything, that might sport DNA.

"I would love to find condoms," he said, and cackled. "It's kind of disgusting to be pawing around other people's personal waste."

Yes, it's a dirty job being a private investigator, but Nazarian is prepared to do it. As he likes to say over and over again, he is one of the most expensive private eyes in L.A., charging $10,000 to $20,000 on retainer and $400 an hour for his services. He's racked up a number of celebrity clients, including singer Peggy Lee (whom he assiduously protected from the paparazzi to preserve the public's memory of her as a blond bombshell), Dean Martin, kooky billionaire Doris Duke and her butler, Bernard Lafferty. He's caught stalkers for CBS Chairman Les Moonves and former "NYPD Blue" star Andrea Thompson.

And then there are the 20 or so unnamed Hollywood wives with philandering husbands for whom Nazarian and his crew of 22 ex-cops and sundry specialists seem to be working in perpetuity.

Nazarian is part of a long, not particularly illustrious tradition of Hollywood private eyes, from fictional antiheroes, such as Sam Spade and "Chinatown's" Jake Gittes, to real-life swaggerer Fred Otash, the investigator for the scandal sheet Confidential Magazine, and Anthony Pellicano, the infamous gumshoe who sits in jail awaiting trial on more than 100 counts of wiretapping and witness intimidation.

This is why Nazarian keeps no records. Nothing. Tonight's game plan merely consists of a 3-by-5 card with an address.

"The D.A.s get furious with me," he said in a broad Boston accent. "We've had our documents requested, and I said I don't have 'em."

For this particular jaunt around Beverly Hills and Bel-Air, Nazarian has opted for a black muscle shirt and black sweats. He is officially dressed down, having left much of what he calls his costume at home. That includes a hat, oversize designer shades and bling — most notably his trademark rings, two hunks of gold and platinum that look like smashed golf balls. He designed them himself, as he did the idiosyncratic cut of his dyed black beard. It looks as if his goatee sprouted two slender butterfly wings. He shaves what's left of his hair, like Kojak. The general look suggests menace, and that's the point.

"As a private detective, the more bad things you say about me, the more valuable my trade becomes," he said.

Pellicano Fallout

Things have cooled down in Nazarian's line of work since the Pellicano indictment.

"I said to the lawyers, all the good wire guys, they've all gone to Chicago for the summer. Anybody who goes out and wiretaps and does bugging now, they've got to be out of their minds."

Nazarian said he didn't bug because "I'm too old to go to jail." As a former cop, he insisted he knew how to push the boundaries without going over the line.

"I have a huge amount of sympathy for Anthony," he said as he zipped through the canyons looking for the house. "If I was his office manager, I would have made sure that none of that happened." As for the lawyers who employed Pellicano, he groaned theatrically. "I feel horrible for those guys. A lawyer always trusts me to do the right thing. Not that we break the law, but a private eye, by the mere fact of what we do, it's not like we're a bunch of choirboys. We're not."

Nazarian is almost compulsively upfront about the people who don't like him — the California Assn. of Licensed Investigators, for one, which recently suspended him from its e-mail list serve for 30 days after he sent a nasty e-mail. Nazarian thinks most private investigators are "clowns" who rack up bills and don't deliver.

"I saw what all those other private eyes were doing, and I thought I shared nothing in common … that's why I don't associate with any of them." Nazarian owns a cream-colored Bentley and a Rolls-Royce, and, as he said, 'I don't go to their conferences, because where am I going to park this Bentley in a parking lot full of Camrys?"

He also brings up a case from the early '90s, when he was working as a private eye in San Francisco. Police suspected a ring of Gypsies was swindling elderly victims out of their savings, then poisoning them with digitalis. Nazarian, something of a Gypsy specialist, began investigating on his own. He was later accused of scheming to sell a confidential police affidavit to Hollywood and then to the defense.

Nazarian adamantly denies trying to peddle the affidavit to the defense and says it's not his fault that the police file fell into his lap. "How do I force a police inspector to give me something? What size gun was I pointing at him?"

He did, however, register the information with the Writers Guild of America. Nazarian was never charged with any wrongdoing.

Nazarian unabashedly loves the limelight and has just wrapped his first film role, essentially playing a version of himself opposite Anthony Hopkins in "Fracture," directed by Gregory Hoblit. (Nazarian once found someone who had been stalking Hoblit's wife, actress Debrah Farentino). He's worked for the tabloid show "Extra," which last week sent him to Mexico, with a camera in tow, to hunt for Olivia Newton-John's longtime boyfriend, Patrick McDermott, who disappeared a year ago.

Nazarian employs his team of experts to do what he can't: a former Beverly Hills cop for handwriting analysis, a forensic accountant, a lab guy, tech guys for debugging or to apply Global Positioning System tracking devices to cars (the latest way to follow spouses), a European detective to handle cases that go Continental. For people worried about wiretapping, he offers simple advice: Buy a bag of disposable cellphones.

Nazarian says he tries to work with the police, particularly the Los Angeles Police Department's Threat Management Unit, which deals with celebrities and stalking.

"I always tell my clients whenever I have the police involved, if you're lying to me and they pull out a big ugly skeleton, I'm getting up and leaving you there," Nazarian said.

DOJ_NMG_0033417

Det. Jeff Dunn of the Threat Management Unit declined to comment.

Former "NYPD Blue" star Thompson worked with Nazarian and the Threat Management Unit when she had a menacing and persistent stalker.

"John saved my life and my son's life," said Thompson, explaining that Nazarian not only set up surveillance at her house and kept an armed guard there at nights, but he also helped her learn skills such as hand-to-hand combat and defensive driving.

Although he does a smattering of criminal cases, family law accounts for about 70% of his business.

He is the only investigator used by 79-year-old attorney Sorrell Trope — often referred to as the dean of L.A. divorce lawyers. Trope, who has represented Cary Grant and Nicole Kidman, among other stars, has employed Nazarian to serve subpoenas and to get background information to facilitate in searches for hidden assets. "The principal thing is, he's honest," Trope said. "He's legitimate."

Family law attorney Lisa Helfend Meyer says she tried a lot of private eyes before she met Nazarian in the courthouse. "I wasn't happy because most of them are flaky…. I trust John, and I don't trust the majority of private investigators I've worked with."

In one Meyer case, Nazarian tracked down a husband who'd gone to Mexico with his wife to try to reconcile their marital differences but then vanished after five days. (Nazarian found the faithless husband with his girlfriend). In another case, a doctor claimed that he couldn't pay his child support because he was too ill to work; he was healthy enough to treat Nazarian, though, when he came in posing as a patient.

Attorney Cary Goldstein, who specializes in palimony cases, uses Nazarian "for questioned documents and handwriting analysis, surveillance."

"Investigators are kind of interesting characters," Goldstein said. "What they do is sell information, and sometimes you just want to know things about people and you don't want it to be the same kind of baloney that anyone can pull off a Google search. You want to know the real stuff…. John has a web of operatives and a way … of casually obtaining relevant information about people. That's what you pay for with someone like Nazarian."

What's notable these days about Trope, Meyer and Goldstein is that none of their names has surfaced among the widening ring of pricey L.A. attorneys who used Pellicano. However, all of them have battled with Pellicano's employers, most notably Dennis Wasser, Tom Cruise's divorce attorney, and celebrity litigator Bert Fields, both of whom have been officially notified by the U.S. attorney's office that they're "subjects of interest" in the inquiry. (Wasser and Fields have denied any wrongdoing.)

Nazarian believes — but can't prove — that he tangled with Pellicano during the acrimonious palimony battle between former Miss USA Shanna Moakler and boxer Oscar De La Hoya.

A few hours after Moakler aired her grievances against De La Hoya on Court TV in October 2000, a crew of burly paramilitary-style operatives barged into the home she once shared with De La Hoya. According to court documents and the police report, they also ringed the perimeter and harassed friends who were trying to enter. Moakler had called Nazarian, who arrived with his crew to protect her before police came and dispersed De La Hoya's operatives. Fields represented De La Hoya at the time. Stephen Espinoza, a former attorney for Fields' firm who was working on De La Hoya's behalf, insists that the men who arrived at Moakler's house were not Pellicano's but from a different security firm employed by De La Hoya.

Nazarian definitely butted heads with Pellicano after the wife of Pellicano's former accountant sued Nazarian for several million dollars. "She wanted her husband's horses killed, and I balked at it. She sued me for breach of contract. Six months later she came back to me, asking for my help," Nazarian said.

In the interim, the former client allegedly hired Pellicano to investigate Nazarian.

"He couldn't do much. He sent a packet to my home demanding all my files, all my records. Don't contact her. Don't do this. I have power of attorney. I basically laughed at him."

Not everybody admires Nazarian's methods.

One family law attorney, Lynn Soodik, says Nazarian tried to intimidate her while she took his deposition in a case.

"He sent me a greeting card at home. On the surface, it was not threatening, but you knew he was saying, 'I know where you live.' I just thought it was unprofessional," Soodik said.

Nazarian said he also went through her trash, just to unnerve her.

"I think it's funny Lynn Soodik would say something that I did was unprofessional," he said with a smirk. "You know the difference between a private eye and a lawyer? They have a nicer office."

Determination Pays Off

Nazarian pulls up in front of a red brick house. The light in the garage is on, and the trash is, unfortunately, sitting at the side of the house behind a gate. His language turns blue. "Again there's no trash," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0033418

This is the second time Nazarian has hit this house, and he's frustrated, but the night is still young. He decides to come back later, and scoots over to Bel-Air to check on a husband who his client thinks is cheating on her.

"Trust me. Just like Bugs Bunny gets a carrot, I'll get my … trash." (Indeed, a couple of weeks later, he reported finding enough blood to get a pregnancy test, as well as enough bottles of alcohol to suggest massive consumption.) Nazarian is vague about exactly what he's trying to prove, saying only that it's a family law case.

Nazarian dabbled in many professions before he became a private eye. His past incarnations include mortician, prison guard (at the Californian Institution for Women, where he got to know the Manson women), a heavy-equipment operator, the owner of a lawn business, a sheriff's deputy in San Francisco and a small-town cop in Mendota, Calif., where he worked with juveniles.

He was well known as one of the first openly gay cops in San Francisco. Nazarian says he's actually bisexual, although he generally doesn't discuss his sex life. "To classify myself, I would never say gay, but I consider myself fairly happy. I'm an across-the-board lover of trees, women, men, dogs, horses," he said. When he started out as a private eye, he worked often for people who were dying of AIDS and wanted to find lost loved ones. "All my friends who came on the department with me died of AIDS. It was a big part of the reason I left San Francisco. I lost all my friends when I was in my 30s."

Now infidelity pays the bills.

He's driving up to a client's house in Bel-Air, a $12-million mansion surrounded by foliage and mostly obscured from the street except for a portico with cars. Nazarian gets very excited because one is gone, the BMW that belongs to the spouse he's keeping tabs on.

He calls his client only to learn that the missing husband is not missing at all … but with her.

"She was laughing. 'My God, you're doing a good job of keeping track of him,' " said Nazarian, who seemed at least pleased to prove to his employer that he was working hard on her case. In the next week, he did the trash at this house and discovered that the spouse dined on TV dinners while his wife was away. "I'll never understand an unhappy multimillionaire who doesn't eat well," Nazarian said.

The majority of Nazarian's clients are women, and it's easy to see why. While Pellicano oozed a kind of predatory, oleaginous charm, Nazarian is more like a pit bull — ferocious to strangers, but deeply loyal and solicitous to his masters.

"Women gravitate toward him because they feel comfortable with him," Meyer said. "It's hard when a woman goes through a divorce. They've relied on their husbands, and now they're adrift. John comes through for them."

Nazarian also caters to the wealthy women who don't want to give up the Jaguars and the Beverly Hills mansion — they just want to know where their husbands are sleeping.

"They basically want to keep track of the flavor of the month," Nazarian said as he cruised back to the Beverly Hills house to see if the trash was out. "The men think they're in charge, but the women are always in charge."

Nazarian earns a lot of money because of men who can't stay faithful. He loves to find people's secrets, and he reels off some recent discoveries like a hunter bragging about his kills — the wealthy couple's box of sex toys, the nude photographs that had been shredded but that his team managed to piece back together.

"It's not an honorable profession," he said, sighing.

But he's no Pellicano, the disgraced avatar of Hollywood gumshoes.

"Some of the stuff Pellicano did was overboard," Nazarian said. "It was like putting too much garlic in the sauce. He didn't need to do that."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Reins In RICO (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, June 13, 2006

Although the U.S. Supreme Court last week ducked the questions everyone expected it to answer in two unrelated challenges under RICO, the justices did tighten the reins on the law generally viewed by the business community as a legal plague.

Even though the Court on Monday turned aside E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.'s petition in a Benlate case, the issues not resolved last week -- the scope of the "enterprise" definition in RICO and whether "reliance" is required in RICO mail and wire fraud claims -- will continue to divide the lower courts and inevitably return to the Supreme Court, according to RICO litigators and scholars.

DOJ_NMG_0033419

But those watching the high court's RICO cases last week viewed the outcome basically as a victory for anti-civil RICO forces.

In Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp., No. 04-433, a challenge involving two competing businesses, the justices essentially said they meant what they said in a 1992 decision: The alleged RICO violation must be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The law does not permit suits by parties who have been injured only indirectly, wrote Justice Anthony M. Kennedy for the 7-2 majority.

And, in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, No. 05-465, the high court delivered a blow to a RICO class action arising out of claims that Mohawk and its outside recruiting agents hired illegal aliens to depress wages for its legal workers. The justices, in an unsigned decision, vacated the workers' favorable judgment by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and directed that appellate court to reconsider in light of its proximate cause ruling in Anza.

"I think the Court remains concerned about the potential sweep of civil RICO litigation," said Gene C. Schaerr of the Washington office of Chicago's Winston & Strawn, who filed an amicus brief in Anza on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "The statute was passed originally to allow people to seek damages for harm as a result of mob activity. In the years since it was passed, it has gradually metamorphosed into a general purpose, business tort statute that gets raised in all kinds of business litigation where there is any allegation of fraud or dishonesty of any kind."

The Supreme Court has been making it more difficult for plaintiffs to bring civil RICO cases since the early 1990s, said Kevin P. Roddy of Wilentz, Goldman & Spitzer in Woodbridge, N.J., counsel to Ideal Steel.

"I think the Court doesn't like the statute," he said, adding, "The work that the [U.S.] Chamber has done over the last 20 years has borne fruit. They're very concerned about business being targeted with RICO cases, and that has finally resonated with the Court. But there's roughly the same number of RICO cases that are filed each year as there are antitrust cases, and I've never heard anyone say antitrust liability has run amok."

RICO prohibits certain conduct involving a "pattern of racketeering activity." The statute, which permits the award of treble damages and attorney fees, provides a private right of action under §1964(c) to any person "injured in his business or property by reason of a violation" of the act's substantive provisions.

Ideal Steel Supply Corp. sells steel mill products, supplies and services, and operates stores in the New York City boroughs of Queens and the Bronx. National Steel Supply, owned by Joseph and Vincent Anza, is Ideal's principal competitor and also operates stores in Queens and in the Bronx.

Ideal sued National under §1964(c), charging that National had engaged in an unlawful pattern of racketeering activity by failing to charge New York sales tax to cash-paying customers and fraudulently concealing the practice from the state. Ideal alleged that this practice allowed National to reduce its prices without affecting its profit margin, and thus put Ideal at a competitive disadvantage.

The district court dismissed Ideal's complaint, but the 2nd Circuit reversed.

FRAUDULENT-CONDUCT RELIANCE

The high court originally granted review to decide whether a party seeking damages under RICO for mail or wire fraud had to prove that it had relied on the fraudulent conduct and that the reliance had resulted in injury.

"The issue most burning for the bar is where a plaintiff says, 'I didn't rely on this but my customers relied on it or the bank relied on it.' Must you always have reliance in a RICO case predicated on mail or wire fraud?" said Jeffrey E. Grell of Ricoact.com, a law firm in Edina, Minn.

"For years, lower courts and parties have been struggling with what degree, if any, reliance is required," he said. "You've got three different standards relating to reliance. I was hoping [the justices] would at least advance that debate," said Grell, who teaches civil RICO at the University of Minnesota Law School.

But, instead, the high court on June 5 said its analysis "begins ... and largely ends" with its 1992 decision in Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection Corp., 503 U.S. 258. In Holmes, the justices held that §1964(c) requires proof of "some direct relation between the injury asserted and the injurious conduct alleged."

Writing for the majority, Kennedy said Ideal had not satisfied the proximate cause requirement of Holmes. The direct victim of the alleged RICO violation, he said, was the state of New York: "It was the state that was being defrauded and the state that lost tax revenue as a result."

Ideal's asserted harms, he said, were caused by a set of actions -- National's offering of lower prices -- "entirely distinct" from the alleged RICO violation, defrauding the state.

The "directness requirement" is necessary because of the difficulty that courts may have when trying to determine damages caused by some remote action, he said. There is also an appreciable risk of duplicative recoveries without it.

DOJ_NMG_0033420

"A RICO plaintiff cannot circumvent the proximate-cause requirement simply by claiming that the defendant's aim was to increase market share at a competitor's expense," wrote Kennedy. In evaluating a RICO claim for proximate causation, he said, "the central question" a court must ask is "whether the alleged violation led directly to the plaintiff's injuries."

But Justice Clarence Thomas, in dissent, said the majority's "restrictive proximate-cause test" would prevent an honest businessman from recovering for competitive injuries inflicted by an organized crime group using threats of violence on a supplier to get goods at cost that it could then resell at lower prices than its competitor. And that kind of organized crime, he wrote, was the principal concern of RICO.

In Mohawk, the justices agreed to decide whether the carpet manufacturer, working with outside hiring agencies to employ illegal aliens, was an association-in-fact enterprise under RICO. But the justices sent the case back to the 11th Circuit for further consideration in light of the Anza decision.

"Those of us who watch this were surprised when the Court granted cert in Mohawk not on the issue of causation but on a different issue," said Ideal Steel counsel Roddy. "I suspect when the court heard argument in Anza on March 27 and later in Mohawk, it realized there was a connecting thread, which is causation.

"I think Justice Thomas got it right in Anza," he added. "We had an extensive discussion in our brief that if you went back to the '50s and '60s and the organized crime commission reports, there was recognition that one of the ways organized criminals do business is they evade their taxes. These competitor versus competitor cases do not arise very often and now there is another set of fence-posts for plaintiffs."

Plaintiffs now will have a higher pleading burden to show direct injury in order to overcome a defendant's motion to dismiss or for summary judgment, he and others said.

With the Anza decision, "The Supreme Court is saying, 'We need to circumscribe the application of civil RICO and we're going to do so through the proximate-cause vehicle,'" said Mohawk counsel Juan P. Morillo of the Washington office of Sidley Austin. "It is requiring the lower courts to more strictly apply the direct injury requirement and to pay attention to the related issue of the speculative nature of damages."

The Court's concern, said Morillo, is "how tenuous the link is" between the alleged RICO activity (in Anza, defrauding the state, and in Mohawk, hiring illegal aliens) and the alleged injury (in Anza, lowering prices, and in Mohawk, the effect on wages). "The two situations are perfectly analogous," he said.

But Morillo's high court opponent doesn't see it that way.

"Anza says the direct victim is the state," said Howard Foster of Chicago's Johnson & Bell. "In my case, I assume Mohawk would argue the U.S. government is really the party that has been injured because illegal immigrants have been hired. But the government has not suffered a monetary injury in my case, and I don't think it could bring a lawsuit for money damages. There is no Anza problem. So the extensive analysis of proximate causation which 11th Circuit has already done would not be affected."

Since the 11th Circuit found that there was proximate cause, "You could read into the tea leaves [of what the Supreme Court did in Mohawk] that there was something wrong in the 11th Circuit's analysis," suggested Grell of Ricoact.com.

But, he added, "The courts are all very respectful of their respective authority. The 11th Circuit can make up its own mind and it tends to be more RICO plaintiff-friendly than some of the other circuits, like the 7th Circuit, which is very anti-RICO plaintiff."

Foster does agree that the Supreme Court is "reining in" RICO. Anza, he said, cut back on business competitors' standing to sue.

The Anza decision closes the door on RICO suits based on indirect injuries, said Winston & Strawn's Schaerr.

"From the standpoint of a business litigator, it's a good thing," he added. "You don't want to have some vaguely phrased exception that every plaintiff is going to argue he falls within. What the Court did is very important in ensuring the RICO statute, at least in the civil arena, goes back to being confined to cases closer to what Congress had in mind."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

11th Circuit Upholds Firing Of Fla. Deputies Who Appeared In Online Porn (LAW)

By Carl Jones, Daily Business Review

Miami Daily Business Review, June 13, 2006

The Palm Beach, Fla., Sheriff's Office did not violate the U.S. Constitution when it fired two deputies for appearing in pornography distributed on the Internet, a federal appeals court has decided.

DOJ_NMG_0033421

A three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals unanimously held late last month that the deputies' online escapades were not constitutionally protected because government employees may be limited in their speech if that speech has a negative or detrimental effect on the integrity of the government.

In an opinion written by Judge Stanley F. Birch Jr., the 11th Circuit panel said former Deputies Ronald Thaeter and Timothy Moran were not engaged in a protected form of speech when they appeared in the pornographic photos and videos. Furthermore, since government employees can have their free speech restricted more than that of other Americans, the panel found that U.S. District Judge Daniel T.K. Hurley was right to dismiss the deputies' civil rights lawsuit against the sheriff's office.

Judges Phyllis A. Kravitch and Richard D. Cudahy, sitting by designation, concurred.

West Palm Beach attorney Fred H. Gelston, who served as outside counsel for the sheriff's office, said deputies and other government employees are free to take part in whatever sexual activities they want. But "it's when they put it on the [Internet] that it becomes a problem," Gelston said. "And that's what the lawyers on the other side didn't understand."

One of the deputies' attorneys said he plans to appeal the 11th Circuit's decision, either by filing a petition for rehearing or asking for a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We're very disappointed that the 11th Circuit thinks that they can monitor police officers' nonobscene conduct outside the office," said Fort Lauderdale solo attorney Richard L. Rosenbaum. Fort Lauderdale Daniel A. Aaronson also represented the deputies at trial and on appeal.

In 2000, deputy sheriffs Thaeter and Moran were asked by the wife of a fellow deputy, Jack Maxwell, to appear, along with their wives, in online pornography available to the public for pay. Deputy Maxwell and his wife also participated in the porn session.

During a single shoot, still photos and some video of the deputies engaged in group sex were shot. Eventually, those images were posted on several pay-per-view Internet sites. The three deputies had requested that their faces be blurred, but their faces were reportedly recognizable in a handful of the images.

In October 2000, an anonymous tip led officials at the sheriff's office to Web sites featuring the images of the three deputies. An investigator found the photos and video, but concluded the photos had no explicit connection to the sheriff's office unless someone happened to recognize the men as sheriff's deputies in the few photos where their faces were available. An image showing a nude woman, which turned out to be Elizabeth Maxwell, posing in front of a sheriff's office patrol car also was found, but Maxwell's body blocked the name of the county on the car.

Still, the sheriff's office pursued a variety of ethics charges against the three deputies. They were accused of failing to obtain authorization for off-duty employment and violating a pledge that states: "I will keep my private life unsullied as an example to all."

During the first phase of the investigation, Maxwell, without knowing about the investigation, resigned to open a nutrition food store. After a series of findings and appeals by the sheriff's office, then-Sheriff Ed Bieluch approved the termination of Thaeter and Moran.

In May 2002, Thaeter and Moran then filed a federal suit, claiming that the sheriff's office violated their First and 14th Amendment rights. In 2003, Judge Hurley granted a motion by the sheriff's office to dismiss the suit for failure to state a claim that could be resolved by the court. The fired deputies appealed.

The appellate panel noted that there was no dispute that Thaeter and Moran had not sought prior authorization to accept the outside employment as porn actors.

As to the free speech controversy, the court said the deputies' speech was not protected because it did not involve matters of great public interest. That holding was based on a 2004 opinion by the U.S. Supreme Court, which found that a San Diego police officer was not protected by the First Amendment when he sold on eBay a pornographic video of himself performing various sex acts.

In that case, the officer wore a generic police uniform in the video, which he sold along with genuine San Diego police gear under the same online moniker. That decision, City of San Diego v. Roe, was issued the day before the parties in the Palm Beach County case presented oral arguments before the 11th Circuit.

As in Roe, the 11th Circuit said that Thaeter and Moran were not advancing a protected form of speech.

But Rosenbaum said the firing of the two deputies and the 11th Circuit ruling mark government over-reaching into people's personal lives. As long as the conduct is not illegal, he said, "what you do on your own time is your own business."

He also criticized the sheriff's office required pledge that officers must keep their private life "unsullied." Rosenbaum said, "I've tried as best as I can to figure what [unsullied] means, and if I don't know, I don't know how a regular police officer can be put on notice about what he can and can't do."

Gelston responded that "there's nothing in the canon of ethics that says you can't murder people either. But law enforcement officers don't need to be told that."

DOJ_NMG_0033422

Flag-desecration Amendment Needs 1 More Vote (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate is one vote away from passing a constitutional amendment that would ban desecration of the U.S. flag, the closest that amendment supporters have been to passage.

The American Legion, which supports the amendment, and the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposes it, both say there are 66 votes to pass it.

Whether advocates can find the 67th vote to send the flag amendment to the states for ratification remains unclear. A Senate vote is set for the week of June 26.

Elections, post-9/11 patriotism and the Iraq war have improved the measure's prospects since the Senate last voted in 2000, says Patrick Brady of the Citizens Flag Alliance. "We're very hopeful we'll get it," he says.

The House of Representatives last year approved the flag amendment 286-130. It was the seventh time it had done so since the U.S. Supreme Court overturned a Texas law banning flag burning in 1989. The next year, the court ruled that the federal Flag Protection Act violated the First Amendment's free speech guarantee.

"The American flag is a unique symbol that should be protected," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the chief sponsor.

Paul McMasters of the non-partisan First Amendment Center, which works to protect that amendment's freedoms, says the Senate is trying to provide "a radical solution to a non-problem. It's unwise, unnecessary and un-American."

Four times in the Senate, the flag measure has failed to receive the two-thirds majority required of constitutional amendments. In 2000, the amendment came up four votes short with 63.

But as Flag Day approaches Wednesday, advocates on both sides of the issue say momentum has shifted. Reasons:

·Republican gains. Sens. George Allen of Virginia, John Thune of South Dakota, John Ensign of Nevada and Richard Burr of North Carolina, all supporters of an amendment, replaced Democrats who opposed one.

·Supportive Democrats. Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and at least 13 other Democrats have voted for or voiced support for the amendment. New Jersey's Robert Menendez voted for it as a House member, and his spokesman, Allyn Brooks-LaSure, says his "current intention" is to do so as a senator. Menendez replaced now-Gov. Jon Corzine, who had opposed it.

·State resolutions. All 50 states have approved non-binding resolutions endorsing an amendment. "That is unprecedented and shouldn't be ignored," American Legion legislative director Steve Robertson says. "We will see if the senators are listening to their constituents or not."

Thirty-eight, or three-fourths, of the 50 states must ratify the measure to make it the 28th Amendment.

It took a record 202 years for states to ratify the 27th Amendment, which says a congressional pay raise can't take effect until after the next election has been held. The 26th Amendment, guaranteeing 18-year-olds the right to vote, was the quickest to be ratified: It took 100 days in 1971.

For now, enough senators — including three Republicans — remain opposed to the flag amendment to keep it from getting to the states. Sen. Robert Bennett of Utah wants to write a law instead of rewriting the Constitution. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell of Kentucky objects to altering the First Amendment. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island also voted no in 2000.

John Vile, a constitutional law expert at Middle Tennessee State University, says some believe that the amendment "would be the first in U.S. history to restrict the Bill of Rights."

Despite ads by the Citizens Flag Alliance urging his support, Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., has no plans to vote yes and does not believe his re-election will be affected. Says spokesman Chris Thorne: "This is not an issue that people are talking to us about."

ANTITRUST:

Third Trader Pleads Guilty To Manipulating Natural Gas Price (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO – A former trader at Williams Energy Marketing & Trading pleaded guilty in federal court to manipulating natural gas prices, authorities said Friday.

Daryl Russell Brown, 36, pleaded guilty in federal court to conspiracy to manipulate natural gas prices over approximately four years.

Brown admitted that between 1998 and 2002, he conspired with others at the Tulsa trading company to report fictitious trades to two industry newsletters – "Inside FERC's Gas Market Report" and the "Bidweek Survey."

DOJ_NMG_0033423

The false reports, which were published, provided traders with bogus information that gas was trading at levels higher than it actually was – forcing natural gas prices to rise.

Brown was a trader and manager of operations at the Williams Companies' subsidiary based in Tulsa, Okla. He is the third Williams trader to be convicted of the conspiracy.

"Mr. Brown admitted that approximately 75 percent of the trades he reported to industry newsletters were deliberately fabricated," said U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan.

Brown faces a maximum five years imprisonment.

AGs Want Bush Administration To Get Tough On Gas Prices (AP)

By Andrew Miga, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly says the Bush administration needs to deliver a tough new message to big oil companies about rising gas prices: enough already.

Reilly emerged from a meeting with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez on Monday saying oil companies deserve a "very good tongue-lashing" from top administration officials warning that unless "price gouging" stops, the government will crack down.

"This administration is going to have to get tough with them, call them in," said Reilly, a Democratic candidate for governor. "This administration can reign them in by calling them in and saying, 'Listen, enough is enough, the American people have had enough, you either do this or we are going to do this for you'."

Reilly and attorneys general from Connecticut and several other states met for about an hour at the Justice Department with Gonzalez and Federal Trade Commission Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said he proposed a joint federal-state investigation and prosecution against any illegal practices by the oil industry that are increasing gasoline prices.

"As a first step, this conversation was encouraging, although the test will be whether there is real information sharing and joint efforts to investigate and prosecute anti-trust and price-gouging violations," Blumenthal said.

The Justice Department said it was working with states on the issue.

"We are focusing on doing our part to look at this issue and we are encouraging the states to do the same," said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. "Today's meeting was part of an ongoing dialogue with them to insure that all appropriate steps are being taken."

President Bush has urged America to reduce its dependence on foreign oil by improving conservation, expanding domestic production and developing alternative energy sources such as ethanol.

Reilly says Bush officials have dismissed recent increases as market fluctuations in the wake of hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year. But Reilly says large refiners, not retail gas stations, were behind the steep price increases.

Federal officials should use antitrust laws to break the oil companies' grip over consumers, Reilly said.

"They have market control, they have concentration of power and they are exploiting that power on the backs of consumers, an obscene amount of profit," Reilly said at a news conference on a sidewalk outside the Justice Department.

"If we have to change the laws, then let's change the laws and deal with these companies right now," he said. "If these laws are insufficient, let's work to change these laws."

Gasoline prices, meanwhile, were up for a second week in a row in Massachusetts, with self-serve regular unleaded averaging $2.99 per gallon, up three cents from last week and back to where it was a month ago, according to AAA Southern New England. One year ago, the price was $2.12.

In Connecticut, the average price for a gallon of regular gas was $3.14 Monday, compared with $3.06 a month ago and $2.22 a year ago, according to AAA.

Barr Settles Novartis Suit, Sees Charge (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

Barr Pharmaceuticals Settles Lawsuit With Novartis Unit, Sees Charge in June Quarter

WOODCLIFF LAKE, N.J. (AP) -- Drug maker Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. said Monday it agreed to pay $22.5 million to settle a lawsuit with a unit of Novartis, and said the payout will lower profit for the June quarter by 13 cents per share.

The litigation stems from a suit Invamed Inc. and Apothecon Inc. filed in 1998 charging Barr with violating antitrust laws and illegally blocking access to the raw material source for warfarin sodium, a drug that prevents blood clots. An appeals court in October 2004 reversed a lower court's ruling and found the two plaintiffs raised issues of material fact on their antitrust claims. The trial was scheduled to start on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0033424

Both Invamed and Apothecon have been acquired by Swiss drug maker Novartis AG since they filed the suit. Barr said it thought the lawsuit was without merit, but decided to settle to avoid further expense.

Barr said it would record a one-time payment of $22.5 million for the quarter ending June 30.

Mittal Refuses To Raise Arcelor Bid Staff And Agencies (AP)

By Aoife White, AP Business Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium - Steelmaker Arcelor SA rejected a revised offer from Mittal Steel Co., which refused again Monday to raise its 25.8 billion euros ($33 billion) bid for its rival and criticized the value of the company's deal with Russia's OAO Severstal as "entirely fictitious."

But Arcelor left the door open for Mittal, saying the Severstal transaction did not preclude an offer by Mittal and it was ready to meet Mittal again to explore a better deal.

Arcelor said Mittal's current offer "is inadequate as it continues to undervalue" the company and called the Severstal transaction "a more attractive alternative from a strategic, financial and social point of view."

Arcelor valued itself at 44 euros ($55.70) a share in an offer to buy back up to a quarter of its capital — the same price Severstal Chairman Alexei Mordashov is paying to buy 32 percent of the company.

"We have made a very compelling offer to shareholders offering a 70 percent premium to the pre-offer all-time-high share price of Arcelor," Mittal said. "The idea that the Severstal transaction values Arcelor at 44 euros is entirely fictitious and without market substantiation."

They will also decide if Arcelor can go ahead with plans for the share buyback. Arcelor's board seemed to ease off its battle against Mittal by saying it would not launch the self-tender offer until after Mittal announces how many shares it has bought.

Georges Ugeux, chairman and CEO of Galileo Global Advisors, said Arcelor shareholders are confronted with a very complicated financial transaction.

Mittal and Arcelor representatives met last week for the first time since Mittal made its surprise offer in January. Arcelor had previously refused Mittal's overtures, saying they could meet only when Mittal furnished a standalone business plan — which it did on June 2, the same day it got EU antitrust clearance.

Financier Romain Zaleski — who recently bought 5 percent of Arcelor, making him one of the largest shareholders — told Dow Jones Newswires in Italy that he believed Mittal could raise its offer again.

Dexia analyst Mickael Van den Hauwe said the Arcelor board was doing everything it could to push the valuation up, while Edmund Shing of Kepler Equities in Paris said Arcelor knows the deal is crucial for Mittal.

"They're saying, we can negotiate, but you have to pay us more," Shing said. "For Mittal, there's no comparable deal of size or fit. Mittal is saying, 'We either stay as we are or do the big deal, even if it's more expensive. It's the imperative deal."

However, Ugeux said Mittal simply could not afford to take on more debt to make a much higher.

"They have more tons but the profitability and revenues are not as good as Arcelor. There is a limit of what he can do," he said.

European Union Takes First Steps To Include Turkey And Croatia (NYT)

By James Kanter, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

BRUSSELS, June 12 — The European Union pushed forward with enlargement plans today, conducting a first round of membership negotiations with Turkey and Croatia and signing a premembership agreement with Albania.

The talks with Turkey proceeded after a compromise was reached over a demand by Cyprus, a European Union member, that Ankara put into effect a protocol it signed with Europe last year and open up its ports and airports to trade with new member states, including Cyprus. What Cyprus got was a message from European Union foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg asking Turkey to do just that, or face delays in "the overall progress in the negotiations."

Cyprus then dropped its objections to the start of talks and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul of Turkey departed for Luxembourg to join the meeting.

The foreign ministers' talks today, on science and research , were the first of 35 rounds of negotiations to be held with Turkey in the accession process, which is expected to take at least a decade.

The talks with Turkey and Croatia remain on target, Krisztina Nagy, the spokeswoman for Olli Rehn, the European Union enlargement commissioner, said today. "We welcome the fact that a compromise could be made."

DOJ_NMG_0033425

The moves toward further enlargement are continuing despite doubts among some in Europe after the last round of enlargement — to 25 from 15 countries — two years ago. There is also concern about absorbing not just Turkey, which would be the first mainly Muslim country to enter the union, but also countries in the Balkans.

Even so, the enlargement process still is proceeding, despite the huge financial commitments involved in integrating such economies, because of the European Union's central belief that every citizen has the right to benefit from the continent's growth. European Union states formally set the process in motion in October. Policy makers say that the criteria required for enlargement can make for stable, prosperous, Western-oriented neighbors — even if circumstances change and candidate states do not eventually join the bloc.

"The political price of stopping the process of enlargement now is very large," said Katinka Barysch, chief economist at the Center for European Reform, in London.

Another important factor is that "the process of accession can virtually transform a country," Ms. Barysch said, using as examples the transformation of the economy in Poland and other East European countries.

In addition to formally opening membership talks with Croatia, the European Union today recognized Montenegro as Europe's newest sovereign state. The agreement with Albania commits the formerly Stalinist country to intensify economic and political reforms in exchange for greater trade withEurope, but offers no entry date.

European leaders have grown wary about enlarging the European Union following the rejection by French and Dutch voters of a European constitution last spring. The votes were seen as a 'no' vote to a larger union after eight formerly Communist countries joined the bloc two years ago, along with Cyprus and Malta.

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany has backed a partnership with Turkey, rather than full membership.

In France, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy has said that further enlargement of the European Union should be limited to Romania and Bulgaria, which are set join by January 2008 at the latest.

Such views show "deep concern within the E.U. about not enlarging too far or too fast," Michael Emerson, a senior research fellow at the European Center for Policy Studies, in Brussels, said today.

For Turkey, and Prime Minister Recip Tayyip Erdogan, the stakes are high. Mr. Erdogan's popularity has slumped amid accelerating inflation and a drop in the value of the Turkish lira, making the prospect of European Union membership even more important in boosting standards of living, foreign investment and employment.

Even so, Mr. Erdogan wants to avoid being seen as a hostage to European interests or being humiliated if the Union changes its view and puts new obstacles in the way of membership. In a pointed warning today, Mr. Erdogan said his enthusiasm for the European Union could wane "if politics becomes involved in this process."

European Union diplomats warned that developments today could be a harbinger of obstacles ahead, including a larger showdown between Cyprus and Turkey — still in a standoff over control of Cyprus.The government of the Greek Cypriot south of the island is the internationally recognized administration, while the Turkish north is recognized only by Turkey.

"I think there are difficult questions about what this means for the future if even today progress was so hard to achieve," one European Union diplomat said. "That's a bit strange, and suggests that we don't quite know where we are going."

The compromise today allowed Turkey to proceed with additional steps toward reaching European Union standards. The membership process requires candidate countries to put in place reforms in a wide range of areas — culture and education probably are next — and to overhaul policies in such technical areas as trade law and antitrust law.

Croatia hopes to join the union by 2009, but experts like Mr. Emerson say 2010 is a more likely date.

Few people expect Turkey, even if negotiations stay on track, to be a member until about 2016. As for Albania, the European Union urged Tirana to make improvements in public sector governance, media freedoms, property restitution and minority rights, The Associated Press reported.

Mirant Rescinds Unsolicited Bid To Acquire NRG (WSJ)

By Bhattiprolu Murti

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Mirant Corp. withdrew its $7.9 billion hostile bid for rival power company NRG Energy Inc. following opposition from its own shareholders, saying it was disappointed NRG was unwilling to discuss the proposal.

The withdrawal ends a bitter takeover battle involving the two power companies as well as Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which initially advised Mirant before it stepped down amid allegations from NRG that it shared nonpublic information about the company with Mirant. The battle marks the increased value seen in power-generation assets after a tough period in the industry, during which both companies sought bankruptcy-court protection.

DOJ_NMG_0033426

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, shares of NRG fell $3.93, or 7.7%, to $46.92, while Mirant's shares slipped seven cents to $24.38.

Mirant said a long and contested pursuit isn't in the best interests of the Atlanta company and its shareholders and that it will continue its efforts to create value for shareholders. NRG said the rise in its share price during the past 24 months showed the market recognized the soundness of the Princeton, N.J., company's strategy.

Earlier yesterday, hedge fund Pirate Capital LLC, run by activist investor Thomas R. Hudson Jr., sent a letter to Mirant's independent directors, saying if Mirant didn't publicly abandon its bid to acquire NRG by tomorrow and announce the hiring of an investment bank for the sale of the company, it would seek a special shareholder meeting. In the letter, filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Pirate Capital told Mirant's independent directors that if they didn't take appropriate action, it plans to solicit support to meet the 40% threshold to call a special stockholder meeting seeking to increase the board's size and remove some incumbent directors.

Pirate Capital is the beneficial owner of about five million Mirant shares, or 1.6% of its common stock.

Mirant, which emerged from bankruptcy protection in January, made a hostile, or unsolicited, bid in late May to acquire NRG for about $7.9 billion. Mirant subsequently sued NRG over its rejection, saying that decision was based on a false claim that Mirant had improperly obtained confidential information about NRG through independent adviser Goldman Sachs. Goldman Sachs, which resigned from the assignment, has said it did nothing wrong and provided advice based only on public information.

Pirate Capital, Omega Advisors and Jana Partners LLC sent letters to Mirant earlier this month asking the company to abandon its plans to buy NRG. Together, the three entities own 3.6% of Mirant's stock.

Zale Ends Merger Talks With Signet (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Zale Corp. said it ended tentative merger talks with chief rival Signet Group PLC, abandoning one of its options as it scrambles to recover from a poor holiday season and three years of losing ground to other jewelry sellers in the U.S.

Had a deal been struck, it would have combined the two leading specialty-jewelry retailers in the U.S., but it also would have resulted in significant overlap of their store bases. London-based Signet operates 1,837 stores, including 1,246 in the U.S., under the Kay Jewelers and Jared brands. Zale, based in Irving, Texas, operates 2,345 stores, including 2,100 in the U.S., mostly under its flagship Zales Jewelers brand.

Zale has struggled after its strategy last year to shift its merchandise assortment and advertising to appeal to a more fashionable, upscale clientele resulted in lost sales and a sharp profit drop in its Christmas quarter. The retailer subsequently ousted its top management and scrapped much of the overhaul. It now faces an accounting investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, while its search for a new chief executive officer continues.

Meanwhile, Signet's U.S. division last year surpassed Zale in U.S. sales for the first time. Zale's total revenue in the fiscal year ended July 21, 2005, was $2.38 billion. Signet had revenue of £1.75 billion, or $3.22 billion, in the fiscal year ended Jan. 28, 2006.

The merger talks were reported by Britain's Mail on Sunday. After initially declining to comment, Signet issued a statement early yesterday morning confirming the "preliminary discussions" of a merger with Zale but noting the uncertainty of the outcome. By midday, Signet announced the talks had ended.

Zale followed in the afternoon with its own statement, explaining that Signet had approached it about a merger, but the Zale board decided against the combination. Zale's directors "concluded that its shareholders are best served by continuing as an independent company," according to the statement.

Zale also said in its statement that it anticipates introducing a new CEO "within the next several weeks." Interim CEO Mary "Betsy" Burton, who doesn't aspire to keep the job permanently, said late last month that Zale had narrowed the search to two outside candidates.

News of the merger talks boosted Zale's stock by as much as 16% to $27.75 yesterday before it was announced negotiations had ended. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Zale shares were up 3.5% to $24.70. Signet's American depositary shares gained 3.6% to $18.11 on the NYSE.

BBVA Carves Out Niche In U.S.-to-Mexico Payments (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's Texas spending spree -- including the $2.2 billion purchase of Texas Regional Bancshares Inc. and the $480 million purchase of State National Bancshares -- sets the stage for the big Spanish bank to become a major player in the competitive market for remittances between the U.S. and Mexico and could lead to further acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0033427

Under a deal announced yesterday, BBVA, Spain's second-largest bank in terms of market value, after Grupo Santander SA, said it would pay $2.16 billion for Texas Regional, whose branches stretch along the Rio Grande Valley. The acquisition is expected to close in the fourth quarter after shareholder and regulatory approval. Separately, BBVA also said it would buy State National, a Fort Worth bank with 44 branches and a sizable El Paso presence. The acquisitions give BBVA ownership of branches along the Texas-Mexico border stretching from El Paso eastward to McAllen, where Texas Regional is based.

The purchase could allow BBVA to gain a larger share of the remittance business that flows between the U.S. and Mexico.

Though a huge business -- some 40 million remittance transactions sent money to Mexico from the U.S. in 2003, according to a Pew Hispanic Center report -- big banks such as Citigroup Inc., Bank of America Corp., and Wells Fargo & Co. have won only a small part of that business. Much of the rest is done by wire-transfer services.

BBVA, which made another acquisition in Texas last year, has had investment bankers in Houston scoping out potential bids as part of Chairman Francisco González's ambitions to turn BBVA into one of the world's largest banking companies by 2008.

After bulking up the bank through acquisitions in Latin America in the 1990s, Mr. González has said BBVA needs more muscle in the U.S., Europe and Asia. BBVA tried and failed to acquire an Italian lender, Banco Nazionale di Lavoro, last year. BBVA may now seek to link up its new U.S. presence with its Mexican unit, Bancomer, to make a direct play on the remittance market, potentially giving it an advantage against larger U.S. banks. For the past two years, the Madrid-based bank has focused U.S. expansion on border areas ripe for remittance business in Texas and California.

By contrast, its main domestic rival and Spain's largest bank, Santander has sought to grab a piece of the mainstream U.S. retail market. This spring, the bank got regulatory approval for the purchase of a 20% stake in Philadelphia-based Sovereign Bancorp Inc., giving it entry into the cutthroat northeastern U.S. banking market.

Texas Regional shares have risen 47% in the past year amid speculation the bank was an acquisition target. BBVA's offer values Texas Regional's stock at $38.90 a share. The stock yesterday rose $3.50, or 10%, to $37.70 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, BBVA's American depositary receipts fell 21 cents, or 1.1%, $18.98. Keefe, Bruyette & Woods advised Texas Regional with legal advice from Rogers & Whitley. Morgan Stanley acted as BBVA's adviser in both purchases. Law firm Sullivan & Cromwell advised on the Texas Regional purchase while Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton handled the State National deal.

Though little known outside of Texas bank circles, Texas Regional, the parent of Texas State Bank, has built a powerhouse bank in the Rio Grande Valley, located in deep south Texas bordering Mexico. The bank is led by Glen Roney, a 75-year-old Texas bank veteran who also has expanded Texas Regional into cities such as Houston.

BBVA already owns Laredo National Bancshares Inc. Laredo, also located along the U.S.-Mexican border, is northwest of McAllen. Its latest acquisition will pit the Spanish bank against J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and a host of independent banks operating in the Rio Grande Valley and in Texas as well as banks such as Wachovia Corp. that have expanded in the state.

Under Mr. Roney, Texas Regional worked through the Texan bank crisis of the 1980s and ultimately gathered more than $6 billion in assets, according to Keefe, Bruyette and research firm SNL Financial.

Still, the 73-branch bank has struggled like other banks against a narrowing between short- and long-term interest rates that has cut into profits. Texas Regional also has fought to keep down souring loans; last year, Mr. Roney and the executives at the bank said they wouldn't pay bonuses until nonperforming loans were halved, Keefe, Bruyette said in a report. In fact, yesterday's announcement said Texas Regional shareholders may receive a special dividend of as much as 10 cents a share if the bank can collect on a souring loan to one business client.

RIAA Chief Says Illegal Song-sharing 'contained' (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, June 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Nearly a year after the Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling against online music file-sharing services, the CEO of the Recording Industry Association of America says unauthorized song swapping has been "contained."

"The problem has not been eliminated," says association CEO Mitch Bainwol. "But we believe digital downloads have emerged into a growing, thriving business, and file-trading is flat."

That's an optimistic view from an industry that saw its numbers slide to near oblivion after the launch of the original Napster in 1999. CD sales fell as much as 30%, and the RIAA pressed Congress and the courts for relief against what it said was rampant piracy.

DOJ_NMG_0033428

After the Supreme Court ruled that the services could be liable for piracy by their users, the RIAA sent cease-and-desist letters to several firms. Most — including BearShare, WinMX and Grokster — shut down. EDonkey and others said they would switch to a licensed, paid model.

EDonkey, which along with BitTorrent is one of the most-used file-sharing services, has yet to make the switch.

Even with Grokster and WinMX shut down, their software programs still exist. Eric Garland, CEO of Internet measurement firm BigChampagne, says that more people than ever are using file-sharing networks. “Nearly 10 million people are online, swapping media, at any given time,” he says. That May figure is up from 8.7 million people in 2005, he says.

Garland says the RIAA has made some inroads. “They have removed the profiteers from online piracy,” he says. “They've also embarked on a very successful education campaign. Kids now know about copyright, and the consequences.”

The RIAA has sued just over 18,000 individuals for sharing songs online, with 4,500 settling for about $4,000 per case.

Album sales are still down — about 3% this year. But Bainwol says digital sales — up 77% — make up for the shortfall.

The wide availability of legitimate alternatives to file-sharing services has helped wean computer users away, says Russ Crupnick, president of the music group for market tracker NPD Group.

Apple's iTunes has sold more than 1 billion songs to consumers, and online stores Rhapsody and Napster are gaining traction. Crupnick says digital store purchases have “almost doubled” while file-sharing is flat among computer users in 12,000 homes in an NPD survey.

Meanwhile, the RIAA is suing XM Satellite Radio, which introduced a portable $399 player (from Pioneer and Samsung) that lets subscribers record songs.

Bainwol says he doesn't mind consumers acquiring songs on the device — it's just that XM hasn't licensed the songs for download.

“We love the technology and think it's cool, but if you want to be an iTunes clone, you should pay for it,” he says. XM has called the RIAA lawsuit a “negotiating” tactic.

About 1.5 billion songs are available for free swapping at any given time on file-sharing networks, says Garland, a mix of current hits and songs from such artists as the Beatles and Led Zeppelin that have yet to be released to the digital music stores.

That number is huge but hasn't grown substantially, while video piracy has. “The music industry isn't seeing double-digit growth in piracy anymore, but Hollywood is,” Garland says.

German Authorities Examine Web Rights Deal (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

German Antitrust Authorities Examine Internet-Rights Deal Between Soccer League and Deutsche Telekom

BERLIN (AP) -- Germany's antitrust authority said Monday it is examining the compromise deal between the German soccer league and Deutsche Telekom AG for Internet broadcasting rights after receiving complaints.

The Federal Cartel Office said it had received complaints from rival Internet service providers that Deutsche Telekom is abusing its dominant position.

Under the agreement reached last Wednesday with the German soccer league, or DFL, the telecom will broadcast Bundesliga soccer games online and provide content to its T-Mobile subscribers' cell phones.

Deutsche Telekom -- which won the rights to broadcast German soccer league matches via the Internet in an auction last December -- will not, however, distribute the Internet signal through its cable and satellite operations, both companies said in a statement. In return, Deutsche Telekom agreed to pay less for the Internet rights than originally agreed.

At the same time, it was announced that pay-TV company Arena, which won the television broadcasting rights, will no longer have the right to broadcast over the Internet or to sublicense its Internet broadcasting rights.

Smaller internet service providers had hoped that they could receive a license from Arena to offer German soccer games to their customers over the Internet.

T-Online is Europe's largest Internet service provider, with some 13.5 million subscribers. Besides Germany, T-Online owns Club Internet in France and Ya.com in Spain.

Shares of Deutsche Telekom were down 0.6 percent to euro12.93 (US$16.37) in Frankfurt trading.

ENVIRONMENT:

Pipe Company Executive Gets Prison For Rigging Pollution Test (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033429

SALT LAKE CITY -- An executive for a cast-iron pipe foundry in Provo was sentenced Monday to a year in prison for rigging a pollution test.

Charles Matlock, who was vice president and general manager of Pacific States Cast Iron Pipe Co., also was fined $20,000 by U.S. District Judge Dee Benson.

Matlock pleaded guilty in February to violating the Clean Air Act by manipulating an emissions test at Pacific States, a division of Birmingham, Ala.-based McWane Inc.

At issue was a furnace stack test conducted in 2000. An indictment accused the company of feeding crude iron instead of its usual supply of contaminated automobile scrap into the foundry to cover up pollution violations.

The 2000 test was used to file emissions reports to government regulators in 2001, 2002 and 2003. McWane paid a $3 million fine for falsifying the test.

"When senior corporate executives cheat on required tests, public health and the environment suffer," said David Uhlmann, chief of the environmental crimes section of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Matlock's sentencing "is further proof of the McWane legacy: a repeat offender that committed years of environmental and worker safety violations at facilities across the country," Uhlmann said in a statement.

The Justice Department said it had obtained convictions against McWane foundries for Clean Air Act violations at Anniston, Ala.; Birmingham, Ala. Phillipsburg, N.J., and Tyler, Texas. It was at Birmingham where McWane in December was ordered to pay a $5 million fine for discharging industrial waste.

In a statement, McWane, a family-owned company, insisted it never did harm to the environment or its workers. Long before the federal investigation began, the Provo foundry upgraded its emissions control system, reducing carbon monoxide emissions by 95 percent and volatile organic compounds by nearly half, the company said.

The Provo foundry casts water and sewer pipes, fire hydrants and fittings.

EPA Rule Loosened After Oil Chief's Letter To Rove (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — A rule designed by the Environmental Protection Agency to keep groundwater clean near oil drilling sites and other construction zones was loosened after White House officials rejected it amid complaints by energy companies that it was too restrictive and after a well-connected Texas oil executive appealed to White House senior advisor Karl Rove.

The new rule, which took effect Monday, came after years of intense industry pressure, including court battles and behind-the-scenes agency lobbying. But environmentalists vowed Monday that the fight was not over, distributing internal White House documents that they said portrayed the new rule as a political payoff to an industry long aligned with the Republican Party and President Bush.

In 2002, a Texas oilman and longtime Republican activist, Ernest Angelo, wrote a letter to Rove complaining that an early version of the rule was causing many in the oil industry to "openly express doubt as to the merit of electing Republicans when we wind up with this type of stupidity."

Rove responded by forwarding the letter to top White House environmental advisors and scrawling a handwritten note directing an aide to talk to those advisors and "get a response ASAP."

Rove later wrote to Angelo, assuring him that there was a "keen awareness" within the administration of addressing not only environmental issues but also the "economic, energy and small business impacts" of the rule.

Environmentalists pointed to the Rove correspondence as evidence that the Bush White House, more than others, has mixed politics with policy decisions that are traditionally left to scientists and career regulators. At the time, Rove oversaw the White House political office and was directing strategy for the 2002 midterm elections.

Angelo had been mayor of Midland, Texas, when Bush ran an oil firm there. He is also a longtime hunting partner of Rove's. The two men first worked together when Angelo managed Ronald Reagan's 1980 presidential campaign in Texas.

In an interview Monday, Angelo welcomed the new groundwater rule and said his letter might have made a difference in how it was written. But he waved off environmentalists' questions about Rove's involvement.

"I'm sure that his forwarding my letter to people that were in charge of it might have had some impression on them," Angelo said. "It seems to me that it was a totally proper thing to do. I can't see why anybody's upset about it, except of course that it was effective."

Asked why he wrote to Rove and not the Environmental Protection Agency or to some other official more directly associated with the matter, Angelo replied: "Karl and I have been close friends for 25 years. So, why wouldn't I write to him? He's the guy I know best in the administration."

DOJ_NMG_0033430

White House spokesmen said Monday that the rule was revised as part of the federal government's standard rule-making process. They said the EPA was simply directed by White House budget officials to make the rule comply with requirements laid out by Congress in a sweeping new energy law passed last year.

The issue has been a focus of lobbying by the oil and gas industry for years, ever since Clinton administration regulators first announced their intent to require special EPA permits for construction sites smaller than five acres, including oil and gas drilling sites, as a way to discourage water pollution.

Energy executives, who have long complained of being stifled by federal regulations limiting drilling and exploration, sought and received a delay in that permit requirement in 2003. Eventually, Congress granted a permanent exemption that was written into the 2005 energy legislation.

The EPA rule issued Monday adds fine print to that broad exception in ways that critics, including six members of the Senate, say exceeds what Congress intended.

For example, the new rule generally exempts sediment — pieces of dirt and other particles that can gum up otherwise clear streams — from regulations governing runoff that may flow from oil and gas production or construction sites.

Sen. James M. Jeffords (I-Vt.), who joined five Democrats in objecting to the rule, wrote in March that there was nothing in the energy law suggesting that such an exclusion of sediment "had even entered the mind of any member of Congress as it considered the Energy Policy Act of 2005." Moreover, Jeffords wrote, the rule violated the intentions of Congress when it passed the Clean Water Act 19 years ago.

White House and administration officials disagreed.

At the EPA, Assistant Administrator Benjamin H. Grumbles said the rule responded directly to congressional action. He cited a letter from Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, endorsing it. He added that the rule still allows states to regulate pollution, and that it continues to regulate sediment that contains "toxic" ingredients.

Lisa Miller, a spokeswoman for another senior lawmaker, Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Monday that the rule was designed to hold oil companies accountable for putting toxic substances in the soil, but not for dirt that results from storms.

"When it rains, storm water gets muddy, regardless of whether there's an oil well in the neighborhood," Miller said. "Congress told EPA to do this, and now they have. If there's oil in the water, a producer has to clean it up. If it's nature, they don't."

The change in the rule occurred last year when staffers in the White House Office of Management and Budget began editing an early version drafted by EPA technical staff. The Office of Management and Budget oversees another division, the Office of Information and Regulatory Policy, which critics complain has served as a central hub in the Bush White House for making government regulations more business-friendly.

A spokesman for the White House budget office, Scott Milburn, said Monday that the White House's involvement in making rules was intended to "ensure that agencies issue regulations that follow the law."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino rejected the suggestion that Rove was involved in the rule change. Rove frequently receives requests, she said, and that he tries to reply and direct those requests to the appropriate people. She said that for environmentalists to accuse Rove of manipulating the EPA rule was a "typical overreach" by administration critics.

"That is quite an overreach, when it was the United States Congress that passed the Energy Act in a bipartisan way to ask the EPA to undertake this rulemaking," she said.

In their March letter, Jeffords and his Democratic colleagues asked EPA officials whether the correspondence with Rove influenced the final rule.

A response written by Grumbles did not directly address the Rove question. But the Natural Resources Defense Council and other environmental groups assert that they know the answer.

"We can't say that Karl Rove walked over to OMB and demanded these changes," said Sharon Buccino, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council's land program. "But it is clear that there was direction coming from the top of the White House, and this was a result of the thinking of the White House as opposed to environmental experts at EPA."

Buccino called the rule "yet another example of the Bush administration rewarding their friends in the oil and gas industry at the expense of the environment and the public's health."

In his letter to Rove, Angelo did not hide his political feelings. He thanked Rove for "all you do," and added words of encouragement on another topic: "The president has the opposition on the run on the Iraq issue."

His letter appeared to gain notice at the highest levels of the administration. Three months after Angelo sent it, a top EPA official wrote to tell him that the agency had decided to impose the temporary delay on the construction permitting rule for oil and gas companies.

DOJ_NMG_0033431

The letter was copied to Rove, White House environmental advisor James L. Connaughton and then-EPA Administrator Christine Todd Whitman.

Dirk Kempthorne Arrives (NYT)

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Dirk Kempthorne's chief task as the new secretary of the interior is to resurrect his department's long tradition of responsible stewardship of the public lands. That guiding philosophy has been seriously breached only twice, during the dismal Reagan years and again during the tenure of Gale Norton, the person Mr. Kempthorne succeeds.

With Vice President Dick Cheney cheering from the sidelines, Ms. Norton replaced the department's conservation ethic with policies that favored commercial exploitation of the vast publicly owned resources the department manages, which amount to one-fifth of the nation's land. Redressing the balance will not only bring praise from the usual suspects in the environmental community, it will also win the admiration of many of Mr. Kempthorne's fellow Republicans.

Unless he has been sound asleep during his years as Idaho's governor, Mr. Kempthorne must surely know that the administration's headlong rush to drill for oil and gas throughout the Rocky Mountain West ignited rebellious feelings among legions of President Bush's natural constituents, including ranchers worried about the impact on their land and water, and hunters and anglers who feared the destruction of landscapes rich with wildlife.

Conservationists do not dispute the need to look for oil and gas. The question is where. Fully 85 percent of the oil and gas deposits on federal lands are already open for development, and over the last two years the Interior Department has granted more new leases than the industry knows what to do with. At issue, really, are scraps of land, places the Wilderness Society once called "too wild to drill." What's being asked for is a measured approach honoring the claims of nature generally and of these rare landscapes in particular.

Ms. Norton has left a bleak legacy in other places, as well. One is the national park system, which has taken a beating. In addition to chronic financial shortfalls, which have affected everything from policing the parks to interpreting them for visitors, the administration embarked on a disastrous effort to rewrite the management policies that govern the parks. Despite moderating changes, the rewrite still tilts in favor of recreation and commercial use over preservation. The new secretary would do everyone a favor — and give the National Park Service a huge morale boost — by setting it aside.

There's one more balance issue. As she was going out the door, Ms. Norton resolved a long and complicated dispute over who controls thousands of miles of ancient cowpaths and other trails throughout the West in favor of state and local interests. Many of these trails run through national parks, wildlife refuges and monuments, and as things stand now, there is little to prevent the states from paving them and using them to promote commerce. Mr. Kempthorne should revisit this decision. If he does not, Congress should revisit it for him.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four Face Drug Charges (HARTC)

By Peter Marteka, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, June 12, 2006

Two Of The Men Already On Parole

MANCHESTER -- A three-month police investigation has resulted in the arrests of four men on drug charges, including two who were on parole.

Members of the East Central Narcotics regional task force arrested the four men Thursday and Friday on arrest and search warrants. The program was part of Operation SNAG, also known as "spring-narcotics-arrest and grab," according to Manchester police Sgt. Sandy Ficara.

German Gortiz, 22, of 506 Burnside Ave., East Hartford, was arrested without incident in a McDonald's restaurant parking lot off Burnside Avenue in East Hartford. Officer Richard Boyle and his canine partner Marco found 1.5 ounces of crack cocaine and 20 bundles of heroin from inside Gortiz's car, police said.

Gortiz, who was on parole and wearing an electronic ankle bracelet at the time of his arrest, was charged with possession of heroin, possession of heroin with intent to sell, possession of cocaine and possession of cocaine with intent to sell over 1 ounce. Bail for Gortiz was set at $250,000.

Orlando Morales, 35, of 435 Burnside Avenue, Apt. 2, East Hartford, was arrested on warrants charging him with selling cocaine to an undercover officer in the area of East Hartford, Vernon and Manchester. Morales had 1.5 ounces of powder cocaine, $217 in cash and two counterfeit $100 bills at the time of his arrest, police said. Police also found marijuana, drug paraphernalia and a scale with cocaine residue in his apartment.

DOJ_NMG_0033432

Morales, who police said was on probation, was charged with possession of cocaine, possession of cocaine with intent to sell over 1 ounce, possession of marijuana, first-degree forgery, operating a drug factory and possession of drug paraphernalia. Morales was also charged in warrants with possession of cocaine and sale of cocaine. His bail was set at $400,000.

Brandon Rolax, 19, of 64 Elida Court, East Hartford - also on parole - was arrested on warrants charging him with the sale of crack cocaine to an undercover officer in Manchester, police said. Police apprehended Rolax as he fled from officers on West Middle Turnpike, along the way tossing 21 grams of crack cocaine on the street, police said.

Police charged Rolax with four counts each of possession of cocaine, sale of cocaine, possession of cocaine within 1,500 feet of a school and possession of cocaine with intent to sell within 1,500 feet of a school. His bail was set at $400,000.

During the operation, East Central Narcotics along with the assistance of federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested Daniel Cote on charges of illegally manufacturing steroids and selling them online.

Cote, 35, of 5 Ridgewood St., Manchester, was charged with possession of a controlled substance, possession of drug paraphernalia, possession with intent to sell and operating a drug factory. Police said officers found a large amount of drugs and equipment in Cote's home. His bail was $250,000.

All four will be arraigned in Superior Court in Manchester today.

Prescription Drugs Find Place In Teen Culture (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, June 13, 2006

When a teenager in Jan Sigerson's office mentioned a “pharm party” in February, Sigerson thought the youth was talking about a keg party out on a farm.

“Pharm,” it turned out, was short for pharmaceuticals, such as the powerful painkillers Vicodin and OxyContin. Sigerson, program director for Journeys, a teen drug treatment program in Omaha, soon learned that area youths were organizing parties to down fistfuls of prescription drugs. Since February, several more youths at Journeys have mentioned that they attended pharm parties, Sigerson says.

“When you start to see a pattern, you know it's becoming pretty widespread,” she says. “I expect it to get worse before it gets better.”

Drug counselors across the USA are beginning to hear about similar pill-popping parties, which are part of a rapidly developing underground culture that surrounds the rising abuse of prescription drugs by teens and young adults.

It's a culture with its own lingo: Bowls and baggies of random pills often are called “trail mix,” and on Internet chat sites, collecting pills from the family medicine cabinet is called “pharming.”

Carol Falkowski, director of research communications for the Hazelden Foundation, says young abusers of prescription drugs also have begun using the Internet to share “recipes” for getting high. Some websites are so simplistic, she says, that they refer to pills by color, rather than their brand names, content or potency.

That, Falkowski says, could help explain why emergency rooms are reporting that teens and young adults increasingly are showing up overdosed on bizarre and potentially lethal combinations of pills.

Overdoses of prescription and over-the-counter drugs accounted for about one-quarter of the 1.3 million drug-related emergency room admissions in 2004, the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration reported last month.

The abuse of prescription and over-the-counter drugs — which barely registered a blip in drug-use surveys a decade ago — is escalating at what Falkowski and other analysts say is an alarming rate.

In a 2005 survey by the Partnership for a Drug-Free America, 19% of U.S. teenagers — roughly 4.5 million youths — reported having taken prescription painkillers such as Vicodin or OxyContin or stimulants such as Ritalin or Adderall to get high.

Vicodin has been particularly popular in recent years; a study by the University of Michigan in 2005 found that nearly 10% of 12th-graders had used it in the previous year. About 5.5% said they had used OxyContin. Both drugs are now more popular among high school seniors than Ecstasy and cocaine.

Marijuana is still the most popular drug by far; about one-third of the 12th-graders surveyed said they had used it in the previous year.

Falkowski, whose foundation is a treatment center based in Center City, Minn., says prescription pills have become popular among youths because they are easy to get and represent a more socially acceptable way of getting high than taking street drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0033433

Some kids, she says, are self-medicating undiagnosed depression or anxiety, while others are using stimulants to try to get an edge on tests and studying.

Falkowski says prescription drugs are familiar mood-altering substances for a generation that grew up as prescriptions soared for Ritalin and other stimulants to treat maladies such as attention-deficit disorder. “Five million kids take prescription drugs every day for behavior disorders,” she says.

“It's not unusual for kids to share pills with their friends. There have been incidents where kids bring a Ziploc baggie full of pills to school and share them with other kids.”

Pharm parties, she says, are “simply everyone pooling whatever pills they have together and having a good time on a Saturday night. Kids … don't think about the consequences.”

Lisa Cappiello, 39, of Brooklyn, N.Y., says that seemed to be the case with her son, Eddie. She says she knew that he had tried marijuana at 15 and sneaked beers at school.

But it wasn't until after he graduated from high school and took a year off before college that Cappiello realized the extent of her son's drug use — and the hold prescription drugs had on him.

“In what seemed like the blink of an eye, it went from marijuana and an occasional beer to so much Xanax that (one day) my husband had to pick him up when he feel asleep on a street corner waiting for some friends,” she said. “He hid his drug use from me so well.”

The next day, Eddie Cappiello admitted to his parents that he had taken 15 pills of Xanax, a brand name for benzodiazepine that acts as a sedative. He told his parents Xanax helped him deal with anxiety and depression.

Eddie rejected professional help and vowed to stop taking pills, his mother says. He was clean for 10 months, she says, before he was hospitalized in July 2005 after overdosing.

Two months later, he entered a 28-day treatment program, his mother says. After he was discharged, he stayed clean for about two months — then relapsed into weekend binging: 40 to 50 pills and a quart of Jack Daniel's, sometimes by himself, sometimes with friends, Lisa Cappiello says.

Eddie Cappiello, 22, died in his bed on Feb. 17 after overdosing on a mix of pharmaceuticals. He left behind a girlfriend and two young children.

A toxicology report said he had 134 milligrams of Xanax — the equivalent of 67 pills — and an opioid derivative in his system, his mother says.

“Before four years ago, I never even heard the word Xanax,” Lisa Cappiello says. “Now … I know kids as young as 12 are using it. Then I found out that Vicodin was a very big party drug. Before school, after school, at parties. Kids mixed them with alcohol and Ecstasy. It was baffling to me.”

Cappiello says police, teachers and parents are so fixated on street drugs such as marijuana, cocaine and Ecstasy that they are missing the start of an epidemic.

“Eddie was not the first kid to die in this neighborhood from prescription drugs,” she says.

In recent months, federal anti-drug officials have acknowledged that they didn't anticipate the quick escalation of prescription-drug abuse. Most government-sponsored drug prevention programs focus on marijuana, tobacco, alcohol and methamphetamine.

“We were taken by surprise when we started to see a high instance of abuse of prescription drugs,” says Nora Volkow, director of the National Institute of Drug Abuse (NIDA), which is collecting information about how teens perceive, get and use prescription drugs so it can try to craft an effective prevention campaign.

In a bulletin last year, NIDA called the increase in pharmaceutical drug abuse among teens “disturbing” and said pharm parties were a “troubling trend.”

The increasing availability of prescription drugs is a big reason for the rise in their abuse, Volkow and other drug specialists say.

Pharmaceutical companies' production of two often-abused prescription drugs — hydrocodone and oxycodone, the active ingredients in drugs such as Vicodin and OxyContin — has risen dramatically as the drugs' popularity for legitimate uses has increased. Drug companies made 29 million doses of oxycodone in 2004, up from 15 million four years earlier. Hydrocodone doses rose from 14 million in 2000 to 24 million in 2004.

The 2005 Partnership survey found that more than three in five teens can easily get prescription painkillers from their parents' medicine cabinets. And as Falkowski says, the rising number of youths being treated with stimulants has made it easier for kids to use such drugs illicitly. About 3% of children are treated with a stimulant such as Adderall or Ritalin, up from less than 1% in 1987.

Almost all of the 13 youths at Phoenix House's intensive outpatient treatment program on New York City's Upper West Side have dabbled in prescription drugs, director Tessa Vining says.

"There's definitely easy access," she says. "Maybe a parent had some surgery and took one or two painkillers from a bottle of 10, and the rest are just hanging out in the medicine cabinet."

After her son died, Cappiello says she wondered how kids in her area were getting pills. She says she learned from police that one local dealer got Xanax from his mother, who had been given a prescription for the drug. Instead of taking the pills, she gave them to her son to sell for $2 to $3 each.

Paul Michaud, 18, of Boston, says he got his first taste of OxyContin pills — he calls them OCs — from a friend during his freshman year in high school.

Until then, Michaud says, he had smoked marijuana daily and taken a Percocet pill occasionally. Michaud's father had recently died of cancer, and Michaud says he was depressed and feeling like an outsider at school. The prescription painkiller made him feel like nothing could faze him, he recalls.

"The first time I did it, I was hooked," says Michaud, who is four months into a yearlong drug treatment program at Phoenix House in Springfield, Mass. He says he quickly became a daily OxyContin user, breaking apart the time-release capsules, crushing pills and snorting the powder from five 80-milligram pills a day.

"They're not very hard to get. I could find OCs easier than I could find pot," Michaud says. "There were plenty of people who sold them," including some dealers who got pills illicitly by mail order.

To try to reduce the supply of prescription drugs on the black market, authorities have shut down several "pill mills" — where doctors prescribe inordinate amounts of narcotics — as well as Internet pharmacies that ship drugs with little medical consultation, says Catherine Harnett, chief of demand reduction for the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Last September, DEA agents arrested 18 people allegedly responsible for 4,600 such pharmacies.

A tricky part of the prescription-drug problem, Harnett says, is addressing the perception among youths that pills are safe because they are "medicine." Many teens don't equate taking such pills with using drugs such as heroin or cocaine, she says.

"If you start with pills, it seems fairly sanitary and legitimate," she says. "Kids have been lulled into believing that good medicine can be used recreationally."

Two in five teens in the Partnership study said prescription medicines, even if they are not prescribed by a doctor, are "much safer" to use than illegal drugs.

Phil Bauer of York, Pa., believes his son, Mark, 18, an avid weight lifter, started using prescription drugs to relieve chronic back pain and didn't appreciate the potential risks of taking the drugs.

Bauer says his son never behaved as he imagined a drug addict would. "He wasn't hanging out all night. He had parents who wouldn't let him do that."

Mark Bauer died of an overdose on May 28, 2004. The toxicology report found morphine, oxycodone and acetaminophen — the active ingredient in Tylenol but also an ingredient in Vicodin — in his system, Phil Bauer says.

Before his son's death, "we didn't see a bleary-eyed guy. He wasn't slurring his words," the father says. "He seemed to have a lot to live for. I did not know prescription-drug abuse was a problem. There's so much guilt in that. I don't know if I stuck my head in the ground. I did not see this coming."

Michaud says he didn't equate his OxyContin addiction with hard-core drug abuse. "Where I come from, OC is a rich boys' drug," he says. "I thought, heroin abuse, that's pretty low. I'd never stick a needle in my arm."

However, Michaud says he eventually switched to heroin. "I sniffed it and a week later, I was shooting," he says. "I thought I wasn't like other people doing heroin. I wasn't that low. Come to figure out, it all leads to the same place."

The Ground War Against Meth (ADW)

By Wendy Melillo

Adweek, June 12, 2006

Methamphetamines have hit Tennessee hard. Incidents at labs where the drug is cooked using ingredients found at the nearest pharmacy reached 850 last year, including explosions and seizures, making the state the third highest in the country to experience the scourge, according to Drug Enforcement Administration figures.

When the Partnership for a Drug-Free America asked The Buntin Group, a small Nashville agency, to develop a pro-bono campaign to fight meth, shop officials there knew they needed more powerful weapons than just TV and print ads to reach the state's more rural areas. "We wanted to turn entire towns into messages about the effects of meth to rally the community against the drug," says agency president and ecd Jeffrey Buntin Jr. "Our [research] led us to realize the collateral damage meth does not just to the user, but to the air, the water, the school system, the real estate market and the police force. This stuff can do wholesale damage, if not shut down entire communities."

The elements the agency crafted, which will begin appearing in Tennessee communities in July, take a guerrilla-style, in-your-face, everyone-is-affected approach. Picture a shack in the middle of a school parking lot with a sign that says: "If you can read this, you're already dead. ... The total number of meth labs is unknown. What we do know is that they can be anywhere and often explode."

DOJ_NMG_0033435

There is an estimated $250,000 in donated media time and production costs for the campaign, according to the PDFA. The Buntin Group will place 210 displays around the state, including cardboard images of police officers in parks, with copy that reads: "This is a cardboard cutout of someone who could help you. But we have to spend millions on meth addicts and related damages. It's infecting you right now." And a spray-painted, graffiti-style mural will be placed on the side of a building where garbage is kept. The nose of the character in the picture is strategically placed near the real garbage on the ground so it looks like the trash is being snorted, one way users take meth.

The campaign's tagline, "Infected by meth," will appear along with a biohazard sign. The biohazard theme will be picked up in other displays that show how drinking water becomes polluted when meth cooks dump toxic waste on the ground. "Advertising works when the message is put in the place that is the most relevant to the product," says Buntin cd Pat Harris. "It was important for us to imagine ourselves in these communities and to put ourselves in their daily lives. How am I, at this point in time, being affected by meth whether I have anything to do with the drug or not?"

The campaign includes TV, print and radio ads by Buntin that show the effects of the drug. In one radio spot, a high truck driver plows through a restaurant. It's also part of a national anti-meth effort launched by the Partnership last November, with work from JWT New York and Leo Burnett Chicago. Meth is a growing problem, with nationwide treatment admissions rising 11 percent in 2004, according to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Mike Townsend, the Partnership's evp and director of meth demand reduction programs, says the drug is as addictive as crack cocaine and heroin, with typical users between 18 and 25. One in four teens report they have friends who use meth, one in five have been offered it and only half see a risk in trying it once or twice, according to Partnership data.

"The worrisome thing is we are now seeing meth creeping into the teen party scene the way ecstasy did," Townsend says. "Meth was once pigeonholed as a poor person's drug that teens wouldn't bother using, but now there are signs it is becoming more accepted."

Christine Rasmuson, the Partnership's deputy director of creative development, says her group had expected a more traditional out-of-home, billboard and bus-shelter type of campaign from the Nashville agency. "But when they came to us with their first round [of work], they blew the doors off the Creative Review Committee," Rasmuson says. "I never saw a CRC meeting where there were 30-plus creative ideas presented and the committee just kept saying, 'Great, keep going.' They came in with their Southern charm and wowed a group of mostly New York elite creative minds."

Ruth Wooden, president of New York-based public opinion research group Public Agenda and former Ad Council president, says it is very difficult to communicate the idea that there are serious consequences for communities when resources are diverted to problems caused by drugs. "This approach really makes the point quickly, and with huge impact," Wooden says. "It will definitely create a word-of-mouth buzz that will bring people to look right at it. I also imagine it will generate tons of free press in newspapers and other mainstream media. But mostly, it is a community message right in the middle of where people live—like getting a sermon right in church."

Baseball Suspends Grimsley For 50 Games (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Embattled pitcher Jason Grimsley was suspended 50 games by Major League Baseball on Monday, less than a week after federal agents raided his home during an investigation into performance-enhancing drugs.

Commissioner Bud Selig's office suspended Grimsley for violating baseball's Joint Drug Prevention and Treatment Program, based on his statements to authorities regarding human growth hormone.

"I think he earned it," Arizona Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick said. "I think it sends a message and an appropriate message."

"He violated the agreement. Obviously MLB feels that he did. That's Bud's decision and I think it's the right decision and I applaud him for it," he said.

The Diamondbacks released the reliever last Wednesday -- they don't intend to pay him, either -- and his agent said he did not expect Grimsley to pitch again. If Grimsley returns, the penalty would take effect when he's placed on a 40-man roster.

"Nothing's changed," agent Joe Bick said Monday.

Last Tuesday, 13 agents searched Grimsley's Arizona home following his admission he had used HGH, steroids and amphetamines.

According to court documents, authorities tracked a package containing two "kits" of HGH -- about a season's worth -- that was delivered at Grimsley's house on April 19. He failed a baseball drug test in 2003, documents showed.

DOJ_NMG_0033436

Acting on those documents, MLB suspended him for his alleged possession, admitted use and intended use of HGH. Baseball toughened its drug program and penalties this season, but there is no test for HGH.

"He's retired. It's a moot point," Detroit Tigers closer Todd Jones said. "He didn't test positive, but because he said he did, they're going to suspend him?

"It's kind of like giving a speeding ticket to a guy that got killed in a car wreck," he said.

The 38-year-old Grimsley was 1-2 with a 4.88 ERA in 19 games as a long reliever this season, his first with Arizona.

"The suspension will become effective only if Jason chooses to continue his playing career," said Michael Weiner, general counsel to the players union. "The association will confer with Jason as to whether, under the circumstances, he wishes to grieve the suspension."

Grimsley and the Diamondbacks are currently in a dispute over payment of the remainder of his $825,000 salary.

Grimsley asked for his release last week and Arizona granted it. At the time, Bick said there had been no negotiation about money and added, "Released players get paid."

But the team later said it did not intend to pay him the rest, and filed a notice of termination Monday.

"This guy did no less than steal from us," Kendrick said Saturday night.

Bick responded by saying Grimsley would contest the Diamondbacks' decision, and Weiner said the union would soon file a grievance.

"The Diamondbacks' release of Jason is a clear violation of the Basic Agreement," Weiner said.

AP Baseball Writer Ronald Blum and AP Sports Writers Bob Baum in Phoenix and Larry Lage in Detroit contributed to this report.

D'backs Issue No-tolerance Stand On Grimsley Flap (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale, Usa Today

USA Today, June 12, 2006

The Arizona Diamondbacks, infuriated and embarrassed by reliever Jason Grimsley's involvement with steroids and human growth hormone, vow to release any player caught using illegal performance-enhancing drugs in the future, Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick told USA TODAY.

"I don't think this should even be part of the collective bargaining agreement," Kendrick said Sunday by telephone. "This is something we all need to get our hands around. There's no limit as leaders to what we should do or where we should go. We want to make it clear that we do not condone or accept the kind of behavior Jason Grimsley has admittedly engaged in for a lot of years.

"We will not be rewarding bad behavior. I don't want anybody on our team involved in this. If they do, and we find out, we will act in the same way no matter whether it's a player with a three-year guaranteed contract with millions of dollars coming or anyone else."

"They will, in no way, play another game in an Arizona Diamondbacks uniform."

The Diamondbacks released Grimsley on Wednesday and informed his agent, Joe Bick, Friday he will be not be paid the remainder of his $825,000 contract. Kendrick, who said he plans to file termination papers today with Major League Baseball, contends Grimsley should forfeit the remaining $527,490 owed to him because he violated the terms of a standard player's contract. He was unfit to perform, Kendrick said, after Grimsley admitted to federal agents he used steroids, HGH and illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

"This guy's behavior was egregious," Kendrick said. "He's a representative of the culture of cheating. To financially reward him in the future for that is wrong."

Particularly unsettling, Kendrick said, was that Grimsley never informed the team he was being targeted as part of a probe into illegal drug use. According to court records, Grimsley told federal agents on April 19 — after being caught accepting $3,200 worth of HGH delivered to his home — that he has used illegal performance-enhancing drugs throughout his 11-year major league career. He also identified other major leaguers who used steroids, HGH and amphetamines. Federal agents raided his Scottsdale, Ariz., home for six hours on Tuesday. He never informed the Diamondbacks of the raid until the news broke during their game that night.

"Here's a guy who has known about this whole set of circumstances for six weeks," Kendrick said. "He spent the day with 13 federal agents. They broke his door down to get into his house. They told him that this was going to be made public. He still comes to the ballpark and still doesn't tell his agent, his manager or his teammates. We had no warning whatsoever. We all have to learn about this during the game from news reports.

"What kind of person is that? I think he was mentally impaired. He cheated us. He cheated his teammates."

DOJ_NMG_0033437

Meanwhile, former Sen. George Mitchell has requested an interview with San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds as part of their steroid investigation. Bonds' attorney, Michael Rains, told the New York Daily News that Bonds won't talk unless he can be assured his statements won't later be used against him in a federal perjury investigation.

In other news, Bonds' lawsuit against two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who published parts of his grand jury testimony in the best-selling book Game of Shadows was dismissed.

Meth Takes A Toll On Indian Reservations (AP)

AP, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Leah Fyten believes every family on her South Dakota reservation has been affected by methamphetamine use. The drug has torn apart these families, led to increases in crime and bumped mortality rates. And now, the director of the Flandreau Santee Sioux Housing Authority says, it's affecting the reservation's already desperate housing situation.

Housing is not only ruined by meth labs, which are highly poisonous and often difficult to spot, but also by the destructive habits that often accompany drug use. The housing authority on the Flandreau reservation has spent countless dollars fixing up holes in the walls, broken windows, ruined appliances and other damage wrought by the violent habits of drug users, Fyten said.

"We have a small budget that decreases every year and families are growing," she said. "Housing gets worse every year. And to try to repair houses that are damaged by alcohol and drug abuse puts a strain on your budget."

Last year, Fyten's reservation recruited Jay Barton to help alleviate the problem. Barton, an Oklahoma police officer who also works for the National American Indian Housing Council, is traveling around the country teaching Indian housing officials what the drug does and how to spot it. Fyten and others say the council's seminars are breaking through in communities that have so far ignored and denied the problem, helping reservations lessen meth's collateral damage.

Barton likes to say he is shocking his students out of complacency.

"The response has been tremendous," he said. "Especially with the funding cuts that tribes have received, this is really important."

Barton teaches his students all about the drug -- its effects, its origins, its market and its chemistry. He shows them pictures of users with their teeth rotting out and tells them about the drug's poisonous effect on children who come anywhere near it.

Statistics on Indian meth use are scarce, but an administration survey found in 2004 that almost 2 percent of the American Indian population was using meth. Robert McSwain, deputy director of the Indian Health Service, told a congressional panel earlier this month that the rate of Indians using meth appears to have dramatically increased in the past five years.

This poses a major problem for states and Indian reservations, Barton said, as some states have passed laws that essentially punish property owners for meth contamination. Some landlords -- including Indian housing authorities -- have been forced to pay for cleanup of meth labs, which can cost thousands of dollars.

In addition, few states have published standards for cleanup. Congress is pushing the Environmental Protection Agency to develop federal guidelines, as there is still some confusion about the effects of chemicals involved in producing the drug.

Because it is often up to the reservations to pick up the work and also the tab, and because most of these reservations have dramatic housing shortages, Barton said there is a critical need for education about meth.

Indian housing has been a problem for decades. According to a 2003 survey, an estimated 200,000 housing units are needed immediately in Indian country and approximately 90,000 Indian families are homeless or "under-housed."

"If we can make them aware of the costs and also the people that are abusing meth, then hopefully we can cut down on the costs," Barton said.

His seminars have led to at least one drug bust in Juneau, Alaska, where a maintenance worker who had attended a seminar identified a meth lab in his hotel.

Ron Peltier, director of the Turtle Mountain Housing Authority in North Dakota, said he hopes Barton, who gave a seminar there in early May, will be able to similarly help his reservation.

"We have a lot of workers who are unaware of how meth labs look, and we have a feeling that some of our units are being used," Peltier said. "We hear a lot of rumors. But when we go there, we don't know what to look for."

Joe Shirley Jr., president of the Navajo Nation in Arizona, says training people to spot the drug is paramount because meth is "cutting into the kinship we have as Navajo people."

"If you can't catch them there's no way to treat them," he said.

Despite their success, federal cuts to Indian programs have threatened Barton's seminars. He conducted about 50 last year, but he said fewer are scheduled in 2006 because of less federal money allocated for the National American Indian Housing Council, a quasi-government organization. After that, Barton said, organizers will have to come up with some sort of alternative.

DOJ_NMG_0033438

The meth problem in Indian country has shown few signs of slowing, however. At the congressional hearing earlier this year, McSwain said the situation could be described in a single word: "crisis."

"I think what we are seeing now is that if communities don't take action it's going to get a whole lot worse," said Fyten. "It's very sad and it's very scary. People have to wake up. There's a lot of people that don't understand meth and how to detect it."

^------

On the Net:

National American Indian Housing Council: http://naihc.net/

Indian Health Service: http://www.ihs.gov/

Suspected Militants Killed In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, June 12, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan (AP) -- Security forces raided a southern Afghan village and killed 15 suspected militants, including a relative of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, while fighting and attacks elsewhere left 25 people dead, an army general said Monday.

The violence extends three weeks of the fiercest battles since the Taliban's fall in 2001, and U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann said the insurgents are proving to be better organized and greater in numbers than expected.

Neumann predicted there would be no letup in the offensive against the Taliban when thousands of British, Canadian and Dutch troops deploy to the volatile south by next month to take over for U.S. troops.

"I think you will now see a very strong press-back," he told reporters in Kabul. "I think a lot of unfortunate people who believe the Taliban and fight with them are going to die."

Mullah Omar's brother-in-law, Mullah Amanullah, was killed along with 14 other insurgents in Siachave village, Uruzgan province, when troops stormed the area late Sunday after a tip from tribesmen, said Afghan army commander Gen. Rehmatullah Raufi.

Amanullah, whose body was recovered from the village, was the Taliban commander in the province's Dihrawud district and responsible for numerous rebel attacks, Raufi said.

It was not clear how close Amanullah was to Omar, who is believed hiding in mountains along Afghanistan's rugged border with Pakistan.

Coalition military spokesman Sgt. Chris Miller said the military was looking into the report that Amanullah had been killed.

Six other suspected militants were captured and several assault rifles and rocket launchers seized in the raid on the village, 50 miles north of Kandahar city, Raufi said.

Two Canadian soldiers were wounded Monday in a battle with the Taliban outside Kandahar, Canadian media reported. Canadian Press said the soldiers were in serious condition.

In a second raid early Monday, Afghan and coalition troops killed 12 suspected militants in southern Kandahar province's Saidan village, Raufi said.

The rebels were discovered hiding in a shop selling dried fruit, sparking a fierce gunbattle that followed a two-day operation tracking the insurgents.

Ten other militants were killed in neighboring Helmand province's Sangin district late Sunday in a battle involving Afghan and British forces, the Afghan general said. One British solider was killed and two were seriously wounded, Raufi said.

The British Defense Ministry reported the death Sunday and said British soldiers were on mobile patrol when the firefight broke out.

Two civilians were killed and six others wounded when a bomb hit their car as it was crossing a bridge in eastern Paktia province, said local police chief Abdulanan Raufi. It was not clear why they were targeted.

The surge in fighting has killed about 550 people, mostly militants, since mid-May. Neumann said the rebels have stepped up attacks to scare away NATO.

"They are making a major effort, believing wrongly that the European, Canadian forces will not have the will to fight," he said.

The new troops are part of a NATO force that is assuming responsibility for security in the south from the U.S.-led coalition. The number of foreign combat soldiers in the region will double once the transition is complete.

Neumann said he also believes some of the violence is being caused by drug barons inciting fighting in an effort to destabilize the region and undermine the government's U.S.-backed counternarcotics campaign.

Neumann said a campaign by President Hamid Karzai's administration to forcibly eradicate poppies prompted the drug lords to take action.

DOJ_NMG_0033439

"President Karzai led a very strong policy to have governors eradicate poppy and to tell people not to grow," the ambassador said. "There were efforts by drug dealers and terrorists together to prevent that. Now they are trying to use the violence to guard their wealth."

Afghanistan supplies nearly 90 percent of the world's opium and heroin, and some of the drug profits have long been believed to fund the Taliban.

Associated Press correspondent Daniel Cooney in Kabul contributed to this report.

US Says Drug Lords Fuel Afghan Insurgency (VOA)

Voice of America, June 12, 2006

US Ambassador to Afghanistan Ronald Neumann speaks to media during a press conference at his embassy in KabulU.S. officials in Afghanistan say the country's powerful drug cartels are fueling the region's violent insurgency, in order to protect their own illegal opium networks. The allegations come amid a sharp rise in insurgent attacks in recent weeks.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann told reporters that drug lords, mostly in Southern Afghanistan, hope the insurgency will effectively incapacitate Afghan President Hamid Karzai's counter-narcotics program.

"This year, President Karzai led a very strong policy to eradicate poppy. There were efforts by drug-dealers and terrorists together to prevent that," he said. "They did not prevent it, and, I think, now, they are trying to use the violence to guard their wealth."

The U.N. says roughly two-thirds of the world's opium supply is cultivated in Afghanistan.

The illegal harvest produces billions-of-dollars every year, most of which is controlled by a relatively small group of powerful drug barons.

The largest harvests are found in Southern Afghanistan in Helmand and Kandahar provinces, which are also the Taleban's traditional strongholds.

Violence throughout the region has surged in recent weeks, as Taleban militants stage a series of deadly anti-government attacks.

The insurgent offensive comes as NATO gets ready to take over security operations in Southern Afghanistan.

By the end of July, U.S. forces in the region will be replaced by NATO peacekeepers, primarily British, Dutch and Canadian troops.

Ambassador Neumann says the Taleban are apparently trying to intimidate the less experienced NATO troops, who are arriving in Afghanistan.

"This is being proved wrong, and I think that a lot of people who believe the Taleban fight with them are going to die, because these forces will fight very strongly," noted Neumann.

U.S. and NATO forces say they have already responded to the Taleban attacks with their own string of powerful counter-strikes.

In the past month, more than 500 people have been killed, most of them militants.

Afghan officials say local and U.S.-led coalition forces in Southern Afghanistan killed another 37 suspected insurgents, including a brother-in-law of the Taleban's fugitive leader Mullah Mohammad Omar.

Feds Run Trash Hauling In Largest-ever Conn. Business Takeover (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 13, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- After allegedly operating for years with the Mafia as its silent partner, southern Connecticut's largest garbage-hauling conglomerate started work this week backed by some new muscle: federal marshals.

In the largest federal business takeover in Connecticut history, authorities seized control Friday of 25 companies suspected of helping carve out mob-controlled garbage routes. Now marshals must lawfully run a business in an industry that prosecutors say has been dirty since the 1980s.

"We seize assets all the time, but running a business is something new for us here," said U.S. Marshal John Bardelli.

Marshals spent the weekend at the Danbury compound that's home to businessman James Galante's trash empire. With Galante in prison and locked out of his more than 60 business and personal bank accounts, authorities must keep the trucks running and avoid letting the garbage pile up.

"We had a couple calls this morning from residents that were a little anxious," Danbury Mayor Mark Boughton said. "But we haven't had any complaints. I was out this morning and trucks were driving around doing their pickups.

DOJ_NMG_0033440

Galante's companies serve about 20 southern Connecticut and eastern New York towns. His transfer station handles about 80 percent of the region's garbage and his pickup businesses are among the most dominant in the area.

Federal prosecutors say the Genovese crime family ensured that dominance in exchange for quarterly payments of $30,000.

The companies are required by a court order to maintain their service. The marshals are there to ensure that happens, institute new accounting standards and sign off on every financial transaction the companies make.

Leonard Briskman, who supervises these types of business operations for the U.S. Marshals Service, said marshals prepare for months before leading up to an indictment, researching companies and industries. Briskman's teams have seized control of casinos, horse farms, supermarkets, gas stations and, now, trash companies.

"In many cases, the businesses end up more efficient," he said. "There's a second set of eyes and many of the illegal activities have stopped, so more cash is being retained."

Cheryl D. Reedy, director of the Housatonic Resources Recovery Authority, the public agency that oversees trash pickup in the region, said she plans to meet with federal authorities this week to find out how things are working.

"Garbage and recyclables need to keep moving through that place and payments need to keep moving," she said.

It's a daunting task, Bardelli said, one that marshals are still trying to grasp. Experienced officials arrived from Washington last week to oversee the takeover and, in the coming weeks, a management company likely will be hired to run operations in the year or more until trial.

"If everything goes according to plan, the customer will not notice any difference," Bardelli said.

Bomb Suspect's Shirt Does The Talking (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

The Prince George's man charged with building a pipe bomb he allegedly wanted to use to attack a Greenbelt abortion clinic appeared in federal court yesterday wearing an antiabortion T-shirt.

On the front of Robert Weiler Jr.'s green shirt were the words "Help Cure Abortion." On the back was "ABORTION: The leading cause of death in America," as well as writing that said abortion claims 1,200,000 lives annually.

Weiler, 25, said little during his initial court appearance in Greenbelt before U.S. Magistrate Judge Charles B. Day. Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman asked Day to order Weiler to remain in custody, saying the serious charges against him make him a flight risk.

Weiler did not enter a plea, and his attorney, Assistant Public Defender Michael Citara Manis, said Weiler waived his right to a detention hearing. Day scheduled a preliminary hearing for June 22, and until then Weiler will remain in custody.

Weiler is charged with four federal offenses, including possession of an unregistered destructive device and possession of a stolen firearm. Each carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

He was taken into custody at a rest stop in Western Maryland early Thursday. By dawn that day, the bomb he had allegedly built and stored at a friend's home in the Riverdale Heights area had been partially detonated by bomb squad technicians.

Weiler's father, Robert F. Weiler Sr., told The Washington Post on Friday that he and his wife turned his son in to authorities. He said that although he opposes abortion, he felt he had no choice but to turn in his son.

In the interview, he said he and his wife, Catherine, contacted Prince George's police June 4 to report their suspicions.

According to a sworn affidavit signed by two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the younger Weiler admitted planning to attack the clinic and said he intended to "shoot doctors who provided abortions." A loaded gun was found in the glove box of his car when he was arrested, the affidavit says.

IMMIGRATION:

House Republicans Hit Senate Immigration Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The Senate's immigration-reform bill grants broad amnesty to illegal aliens and is even worse than previously thought, say House Republicans who have read the 850-page Senate bill and must approve any final legislation that Congress sends President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0033441

"The more people see of this Senate bill, the less they like it," House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, said of the bill that was largely penned by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and John McCain, Arizona Republican.

Allowing illegals to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal work, for instance, is "outrageous," said Mr. Sensenbrenner.

But few provisions of the Senate bill have caused more head-scratching among opponents than a last-minute amendment that requires the U.S. to consult with Mexican officials before commencement of any fence construction along the border.

"I don't know what they were thinking on that one," Mr. Sensenbrenner said.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, said he met last week with a group of hotel executives from Marriott International Inc. who favor increased immigration to bring them more cheap labor to work as hotel maids. He told them about the consultation requirement.

"People in the front of the room were saying, 'No. No. That's not possible,' " he recounted. "Really," he told them. "I'm not making this up."

The provision was inserted in the bill moments before it was voted on at the behest of Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat. It says soliciting views "of affected communities lessen tensions and foster greater understanding."

"It is simply common sense and common courtesy to consult those individuals in our own communities and in affected communities on the other side of the border before constructing a fence," Mr. Dodd said.

The consultation amendment, he said, would "foster the kind of cooperation that is vital if we are going to once and for all secure our borders."

But, Mr. Sensenbrenner said, there are far more serious problems with the Senate bill.

For instance, the bill allows for the discounted in-state tuition rates at state colleges and universities for illegal aliens who reside in those states. Meanwhile, legal immigrants and citizens who reside outside that state must still pay the full price.

And while proponents of the bill cringe whenever people say it grants "amnesty" to illegal aliens, they don't dispute that the bill grants complete amnesty to employers who have illegally hired the millions of aliens and provided the magnet that drew them here in the first place.

And while aliens will be fined $2,000 before obtaining citizenship, opponents say it's hardly comparable punishment for the array of crimes the illegals have committed while working here. In addition to sneaking across the border, many have counterfeited documentation, committed Social Security fraud and cheated on taxes.

"An American who commits Social Security fraud ends up going to jail. An American who fails to pay taxes for two years ends up in the federal penitentiary," Mr. Sensenbrenner said. "An illegal alien who does this gets citizenship."

Mr. Tancredo said he is amazed at how little senators know about illegal entry, considering the importance Americans give it.

"They'll just trust Ted Kennedy to put this thing together for them," Mr. Tancredo said.

The president's prime-time speech last month essentially endorsing the Senate plan and arguing that it does not amount to "amnesty" caused Mr. Tancredo to do a double take.

"It's all so Clintonesque. It was horrible," he said, referring to former President Bill Clinton's penchant for parsing words. "I was listening to President Bush speak on the border, and I'm thinking to myself, 'I'm listening to Bill Clinton reworking every word, reworking every definition.' "

Immigration Takes Center Stage In Colorado (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, June 13, 2006

DENVER — When 75,000 people marched on the Colorado Capitol six weeks ago for immigrant rights, it showed how big the issue of immigration is in this non-border state.

Some of the state's politicians are leading the drive for immigration changes nationwide. And the state had been planning a showdown over a ballot initiative to prohibit illegal immigrants from receiving some government services.

But the Colorado Supreme Court on Monday rejected the controversial measure, ruling 5-2 that it violates a constitutional requirement that initiatives deal with just one subject.

Even without the measure on the November ballot, Colorado voters are likely to remain at the center of the USA's boisterous immigration debate. The contentious issue could be a factor in competitive elections here for governor, Congress and control of the Legislature.

“It's an issue that kind of exploded here,” says Katy Atkinson, a Republican consultant in Denver. “This will still be an issue, especially in federal races and the governor's race.”

DOJ_NMG_0033442

Dick Lamm, a former three-term governor who was helping lead the group pushing the initiative, Defend Colorado Now, called the ruling "outrageous judicial activism." He conceded that the chances of resurrecting the measure this year "are dim."

Federico Pea, a former Denver mayor who chairs the group opposing the measure, Keep Colorado Safe, hailed the ruling as "a victory for all of Colorado." Pea, who was a Cabinet secretary in the Clinton administration, said Hispanics in Colorado "feel under attack."

Hispanic influence in Colorado is longstanding, dating to land grants issued by Spain, when it controlled southern Colorado as part of its New Mexico Territory. The land-grant system was continued by Mexico after it won independence from Spain in 1821. Land grants fostered early immigration from Mexico, particularly in southern Colorado's San Luis Valley.

Today, immigration is a major issue here for several reasons:

·The state's Hispanic population is growing — up to 19% in 2004 from 5.8% in 1980, according to the Census. Colorado has been a magnet because of economic opportunity and "a very strong multi-generational Hispanic base," Pea said.

·Two national leaders in the drive to crack down on illegal immigration hail from Colorado: U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Republican and a high-profile spokesman for tougher measures, and Lamm, co-director of a public policy institute at the University of Denver who has long argued that illegal immigration depresses U.S. wages.

·A history of tension includes a 2002 ballot effort to end bilingual education and the 2005 murder of a Denver police officer, allegedly by an illegal immigrant from Mexico who will stand trial in September.

The ballot measure would have limited the "provision of non-emergency services" by state and local governments to U.S. citizens and immigrants lawfully residing here. It would not apply to federally mandated services such as public education and emergency medical care, or major state services such as welfare and food stamps that illegal immigrants already cannot receive.

Democratic political consultant Rick Ridder says that even without the ballot measure, "immigration will still be an issue. Whether or not it is front and center is yet to be seen."

In November, Colorado voters decide who will replace Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who can't run again because of term limits. Also at stake is whether Democrats keep control of the Legislature, which they captured in 2004 for the first time in 40 years. There's an open U.S. House seat now held by Rep. Bob Beauprez, a Republican who is running for governor.

Democratic candidate for governor Bill Ritter, a former Denver district attorney, opposed the ballot initiative, calling it a "symbolic" response to a problem that can only be solved in Washington. Beauprez, his most likely opponent in the November election, favored it. Beauprez also voted for the tough House bill passed in December that would make illegal immigration a felony and emphasizes border security.

Eric Sondermann, a Denver political analyst who is non-partisan, says immigration "poses tricky dynamics to both candidates, but is a slightly greater challenge to Ritter." Blue-collar Democrats could defect to the GOP if they perceive Beauprez as tougher on immigration, he said.

Ritter predicts many voters will see immigration as a federal issue with no connection to state races.

Nonetheless, he says, "it will be part of the conversation" and could pose problems for all Republican candidates.

The death of the ballot initiative should lead to a more decorous debate on immigration, says political consultant Manolo Gonzalez-Estay, lead plaintiff in the suit decided by Monday. "Now we can have an educated, rational discussion about how we find real solutions," he says.

TAX:

Nevada Man Gets 54 Months For Trust Scheme (WEBCPA)

WebCPA.com, June 13, 2006

Washington (June 12, 2006) - More than 2,000 false income and trust tax returns later, a Nevada man has been sentenced to four-and-a-half years in prison.

R. Scot Stokes, of Henderson, Nev., was sentenced to 54 months for conspiring to defraud the United States and conspiring to commit mail and wire fraud, in connection with the promotion of a tax and investment fraud scheme, the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service announced.

Stokes will serve three years of supervised release upon the completion of jail time.

In February 2005, he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and admitted that the filing of false returns had resulted in a loss of federal tax revenue between $7 million and $10 million. Piled on to that admission, Stokes said that he participated in fraudulent investment schemes that caused customers to lose between $2.5 million and $5 million.

He is one of 11 individuals who have pleaded guilty in this case, including four attorneys and one CPA.

DOJ_NMG_0033443

According to papers filed with the court, Stokes admitted that between 1994 and 2004, he and his conspirators -- under the business names Advanta Strategies, World Contractual Services and CornerStone West -- marketed and sold a fraudulent trust scheme to over 300 clients through domestic and offshore seminars, promotional material and opinion letters.

Estate-Tax Repeal Would Hurt The 'Small Rich' (WP)

By Allan Sloan

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

When the Senate turned down President Bush's bid to repeal the estate tax permanently last week, it actually did a favor for tens of thousands of moderately well-off households -- the "small rich," if you prefer. That's because such households would be worse off under the full repeal scheduled for 2010 (which Bush wants to make permanent) than they would be under the 2009 rules, which are more favorable for estates than today's rules. According to a study by Congress's nonpartisan Joint Committee on Taxation, 7,500 estates would be better off under full repeal in 2010 than under the 2009 rules -- but more than 60,000 would be worse off.

This isn't exactly what you heard during last week's debate, is it? How on earth could the beneficiary of any estate be better off under the 2009 rules than under the 2010 version of permanent repeal? The answer gets a little complicated -- but please bear with me. It has to do with the difference between so-called stepped-up tax basis and carry-over tax basis.

Under current law, when you die your heirs get stepped-up tax basis. That means the assets you bequeath are valued for income-tax purposes at what they were worth the day you died -- not what you originally paid for them. Say you paid $50,000 for stock that's worth $500,000 when you die. Your heirs can sell it for $500,000 and owe no tax on the $450,000 gain. As long as your total estate doesn't exceed the exemption limits, there's no estate tax, either.

Now watch. Under the 2009 rules, estates of up to $3.5 million ($7 million for a married couple) would be exempt from federal estate tax. The tax rate on assets above that level would be 45 percent. Inheritors would be able to step up the basis of $3.5 million (or $7 million) of inherited assets to their value the day they inherit them. Fast-forward to 2010, when the estate tax is repealed. Yes, the estate tax would be gone. But heirs would be able to step up only $1.3 million in assets to their value on the day of death. (Don't ask why; that's just how it is.)

Assets beyond $1.3 million would be valued for tax purposes at carry-over basis -- their cost (for income-tax purposes) for the person who died. So any estate with $1.3 million to $3.5 million in assets ($2.6 million to $7 million for a married couple) is worse off under full repeal in 2010 than it would be in 2009. Inheritors in the $1.3 million-to-$3.5 million range would face higher taxes if they sold inherited assets than they would under the 2009 rules. At the very least, they would have complicated paperwork to deal with. They'd be much better off inheriting in 2009 than in 2010. But if you're dealing with an estate of $3.5 billion rather than $3.5 million, you'd be far better off inheriting in 2010.

How many estates are we talking about? To answer that, let's consult the aforementioned study by the Joint Committee on Taxation. The study, requested by John Buckley, chief Democratic tax counsel for the House Ways and Means Committee, projects that 7,500 people who die in 2009 will have an estate-tax liability -- remember, that's estates of more than $3.5 million. The study also projects that 71,400 people will leave estates of $1.3 million or more. This means that 63,900 people -- 71,400 less 7,500 -- will leave estates of $1.3 million to $3.5 million. As I've shown, such estates are better off in 2009 than in 2010. "There are lots more losers than winners under full repeal compared to the 2009 rules," says Buckley, who used the study for a 2005 paper in Tax Notes, a professional journal. Yes, Buckley's a partisan. But it doesn't make him wrong -- the numbers are the numbers.

Under current law, the estate-tax exemption drops to $1 million in 2011. (The Bushies built that into their 2001 tax cut to make its total cost seem more reasonable.) This would subject broad swaths of the middle and upper-middle classes to the estate tax -- which is one reason the "eliminate the death tax" crowd got so much political traction in the first place. The original idea of an estate tax was to assess a handful of very rich people to avoid excessive concentrations of wealth while helping to finance the system that made that wealth possible.

It seems to me that adopting the 2009 rules, indexing the exemption for inflation and allowing stepped-up basis would get us back to the original intent of the estate tax. Taxing 7,500 estates a year doesn't seem unfair. And it would generate significant revenue.

What we shouldn't do is benefit a handful of very rich people by eliminating the estate tax 2010-style at the expense of the small rich and everyone else. We've already made a major mistake by allowing the alternative minimum tax, originally designed to make sure that tax-dodging rich people paid at least something to the IRS, to hit the middle and upper-middle classes but not the truly wealthy. Let's try not to make that same mistake with the estate tax.

Sloan is Newsweek's Wall Street editor. His e-mail address issloan@panix.com.

DOJ_NMG_0033444

The Everything Commission (WP)

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

THE POLITICAL system is proving itself incapable of addressing hard budgetary questions even as the time to act grows shorter. President Bush tried -- and failed -- on Social Security, the easiest of the three big entitlement programs to "fix." His efforts on tax reform fizzled -- though less spectacularly, since the president never put his energy into the issue in the first place. Congress had such a hard time agreeing on small cuts in Medicare and Medicaid last year that it abandoned any pretense of trying again this time around. And Mr. Bush's proposal for a bipartisan commission to examine the costly health-care programs has foundered as Democrats balked at signing up for any examination that put taxes off the table.

Into this standoff comes Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) with a proposal for a base-closure-style commission to beat all commissions. It would look at the tax code and the array of entitlement programs and produce a set of recommendations, decided by a two-thirds vote, to put them on a fiscally sustainable course. Its 15 members would be appointed by the president (three members) and the congressional leadership (three each for the House and Senate majority and minority leaders). Its recommendations would come before Congress for an up-or-down vote, although the president or either chamber's budget committee would also be able to submit alternatives.

Mr. Wolf's proposal is laudable in some ways, disturbing in others. The congressman, who supported all of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, deserves credit for being explicitly willing to put tax increases on the table. New revenue is a necessary part of any solution, a reality Mr. Bush and his fellow tax-cutters have been unwilling to acknowledge. As Mr. Wolf said in announcing his plan last week, "Given the enormity of the challenge, the commission needs to be able to look at every component of our fiscal policy to fairly assess where we stand and how we can best move toward a sound fiscal future."

Mr. Wolf's big-picture approach also has much to recommend it. These issues are complex on their own but they are also interrelated, with trade-offs to be made that can't be addressed if each program is considered individually. Chipping away problem by problem might be easier -- though even that approach has proved all but impossible -- but it would avoid an urgently needed discussion of national priorities.

What gives us pause is the acknowledgment, implicit in Mr. Wolf's base-closing-commission approach, that the political system is so broken it must outsource these fundamental policy questions. Perhaps that is true; certainly, the evidence supports this gloomy assessment. But rewriting the tax code, restructuring Social Security and reshaping government-paid health care are not parochial matters like military bases that call for a special process to overcome elected officials' geographic and political self-interest. They are the bedrock questions of government and the job of elected officials, who should look at Mr. Wolf's proposal and feel embarrassed that it has come to this.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Necessary Spending Or Political Trap? (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Both sides of the Capitol will be ringing with debate on the war in Iraq this week, first on its cost, then on its course -- with a healthy dose of election-year politics mixed in.

The House is expected to approve a record-breaking $94.5 billion emergency spending bill today to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Gulf Coast hurricane relief, border security and avian flu preparation. With Senate passage expected later in the week, the bill would push the cost of the Iraq war to nearly $320 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service. Military and diplomatic costs in Iraq this fiscal year will have reached $101.8 billion, up from $87.3 billion in 2005, $77.3 billion in 2004 and $51 billion in 2003, the year of the invasion, congressional analysts said.

The House will act first on the emergency measure, with final passage scheduled for today. Nearly $66 billion would go to the Pentagon to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and an additional $4 billion would be spent on foreign assistance, including $66 million to promote democracy in neighboring Iran.

Congress delivered the dollar total that President Bush had requested in war funding. But lawmakers made several key changes, including adding $725 million to ensure that Army tracked combat vehicles such as Abrams tanks are upgraded and available to National Guard units. They also added $480 million for newer Humvees, for a total investment of $890 million, to replace retrofitted models.

The bill also would provide $2 billion to develop countermeasures to the makeshift bombs that kill many U.S. troops. But the measure knocked down Bush's request for training funds, providing $4.85 billion to prepare Iraqi and Afghan troops -- about $1 billion less than what Bush had sought.

DOJ_NMG_0033445

The package also includes nearly $20 billion to help the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other local, state and federal entities continue disaster recovery and relief efforts in Louisiana and Mississippi. And Congress tucked in numerous unrelated items, including $500 million in agricultural assistance; $2.3 billion to prepare for an avian flu outbreak; and $1.9 billion to bolster security along the U.S. border, including by hiring 1,000 more border agents and adding 4,000 detention beds.

The cost of the war may be escalating, but don't expect many lawmakers to stand against a measure to fund military operations.

The real debates will begin after the spending bill is on its way to Bush. On Thursday, the House will get to a long-delayed day of discussions on Iraq and the fight against terrorism, taking up a resolution to urge "continued resolve by the United States as it moves forward toward achievement of" stability in Iraq.

The Senate, as it considers its annual defense policy bill, will be having a similar discussion, thanks to an amendment by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) calling for Bush to reach agreement with Iraq on a schedule for troop withdrawals this year.

The House debate has been brewing for months, pushed in part by a bipartisan petition to devote the House floor to a resolution requiring Bush to develop and implement a withdrawal plan. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) announced this spring that he would schedule a daylong debate on the war, but the timing is proving fortuitous: With the death of al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Republican leaders think momentum is on their side.

To help spur the outcome GOP leaders want, the resolution was drafted to put the Iraq conflict firmly within the larger fight against terrorism, a war few politicians could oppose.

"The war on Iraq is a critical element in the broader war on terror," Boehner said last week. "There is a fundamental question here that I hope becomes the issue of this debate, and that is: What do we do about terrorists?"

Such pronouncements have made Democrats -- and some Republicans -- leery of a political trap. Five House Republicans -- Howard Coble (N.C.), Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.), Walter B. Jones Jr. (N.C.), Jim Leach (Iowa) and Ron Paul (Tex.) -- have broken with their leaders and signed on to a petition by Democrats to debate a withdrawal plan. Jones said the group will meet today to discuss whether Thursday's session is the open and honest debate they called for or another political stunt. If it is the latter, they probably will denounce it tomorrow, then decline to participate.

"If this is just to say we support winning the war on terror, we all support that. That's a political statement, not a policy statement," said Jones, who garnered headlines in the run-up to the war, when he renamed the french fries on the House dining room menu "freedom fries."

"I would hope those who are making these decisions are smarter than that," he added. "The American people have the right, and we have the duty, to have an open and honest debate."

Dealt A Difficult Hand, Trade Official Presses On (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Tuesday, June 13, 2006; Yesterday was Susan C. Schwab's first full day as U.S. trade representative, and she promptly made it clear that she views her appointment in much different terms than Washington's chattering classes.

Yes, she knows that pundits have dismissed her as something of a caretaker because of the way President Bush nominated her in April to replace Rob Portman, who was named White House budget director. Yes, she recognizes that because the job shuffle came as global trade talks are in serious trouble, with a major deadline looming, her promotion to Portman's post has deepened skepticism that the talks will lead to a dramatic revision in international trade rules.

But the truth, Schwab said in an interview, is that she has been charged with aggressively advancing Bush's trade agenda. "The fact that the president chose to announce my nomination the same day as Ambassador Portman's was announced was evidence that the president wanted to send a message -- that he wanted a seamless transition and continued high priority on trade," she said.

To underscore the point, she emphasized that she plans to stick resolutely to the position Portman staked out in the global talks, which are known as the Doha round for the Qatari capital where they were launched at a World Trade Organization meeting in 2001. The administration is eager for an agreement that would sharply lower trade barriers among the WTO's 149 member countries, especially in farm products, and is not interested in a watered-down compromise of the sort some countries are pushing, Schwab said. And, though the United States hopes to avoid a collapse in the negotiations, it will not strike a deal that stops short of opening major new export opportunities for nations around the world, she added, declaring that a weak accord "wastes a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

The comments were delivered in the pleasant but steely tone Schwab has honed over nearly three decades in the trade field, most recently as one of Portman's deputies but, before that, as a Senate staffer, top Commerce Department official, academic specialist and business executive. The Senate confirmed her Thursday night, and she was sworn in Friday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0033446

"I'll match credentials with anybody," she said, betraying a trace of irritation at the naysaying about her selection.

Schwab's training in dealing with foreigners came early -- as the daughter of a foreign service officer, moving with her parents to Togo, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Tunisia and Thailand and spending 14 of her first 18 years abroad before attending college in the United States.

"When you're a foreign service brat, you grow up feeling that your job is to represent the United States of America, even if you're a 5- or 6-year-old kindergartner in Lome, Togo, even if you're the only American kid in the local American school -- which I was," she said. "We were in Togo during independence; we used to go out and sing the French national anthem, until one day we were singing the Togolese national anthem. I needed to show my fellow classmates that I could sing the American national anthem."

She started as an economist at the trade representative's office in the mid-1970s, trying to open the Japanese market for U.S. beef and citrus products, and also worked on trade issues at the U.S. Embassy in Tokyo. Her influence soared in the 1980s when she moved to Capitol Hill, where she joined the staff of John C. Danforth, then a senator from Missouri and the chairman of the Finance Committee's international trade subcommittee, and became a powerful shaper of U.S. trade policy as a key drafter of landmark trade legislation in 1984 and 1988. A profile published in The Washington Post in 1987 noted that her critics viewed her as a "closet protectionist" for her get-tough stance on foreign trading practices, but her admirers called her a "hard-nosed pragmatist, well versed in arcane trade economics, and a dazzling strategist and negotiator."

Schwab served as assistant secretary of commerce during President George H.W. Bush's administration, heading a department unit that promotes U.S. exports from embassies and consulates around the world. After a stint at Motorola Inc., she got her PhD and became dean of the University of Maryland School of Public Policy. Late last year, she was named one of Portman's deputies, with ambassadorial rank and responsibility for issues including U.S. relations with Europe and the Americas as well as the WTO.

The big question is whether all this experience will help her forge a meaningful agreement in the Doha talks, which are ostensibly aimed at making rules governing WTO members much more beneficial to developing countries.

An enormous gap separates the United States from the European Union on the politically sensitive issue of farm trade. Washington argues that the only way to help poor, largely agrarian countries is to slash agricultural tariffs, so it has proposed to cut them by about two-thirds while leaving only a handful of "sensitive" products exempt from such cuts. The Europeans, whose farmers are accustomed to extensive government protection, have offered cuts of less than 40 percent and insist on keeping many more sensitive products sheltered from foreign competition. An alliance of developing countries is in between the two points of view, though closer to the U.S. position.

Late this month, Schwab will go to WTO headquarters in Geneva for a meeting that has been billed as make-or-break for the Doha round, with the aim of crafting the broad outlines of a pact. Failure at that meeting could doom the round because Bush's congressional authority to negotiate new trade deals expires in July 2007, leaving little time for the extensive drafting required before an agreement can be submitted to Capitol Hill for approval.

Schwab said that because of her duties as deputy trade representative, she knows the ministers from other WTO countries and has been interacting with them. But, she acknowledged, "the disheartening thing is that there are a number of countries that think some minimalist outcome is going to be satisfactory. But that is not an outcome that will be satisfactory to the United States."

Bush Is Told To Defend Bloch's Back (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 13, 2006

A group of prominent conservatives have signed a letter to President Bush aimed at calling off an investigation of Scott Bloch, the administration official tasked with protecting the rights of federal workers.

Clay Johnson III, the deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), ordered the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) to investigate Bloch in response to a complaint filed last year by several anonymous career employees at the Office of Special Counsel, which Bloch heads. Johnson attended Yale University with Bush and is one of his oldest friends.

Several conservatives behind the letter to Bush say that administration officials are trying to pressure Bloch to resign his post because he doesn't believe that sexual orientation should be considered akin to race and religion as a class of civil-rights protection and this view has sparked controversy within his office and Congress.

The potential dispute between social-conservative leaders and the Bush administration comes at a time when GOP strategists are trying to boost support among the conservative wing of the party in preparation for the midterm election. Political observers viewed last week's Senate vote on a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage as a direct appeal to Republicans' conservative base.

DOJ_NMG_0033447

Twenty-four conservative leaders signed the letter to Bush, which is dated June 9, including Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, one of the nation's largest Christian conservative advocacy groups; Paul Weyrich, a founding father of the modern conservative movement and chairman of Coalitions for America; Jim Backlin, vice president of legislative affairs for the Christian Coalition; and the Rev. Louis Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, according to a copy obtained by The Hill.

After Bloch took office in January 2004, he reversed his Democratic-appointed predecessor's interpretation of the statute that governs federal employment. Bloch favored an interpretation of the policy that made it more difficult for gay employees to allege discrimination, said Elaine Kaplan, Bloch's predecessor, who served in the position from 1998 to 2003.

Bloch set off a firestorm by removing statements regarding job discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation from the Office of Special Counsel's website.

"The special counsel looks forward to having his name cleared and we are looking forward to an expedited conclusion to the investigation," said Loren Smith, the director of congressional and public affairs at the Office of Special Counsel. In response to Kaplan's statement defending her interpretation of statute, Smith said that the office "honors the law as written."

Several Office of Special Counsel employees later filed a complaint against Bloch after he tried to transfer them to a new field office in Detroit. The employees said they were being retaliated against for leaking information to the press about Bloch's handling of the sexual-orientation policy, one source who was granted anonymity said.

Johnson said that he had yet to receive a copy of the conservatives' letter but insisted that the investigation is justified.

"What we can tell you is that the employees of the Office of Special Counsel have made serious allegations that merit an impartial investigation," he said. "Ordinarily these kinds of complaints would be investigated by the Office of Special Counsel. Clearly, in this case, that does not make sense. That's why an investigation of these matters has been undertaken by the inspector general for the Office of Personnel Management, at my request."

Gay-rights advocates criticized the conservatives' letter.

Brad Luna, spokesman for the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay-rights organization, said it would be disgraceful if the OPM investigation were called off. Luna called Bloch a renegade employee who must be reined in.

Some conservatives say that the administration is putting pressure on Bloch because he has stirred up controversy over the discrimination policy. Kaplan, Bloch's Clinton-appointed predecessor, who served during the first few years of the Bush administration, said that Bush supports the interpretation that sexual orientation could serve as the basis of alleged discrimination.

Bloch's rejection of that interpretation has attracted the attention of several critics in Congress. In the wake of the controversy that greeted the beginning of Bloch's five-year term, the House Government Reform Committee passed a bill in November stating that Congress repudiates any assertion that federal employees are not protected from discrimination based on sexual orientation. Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) also wrote a series of letters to the administration about Bloch.

In their letter to Bush, conservative leaders defended Bloch and asked Bush to intervene. They argued that Bloch has been unfairly targeted for removing Clinton-era policy that "with no regard to congressionally approved statutes" added sexual orientation to the list of protected classes of race, color, religion, sex and national origin.

"For this act of faithfully upholding the rule of law, Mr. Bloch has been and continues to be attacked personally and professionally by activist groups and certain Members of Congress," the leaders wrote. "Mr. Bloch's compliance with the law has drawn harsh criticism from your political opponents and resulted in retaliatory investigations, including the ongoing investigation by the Inspector General of the Office of Personnel Management."

The conservatives concluded their letter by asking Bush to come to Bloch's defense. "Now that Mr. Bloch has come under attack for complying with Administration policy and upholding federal law, we ask that you take action to protect Scott Bloch from further harassment so that he might continue to faithfully serve you and the American public," they wrote.

One person familiar with the events that spurred the conservatives to draft the letter said that the OPM investigation has picked up in intensity in recent weeks.

When Josh Bolten took over as White House chief of staff in April, he promised to shake up the administration's management.

A Bush Aide's Blunt Words (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033448

Bill Clinton is a "virtuoso deceiver" and Hillary Rodham Clinton a "true chameleon" guilty of "self-serving behavior, comparative radicalism, and dubious personal morality."

Al Gore is a "mad dog" known to "foam at the mouth." John McCain is given to "showboating." And Jacques Chirac, Nelson Mandela, Gerhard Schroeder and Kofi Annan are all "feckless fools."

Says who? President Bush's new chief domestic policy adviser. While most White House aides carefully trim their public commentary, they can't take back what they said before arriving in the West Wing, and few in this day and age arrive with a more provocative paper trail than Karl Zinsmeister, who started his new job yesterday.

For a dozen years until his appointment, Zinsmeister held forth on all manner of issues and personalities as editor in chief of the American Enterprise Institute's magazine. With a sharp pen, he skewered the left, taking special aim at environmentalists, anti-globalists, feminists, contemporary artists, university faculties, Hollywood, Broadway and particularly the media, composed mainly of "left-wing, cynical, wiseguy Ivy League types, with a high prima donna quotient."

A review of years of articles reveals a formidable thinker with a powerful sense of what he considers right and wrong. As Zinsmeister sees it, racial profiling by the police makes sense; the military, if anything, treats terrorist suspects too gently; and casual sex has led to wrecked cities, violence and "endless human misery." In a "soft, often amoral, and self-indulgent age," he warned, some children "will be ruined without a whip hand," and he assured that "things generally go better with God."

Although Zinsmeister wrote admiringly of Bush, his future boss was not exempt from remonstration when he seemed to stray. Zinsmeister chided candidate Bush for promising he would make it easier for legal immigrants to bring in relatives and questioned whether incumbent Bush "actually has a soft spot for big government."

"Though he talks a good line about battling government bloat," he wrote this year, "our current President has shown an eerie lackawanna when it comes to actually keeping a lid on the federal Pandora's box. Quite apart from Katrina or the war on terror, there has been a pattern of troublesome spending spikes right from the beginning of the Bush Administration."

For Zinsmeister, provocation has been his stock in trade. "That's kind of my M.O., for better or worse," he said by phone last week. "My main beef with much of the Washington discussion is you're forced to be so mealy-mouthed. I had the luxury as an outsider of being as blunt as I wanted. When you're outside trying to push the elephant even an inch, you have to be very crisp and uncouched."

But Zinsmeister said he understands that must change now that he advises the president. "When you're inside the tent, you have to shift gears. That's a double standard, but it's an appropriate one."

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Joel D. Kaplan said he believes that Zinsmeister will be able to make that transition. "He's here because of his powerful intellect and reputation for outside-the-box solutions to public policy problems," Kaplan said. "An outside-the-Beltway perspective, we thought, would be helpful."

In his new post, Zinsmeister will oversee the president's domestic policy process and help shape White House positions on a wide array of issues, including immigration, Social Security and energy. The position has been key in past administrations, although in this White House, it has at times been overshadowed by other aides such as Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove. Zinsmeister's predecessor, Claude A. Allen, resigned after being accused of trying to fleece retail stores in a product-exchange scam.

With scant experience in government or campaigns, Zinsmeister seemed an unlikely choice for White House domestic policy chief. Until his appointment, he was little known in Washington. At 6-foot-5, he would have stood out in the capital, but he edited the American Enterprise magazine from Cazenovia in upstate New York. He finds Washington so distasteful that even for his new job he plans to move his family no closer than Baltimore.

In fact, his antipathy for Washington got him in trouble when he was appointed. In a 2004 profile by the Syracuse New Times, Zinsmeister was quoted as saying, "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings." But the New York Sun discovered last month that he doctored that and other quotes when he posted the profile on the AEI Web site. The edited quote said, "I learned in Washington that there is an 'overclass' in this country stocked with cheating, shifty human beings that's just as morally repugnant as our 'underclass.' "

Zinsmeister later said he was "foolish" to change the quotes and only did so because he had been misquoted. The New Times denied that and denounced him for altering its account. White House spokesman Tony Snow defended him and described Zinsmeister as someone with "sharp elbows" who "expresses himself with a certain amount of piquancy."

Another question about Zinsmeister's past arose when the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, accused him of rÃ©sumÃ© padding. The White House release said he "founded" the American Enterprise, although the magazine had been around for four years when he took over in 1994. The White House took the blame, saying that Zinsmeister actually used the term "formulated" because he revamped the magazine but that a White House aide misunderstood and wrote "founded."

DOJ_NMG_0033449

A native of Cazenovia, Zinsmeister, 47, is himself an "Ivy League type" who graduated from Yale University before working for Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) and serving on an Education Department advisory board. He has also worked as a writer, film producer and radio commentator.

At the American Enterprise Institute, Zinsmeister stood out in a think tank known for a more libertarian, economic conservatism. Beyond cultural and social issues, he also took a special interest in Iraq. Unlike most pundits, he embedded with U.S. troops four times to get a firsthand look. The result has been two books on the war, a Marvel Comics chronicle of soldiers in Iraq and a forthcoming PBS documentary.

His faith in U.S. power translated into an optimistic view of the war. In 2003, he mocked the BBC for claiming the United States "could take, bluntly, a couple to 3,000 casualties." Later that year, he wrote, "Not too far down the road, today's drumbeat about America's failure to bring instant recovery to Iraq may look quite rash."

A year later, he wrote a piece titled "How America Is Winning a Guerilla War." A year after that, he declared victory. "The War is Over, and We Won," announced a June 2005 piece. "With the exception of periodic flare-ups in isolated corners, our struggle in Iraq as warfare is over," he wrote. Although there will still be "egregious acts of terror," he said, "contrary to the impression given by most newspaper headlines, the United States has won the day in Iraq."

Media coverage of the war has been a favorite target. He called journalists who embedded in 2003 "whiny and appallingly soft" and later condemned the "relentlessly gloomy reporting." In March, he wrote, "More than perhaps any news event in a generation, coverage of the Iraq war has been unbalanced and incomplete."

Although Bush avoids casting terrorism as a battle with Islam, Zinsmeister has not been so reluctant. "First, let's recognize that we're in a full-blown war; that (contrary to mealy-mouthed platitudes) it is indeed a war against a considerable part of Islam," he wrote in 2001. Yet he fretted at American sensitivity. "Would you believe that the number of formal U.S. investigations of how terror detainees are being treated recently reached 189?" he wrote last fall. "What mad self-doubt and softness!"

Foreign policy won't fall under his new portfolio, but he has written extensively on social issues that will, such as race, class and culture. He has condemned "feminist absolutism," "Green irrationality," "limousine leftists" and "the dreary left-wing, homophilic P.C. propaganda that has dominated Broadway."

Zinsmeister lamented a "forced diversity crusade" that fuels more alienation than it solves and argued that "Americans should jettison affirmative action and all racial preferences." He dismissed reparations for slavery as "a clear absurdity" because "the U.S. already made a mighty payment for the sin of slavery. It was called the Civil War." He traces wrongheaded political correctness to colleges that have become "virtual one-party states, ideological monopolies, badly unbalanced ecosystems."

The Clintons are particularly anathema. He is "a chronic liar, an out-of-control adulterer, an obstructer of justice, a draft dodger, an all-round morally challenged sleazeball." She has shown "a disturbing pattern of reflexive truth-stretching and reality-doctoring."

At a time when Bush has lost support among some conservatives, the Zinsmeister appointment may reassure some of the disaffected in the party that a strong voice will be heard in the White House. Snow said Zinsmeister will be useful for his challenging viewpoints.

"You want interesting people who are smart, who have serious policy credentials and who are able to make other people think," Snow said. But not necessarily, he added, in public anymore. "I think he'll be careful with his words."

U.S. Budget Gap Shrinks On Surge In Tax Receipts (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Surging individual and corporate income-tax receipts in May continued to help the federal government shrink the budget deficit to $227 billion for the first eight months of the fiscal year, down 16.6% from the same period a year earlier.

The federal government did run a larger monthly budget deficit of $42.8 billion in May, widening 21% from $35.4 billion a year earlier. However, economists said that increase was a quirk of the calendar that shifted some federal program payments into May and from accounting changes that increased the cost of subsidized student loans. "It's entirely a calendar effect," said Mike Englund, chief economist at Action Economics LLC.

The narrowing budget deficit for the fiscal year so far came even as spending increased, with federal outlays up nearly 8% so far this year to $1.77 trillion. That spending was offset by strong tax receipts, which totaled $1.54 trillion so far this year, up 13% from the same period a year earlier. Tax receipts for May climbed 26% to $192.6 billion, up from $152.7 billion in May 2005.

The White House is scheduled to release next month its updated forecast for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The government ran a deficit of $318 billion last year.

DOJ_NMG_0033450

To date, much of the deficit reduction stems from taxes being paid by corporations, which are seeing increased profits, and from high-income individuals, who are paying taxes on capital gains.

So far this fiscal year, individual income-tax receipts have climbed about 14% to $687 billion. Much of the increase in individual income taxes is coming from nonwithheld taxes, taxes paid on capital gains and other sources of income other than wages. Nonwithheld tax payments are up about 22% so far this year. Corporate income-tax receipts are up 30% to $184 billion.

In May alone, the government paid $20.93 billion in net interest on the federal debt. Net interest on the federal debt excludes interest paid on government debt held by federal trust funds, such as Social Security.

Lobbyists Paid For Members' Trips (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, June 13, 2006

Lobbying firms and lobbyists were listed as paying all or part of the costs for 90 congressional trips taken between 2000 and 2005, according to a new report by the Center for Public Integrity, Northwestern University's Medill News Service and American Public Media.

Lobbyists and lobbying firms are not allowed under congressional ethics rules to pay for congressional travel. Trade associations can pay for travel as long as the purpose of the trip is educational.

According to the Center for Public Integrity's website, around 20 percent of the forms that listed lobbyists or lobbying firms as sponsors of the trips had been amended to list new sponsors to comply with ethics rules.

The total cost of the trips was roughly $145,000.

The new report is part of an investigation into congressional travel. Last week, the Center for Public Integrity, Medill News Service and American Public Media reported that over the past five and a half years members of Congress and their aides went on 23,000 trips that were paid for by private interests, at a total cost of $50 million.

Someone Has To Find Facts In Paris (NYT)

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Even in Congress's own sloppy paperwork, the bottom line for junketeering looks shameful: over just five and a half years, lawmakers and members of their staffs went off on 23,000 "fact-finding" trips worth almost $50 million, with the tab picked up by private sponsors intent on capturing legislative access and favors. Expense-paid fact finding proved particularly irresistible in Paris, the destination of more than 200 trips, Hawaii (150) and Italy (140).

True, there were four trips to Sudan, but the overall result is bad news for taxpayers who try to catch their lawmakers' attention from the wrong side of the velvet travel ropes.

Fresh tales of $500-a-night freebie hotel rooms and $25,000 rides on corporate jets are coming to light just in time for the two houses to cut a final toothless sellout of all of last year's grand promises to toughen ethics enforcement and rein in Washington's booming lobbying industry. No wonder House Republicans backed away from vows to ban private travel: their new majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, averaged a month of privately paid trips each year, according to a vetting of travel vouchers by the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service. The study established that bipartisanship survives in junketeering. Representative Gregory Meeks, a Democrat from Queens, and his staff were among the top 10 frequent fliers, scoring at least $350,000 in privately paid travel.

Unfortunately, this Congress will soon reaffirm its addiction to special-interest junketeering when it strikes a cosmetic deal on ethics reform that does little to end the all-too-clear abuses.

Pelosi Takes Case To Black Media (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

The fight over the Ways and Means Committee seat held by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) is now playing out on the airwaves and in the pages of publications aimed at blacks, as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) seeks to dispel the notion that she's enforcing a double standard by demanding that Jefferson step down prior to any criminal charges being filed against him.

Unless Jefferson changes course and leaves Ways and Means on his own, the Louisianan is expected to be booted from the exclusive committee Thursday night — an extraordinary step encouraged by Pelosi, who first called on Jefferson to leave the tax-writing panel three weeks ago "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standards of the Democratic Caucus."

DOJ_NMG_0033451

Jefferson is expected to face indictment on bribery-related charges, but Rep. Mel Watt (N.C.), the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, and other leading black House Democrats have protested that their colleague is being treated differently than other Caucus members who have been suspected of, but not charged with, criminal wrongdoing.

Pelosi has said very little about the topic at her weekly press conferences. But last week, as her hand-picked members of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee voted to recommend Jefferson's expulsion precursor to action by the full Caucus, Pelosi granted a series of interviews to black media figures.

The Minority Leader appeared on the radio show of Joe Madison, who calls himself "the Black Eagle." She also hosted a conference call with black reporters and sat for a one-on-one session with a nationally known black columnist.

"She has wanted to make sure that people understand what the Democratic Caucus was doing, and that it was about upholding a high ethical standard for the entire Democratic Caucus," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's press secretary.

The suggestion of a double standard, some in the CBC have warned, threatens Democrats' standing this fall with black voters, who have long been the most reliable component of the party's coalition. Democrats running for the Senate and governor might face particular fallout, Rep Donald Payne (N.J.), a former CBC chairman, warned.

"In the South Ward of Newark, Jon Corzine got 93 percent of the vote last year for governor," said Payne, who represents Newark. "If you start to erode that, you're going to see Democrats suddenly having trouble winning statewide elections."

The feedback on black talk shows, Payne declared, will determine whether the furor over Jefferson's committee seat makes waves outside of Washington, D.C.

"We don't know yet, but they're the ones who a lot of this can resonate through," he said.

Jefferson Showdown Hurts Only Democrats (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, June 13, 2006

This is a fight that shouldn't happen. When the House Democratic Caucus meets Thursday to decide whether Louisiana's Rep. William Jefferson should be stripped of his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, members of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) are expected to mount a bruising defense of their colleague.

Last week, the steering committee of the Democratic Caucus voted to temporarily remove Jefferson from the Ways and Means Committee while federal investigators determine whether he broke the law while trying to help a Kentucky company launch a high-tech business in Africa.

"We're asking him to take leave (from the committee) until he clears up this matter," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi told me. "He can return with full seniority" if he's cleared.

While Jefferson has yet to be charged with any wrongdoing, the Kentucky business owner and a former congressional aide have pleaded guilty to bribing him. In an affidavit it used to get a warrant to search his congressional office, the FBI said it videotaped Jefferson taking $100,000 in marked bills from a businesswoman-turned-informant. The G-men later found $90,000 of that money hidden in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington home.

On Thursday, the CBC denounced the effort to oust Jefferson from the committee, saying such a move against an unindicted member of Congress is unprecedented.

Feeble defense

As defenses go, that's a pretty weak one. Sure, Pelosi might be hard pressed to point to another case in which a Democrat was forced to give up a committee assignment before being indicted. But every precedent has a beginning. And when it comes to the kind of ethical and criminal violations Jefferson is accused of, a beginning is just what's needed if Democrats want to claim the ethical high ground in Washington.

It wasn't long ago that Democrats seemed to have Republicans, who control both houses of Congress, on the ropes with charges that the Republican Party had created a "culture of corruption."

One bribe-taking Republican, former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, has landed in jail, and Tom DeLay of Texas, the once-dreaded majority leader of the House of Representatives, quit Congress on Friday as another corruption investigation — involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff — nips at his heels. Before Abramoff's case runs its course, several other Republicans might have to fall on their swords.

Lost opportunity

Democrats had hoped the GOP's problems would help them pick up enough voter support in November to retake control of Congress. But the looming showdown between the CBC and the Democratic Caucus, which threatens to pit black and white Democrats against each other, could hurt the chances of a political revival.

DOJ_NMG_0033452

CBC's chairman, Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., said blacks might view the Democratic Caucus' move against Jefferson in racial terms. "You've got a whole base of people out there who believe that the Democratic Party takes them for granted already," Watt said last week.

He's right. But in this case it is Jefferson who appears to be taking blacks for granted. By clinging to his committee seat, Jefferson has sparked a rupture among House Democrats that threatens to inflict lasting wounds. The only beneficiary would be the GOP, which black voters have roundly rejected in virtually every recent federal election.

Jefferson's problems — captured by FBI video and audio recordings — are of his own making. Maybe the investigation will conclude that they amount only to bad judgment. Maybe he's simply guilty of being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Or, maybe the legal trouble he faces is much more serious.

Whatever the case, Jefferson should acquiesce to Pelosi's demand that he step down from the committee whose membership he is accused of abusing. If such a request is unprecedented, it is also long overdue.

DeWayne Wickham writes weekly for USA TODAY.

Hoyer Marshals Forces (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 13, 2006

Allies of Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) rushed to his defense Monday as the minority whip faced a challenge from Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.) for the post of majority leader, should Democrats win control of the House in November.

Murtha wrote colleagues Friday to announce his interest in the position, a move that drew a mixture of surprise and consternation and left Democrats contemplating the prospect of a contentious leadership race as they try to defy the odds and win back the House.

Hoyer's backers expressed concern that the race would hurt their ability to reach voters on policy issues.

"I regret that we're going to have this contest," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), a Hoyer supporter. "It will be portrayed in the media as a sign of Democratic disorder. It will distract attention from Democrats' efforts to win back the House."

Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), another Hoyer backer, echoed those comments.

"This is not the time for an internal battle. Our battle must be to elect Democrats in a minimum of 15 more seats in November. When that happens, Steny Hoyer, who has been a tireless and loyal advocate for the party, will be the right person to serve as our Majority Leader."

A spokeswoman for Murtha had no comment.

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) praised Hoyer's work as whip, saying in a statement, "I know Steny Hoyer. He's a bridge builder, he brings people together, and he works not just for the people of Maryland but for the whole Democratic Caucus."

A Democratic member who is backing Hoyer said that the whip was surprised by Murtha's announcement and had been "playing catch-up" all weekend by calling colleagues.

"Steny is a lot more effective for Democrats when he's making fundraising calls instead of making majority-leader-race calls," the member said.

Many Democrats were curious what role House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may have had in Murtha's decision. Murtha and Pelosi are close allies. Murtha managed her successful 2001 campaign for whip against Hoyer. Earlier this year, he managed the caucus vice-chairmanship campaign of Rep. John Larson (D-Conn.), widely seen as Pelosi's chosen candidate to occupy the fourth-ranking House Democratic leadership post.

Pelosi was instrumental in bringing about Murtha's November call for redeployment of American troops out of Iraq. Even as she initially distanced herself from his plan, her staff handed out materials at his press events.

A Pelosi spokeswoman said she was "traveling and unavailable for comment" yesterday.

A Democratic official said that Murtha told Pelosi about his ambitions Thursday and that she had neither encouraged nor deterred him from moving forward.

Many members of the caucus remain perplexed by a Hoyer-Murtha match-up. While Murtha has delighted the liberal wing of the party with calls for redeployment, his overall record is conservative. He is a strong supporter of the military, an opponent of abortion rights and a foe of gay-marriage advocates.

He also carries decades-old ethical baggage from the Abscam scandal, a fact that could make Democrats wary of elevating him during a time when they hope to chart the high road on ethics. To make matters worse, he was one of four Democrats who recently voted against the Democrats' own lobbying and ethics reform package, earning excoriation from The Washington Post's editorial board.

His lack of involvement in the affairs of the Democratic caucus could also rile members. He rarely attends weekly caucus meetings, several sources said, and has raised only about $500,000 for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee

DOJ_NMG_0033453

(DCCC) as of late May, despite having assumed a national profile with redeployment calls, his critics charge. Hoyer has raised about $2 million for the committee and its affiliated programs.

The two are about even with their member-dues payments to the DCCC. Murtha has paid $200,000 of $250,000, while Hoyer has forked over $500,000 of $600,000. Members of leadership pay higher dues.

Nonetheless, Murtha's stature in the caucus as a behind-the-scenes dealmaker is nearly unrivaled and those who discount him often pay dearly. From his perch on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, he is in a prime position to rack up favors from colleagues. And he has quietly run two successful leadership campaigns in recent years.

His background as a decorated Vietnam veteran may also appeal to Democrats eager to build credibility on the war.

Murtha's candidate in the January vice-chairmanship race vanquished Hoyer's candidate by roughly the same margin as Pelosi beat Hoyer in 2001, an indication to many that the same calculus that existed five years ago persists. If that is true and Murtha can translate support for Pelosi into support for her campaign manager, then his prospects look good.

Pelosi Mum On Murtha's Move (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

Three days into Rep. John Murtha's (Pa.) surprise bid to supplant Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) as the second-ranking House Democrat, there are no signs that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) will take any steps — publicly or privately — to steer her party away from a potentially divisive leadership fight as a crucial election approaches.

Pelosi is considered the only Democrat with the clout to back Murtha off his challenge, but on Monday she remained unavailable for comment, the same approach she took Friday, when Murtha floored his colleagues by declaring his intention to challenge Hoyer for Majority Leader if the party takes back the House.

"She's not going to put a stop to it," a Democratic aide said. "You're going to have to deal with it. It's more like 'how will this thing play out?' than 'will she put a stop to it?'"

Murtha is one of Pelosi's closest allies, a prime shaper, along with Rep. George Miller (Calif.), of her 23-vote win over Hoyer for Minority Whip in 2001 — a triumph that put Pelosi on track to become the top Democrat in the House when then-Rep. Richard Gephardt (Mo.) stepped aside a year later.

Murtha apprised Pelosi of his plans shortly before springing them on his fellow Democrats, and while she declined to try to stop him, some Hoyer allies had hoped that a backlash would emerge over the weekend, forcing Pelosi to take a strong stand against Murtha's move and effectively nipping his campaign in the bud.

But, for now at least, the race is on, with Hoyer privately scrambling to shore up commitments even as he publicly plays the confident frontrunner and Murtha apparently convinced he can ride the personal ties he's forged in his 17 terms in the House and the celebrity he's accrued from his recent anti-war outspokenness to victory.

With Pelosi refusing to wade in, Democrats are looking to past leadership contests for clues about whether the Hoyer-Murtha race is destined to serve as a repeat of the Pelosi-Hoyer contest in 2001 and the more recent fight for Caucus vice chairman. In both cases, Pelosi's side bested Hoyer's by a few dozen votes.

But even though the current situation is probably too fluid to anoint anyone as the frontrunner, Hoyer supporters were already expressing confidence in their man's prospects Monday.

As the head of his party's Whip operation for the past three years and a veteran of numerous leadership races, Hoyer starts off with a well-oiled organization — he has, for instance, access to the mobile phone number of every Democratic Member — not to mention some significant goodwill for his work to unify the Caucus.

For instance, early last week Hoyer bent over backwards at a session with reporters to swear off any challenge to Pelosi, his old foe, whether the Democrats gain or lose seats this year, by him or anyone else. Against that backdrop, Murtha's declaration three days later may have rubbed some prospective backers the wrong way.

"I find it regrettable that our party is focusing now on a leadership race that is seven months away," said Rep. Jane Harman, one of five California Democrats who have already lined up with Hoyer. "This race should not distract us from the effort to build one, united majority party."

The other Golden State Democrats on board with Hoyer are Reps. Ellen Tauscher, a co-chairwoman of the New Democrat Coalition, Dennis Cardoza, the Blue Dog Coalition's chairman, Tom Lantos and Henry Waxman. Tauscher was alone among California Democrats in backing Hoyer over Pelosi in 2001, and Cardoza was not elected to the House until 2002.

Pelosi's 118-95 win over Hoyer was keyed by four factors: her built-in homestate support; her appeal to the liberal wing of the Caucus; the enthusiasm some Democrats felt for elevating a woman to the leadership for the first time; and, not insignificantly, her status as the top fundraiser for House Democrats in the 2000 cycle.

DOJ_NMG_0033454

Hoyer enthusiasts believe those factors would either be inoperative or neutralized in a contest with Murtha. Just by making inroads into the California delegation, Hoyer could erase much of his 2001 shortfall, and since it's a race between two white men, the issue of gender won't be a factor.

Hoyer's primary trump cards, though, may be fundraising and ideology.

As a leadership member, Hoyer has already traveled to 47 districts spread out over 24 states this cycle, and he's personally raised more than $2 million for the party's candidates. Murtha, by contrast, doesn't have a political action committee through which to dole out large sums of money to candidates — some of whom would be freshmen voting in the race for Majority Leader.

Hoyer is also to the left of Murtha on abortion and gun control, two hot-button issues. In 2005, Hoyer received a 100 score from NARAL Pro-Choice America, while Murtha scored a 0, raising questions about how many progressives — women in particular — will feel comfortable turning over a prime leadership spot to Murtha.

Still, the core of Hoyer's support rests in the center-right segment of the Caucus, hence his support from the Blue Dog and New Democrat leaders. Some members of those two groups fret that Murtha's candidacy could be a power grab by liberals designed to wipe Hoyer and his moderate allies out of a prospective Democratic majority leadership.

"If [Murtha] were to win," an aide to one such Member said, "it would be impossible for red-state Democrats to either campaign with or to publicly support a single member of our party's leadership. ... [Hoyer] does a fantastic job in those parts of the country, and he provides a contrast for swing voters who are concerned about Nancy Pelosi as Speaker."

The genesis of Murtha's bid remains somewhat mysterious. It's a campaign few of his colleagues ever imagined him waging, until last November, when his change of heart on the Iraq war transformed him from an almost reclusive creature of the backrooms into one of the international public faces of war opposition.

But, as he proved with Pelosi in 2001 and again in the vice chairman's race this past winter, Murtha is a powerful force in Democratic leadership elections, owing to the immense personal respect many Members have for him and his role as an influential appropriator. And despite his social conservatism and previous hawkishness on defense issues, Murtha has emerged as a grass-roots hero to progressives over Iraq. Iraq alone might be reason enough for progressive Caucus members to overlook other policy disagreements and embrace Murtha as one of their leaders.

"My sense is he's trying to play up the whole war angle," an aide to a Democratic Member said, "and the idea that grass-roots Democrats are sick of the Hoyers of the world sticking up for the war."

As he spearheaded Rep. John Larson's (D-Conn.) upset win in January's vice chairmanship race, Murtha frequently reminded allies that his candidates were undefeated in leadership elections. The low-key, under-the-radar strategy Murtha favored in that race — Larson stopped releasing supporters' names a month before the vote, mistakenly leading many observers to write his candidacy off — seems to mirror his approach now. He appeared on MSNBC to promote his candidacy Monday night, but isn't pushing other Members to line up publicly.

"I'm sure he's telling people, 'Don't talk,'" the same aide said.

Democrats Set To Unveil Domestic Platform For '06 (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

Congressional Democratic leaders on Wednesday afternoon will return to the issues that have largely defined their party over the past decade, hosting a town hall meeting to highlight the domestic priorities of their 2006 platform.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) will headline the forum with other Congressional leaders at the Kennedy Recreation Center in Northwest Washington, D.C.

The leaders are taking a different approach to laying out the third component of their platform, holding an issues discussion rather than a ceremonial event designed to energize the party faithful.

Sources said the leaders plan to promote Democratic plans on health care, energy, the economy and education, while challenging what they argue are the failed policies of the Bush administration and the GOP-led Congress.

Joining Reid and Pelosi at the town hall will be Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.), Caucus Secretary Debbie Stabenow (Mich.), Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.), along with House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.), Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.).

Democrats also have invited a student, a senior citizen, a farmer and a laid-off worker to help put a face to their initiatives.

In particular, Democrats will call for plans to increase the minimum wage, heighten access to health care and prescription drug coverage, improve retirement security, lay out a strategy for energy independence, boost college affordability, enact pay-as-you-go budgeting and drive down the price of gasoline.

DOJ_NMG_0033455

"As Republicans seek to distract and divide and push their partisan priorities, Democrats will fight for the priorities of working families," said one senior Democratic aide. "We are listening to the concerns of everyday Americans and are united behind a positive agenda that will get America back on track."

Few of the specific agenda items are new, aides acknowledged. Some of the proposals have been part of the Democratic agenda for some time, while others have been crafted over the course of several months as the minority eyes the November elections.

This election is shaping up to be one of high stakes for both parties, and Democrats see their best chance in more than a decade to make significant gains. Some even suggest that the minority could win back at least one of the chambers, most likely the House, where Democrats believe they have a shot at regaining 15 Republican-held seats.

Still, Democrats continue to come under fire for failing to present themselves as a viable alternative to the Republican majority.

Republicans, as part of their election year strategy, are attempting to poke holes in the Democrats' ideas, and they accuse the minority of following an agenda of no ideas and "obstruction" of the majority's initiatives.

A senior Republican aide said that this week's Democratic event offers just one more example of a party trying "to recycle their same old tired efforts at an agenda." This staffer added, however, that the exercise "is certainly fun to watch if you are a Republican."

Democrats, meanwhile, have spent the better part of a year narrowing down their 2006 message and policy blueprint for a prospective majority. The party initially planned to kick off its platform last November but pushed it off until January when attention on the Congress and the election was higher.

Democrats launched the first piece of the blueprint in January when they outlined plans to restore ethical standards to Congress and reduce the influence of lobbyists. Two months later, party leaders unveiled their second plank, laying out their national security and anti-terrorism agenda.

Pelosi: It's Definition Time For Democrats (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 13, 2006

With Republicans seeking to define Democrats by their votes on such hot-button issues as gay marriage, the estate tax and flag burning, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is arguing that Democrats need to tell voters about themselves before Republicans succeed in doing it for them.

The time to criticize the Republicans' "culture of corruption," a Democratic refrain for nearly a year, is at an end, Pelosi said; Democrats need to begin promoting their own vision of America.

"Now it's time to talk about us. Enough of the Republicans. It's time for us to talk about what are the priorities we'd like to see addressed, if we have the opportunity," Pelosi said in an interview with The Hill on Wednesday.

Democrats have been struggling for months to devise a unified message to take to voters, debating whether to be general or detailed, to come out early or late, or to present a succinct list of points like the GOP's 1994 Contract With America. Pelosi has been seen as favoring an early message, while Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who head up the campaign committees for House and Senate Democrats, have argued for focusing on Republican misdeeds.

Democrats are poised this week to unveil a portion of their domestic-policy agenda dealing with family economic issues.

"What we have to do is define ourselves so that Republicans do not define us. This is a define-or-be-defined business that we're in, so you can't leave it out in the open," Pelosi said.

She outlined three areas where Democrats would seek to differentiate themselves from Republicans: integrity, civility and accountability. If Democrats were to take control of the House in November, their first actions would focus on promoting those values, she said.

"These are not full-blown initiatives," she cautioned, "[but] they are a beginning to differentiate from the Republicans' misguided priorities of taking us deeply into debt, bringing up divisive social issues instead and raising those issues instead of raising the minimum wage."

The three themes are similar to the message Democrats ran on in 2004, when they lost two House seats in part because of redistricting in Texas that defeated five Democratic incumbents. The Democrats' 2004 New Partnership for America's Future contained six "core values," of which accountability was one. Under accountability, Democrats called for "integrity in the electoral process" and "civility in public debate."

But perhaps more important, Pelosi is vowing to run the House — a body of Congress marked by intense partisanship for decades — in a bipartisan fashion.

DOJ_NMG_0033456

"You can't name a Democratic bill that's come to [a vote] in the House of Representatives. That's just not right. … I would hope that we could find common ground [with President Bush and Hill Republicans] because I do believe bipartisanship is important."

Pelosi, regularly criticized by leading Republicans as an extreme liberal, has attracted praise from centrist House Democrats for her leadership approach. For instance, she has downplayed the chances Democrats in the next Congress would move to impeach Bush for his administration's controversial telephone surveillance program. Pelosi told The Hill last week that she is not interested in censuring Bush either.

But any majority Pelosi might have in 2007 will likely be slim, making bipartisanship a must if Democrats are to move legislation should they control the chamber.

Even while she discussed the possibility of a Democratic House and her role as Speaker, Pelosi declined to predict that Democrats would take control, saying, "Five months from now is an eternity."

Some Democrats are concerned that when they do finalize their message and it comes time to broadcast it to voters they may not have the requisite money at the Democratic National Committee (DNC) to counter the growing war chest of the Republican National Committee (RNC).

Emanuel reportedly stormed out of a meeting with DNC Chairman Howard Dean, disgusted that Dean was spending money on his "50 State" program rather than hoarding it for congressional races.

The DNC had $9.4 million at the end of April, while the RNC had $44.7 million.

Pelosi called Emanuel's complaints legitimate.

"If we can't have enough money to do the get-out-the-vote, to do the grassroots, the field operations, then we'll have to do that ourselves, and that's what the party usually does, so I think that Rahm's right," she said.

Pelosi would not say whether she would ask Emanuel to serve another term as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

She likewise deflected a question about who would occupy certain leadership positions in a Democratic House. On Friday, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) announced he would challenge House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) for the position of majority leader.

"I'm even hard put to say what our agenda will be when we win, so I'm certainly not going into the politics of the caucus," she said. "That is as unimportant an issue to me right now as it could be."

Pelosi also responded to critics who have called her a poor spokeswoman for the party and lambasted her recent appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I have a big job to do here," she argued, noting that her critics did not have the day-to-day duties of a leadership post to contend with. "What do [the critics] do all day but get ready for their appearances? I don't have time for that. But when I do, that will be fine. I'm the leader for a reason, and my colleagues have confidence in me to do the job."

Hoyer praised Pelosi's leadership last week, calling her the hardest-working member of Congress he had seen in his 26 years in office.

"That's probably right!" she said of Hoyer's comments, which she had not seen. "I work constantly. I think it's so urgent that we win this election. ... I don't want to rest for one minute or one day until we can get through this election."

She dismissed a question about when she might retire. "Why would I even talk about such a thing?" the 66-year-old grandmother of five asked. "I haven't even gotten there yet."

She similarly dismissed her recent tension with the Congressional Black Caucus, a Democratic group that attacked her move to oust one of its own, Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), from the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government corruption investigation.

"I feel very confident about my relationships one on one with just about everyone in the Congressional Black Caucus. ... I value their advice and counsel. In these kind of situations, people have to do what they have to do. And so do I."

Excerpts from interview with Rep. Pelosi

Q: As you know, there's been some friction between [Rep.] Rahm Emanuel [D-Ill.] and Howard Dean, especially on fundraising. The Republican National Committee has a major fundraising advantage [over the Democratic National Committee (DNC)], and that can severely affect the effort to win back the House this fall. Do you think [DNC Chairman] Howard Dean is doing a good job?

A: The issue that Rahm has with Howard Dean I think is a legitimate one. We're exactly where we need to be. We've recruited the candidates, we've raised the issues and we have raised the money. We're competitive with the Republicans for first time ever. … I'm saying if we don't have enough money to counter the deluge of money from the Republican National Committee then it's a problem for us and Rahm is correct to point that out.

DOJ_NMG_0033457

Q: What were some of the lessons you learned — this is your second election as leader — from 2004? What went right? What went wrong?

A: It's two different elections altogether. … When I first became leader, we were putting together our ideas. People said to me, "It doesn't matter. Nobody's going to care. It's only about the presidential," and they were right. … But this is a completely different race, and I always analyze elections one race at a time.

Q: Would you like Rahm to stay on as chairman [of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee]?

A: I probably see Rahm's family in my office more than he sees them because of all the travel that he has to do. … I have a feeling his wife is counting the days.

Q: If you do in fact win the House, [Steny] Hoyer will be majority leader. Who will be whip?

A: You know what? We have to win the House first. I'm even hard put to say what our agenda will be when we win, so I'm not certainly going into the politics of the caucus, that is as unimportant an issue to me right now as it could be.

Q: There's been some headlines about your counterpart in the Senate, Sen. Harry Reid [D-Nev.]. Do you think there's anything he did wrong there, or are the Republicans trying to play politics?

A: I think it's the Republicans trying to play politics. I think they dug and dug and dug and dug and that's all they could come up with. Harry Reid is a person of faith and integrity, and I wouldn't mess with him near a boxing ring.

Q: But Senator [John] McCain [R-Ariz.] did [reimburse for boxing tickets] differently. …

A: I don't know that he did it differently. I have absolutely no idea what the facts are there. I just don't know. So I don't want to go into what Senator McCain did or what whoever did. … But that is nothing [compared to the allegations about GOP corruption]. That's quite a different thing than if someone handled boxing tickets correctly.

Q: There's a lot of speculation about [House Speaker] Dennis Hastert [R-Ill.], whether he'll stay or go. Do you see any end in sight for you?

A:No.

Q: Why?

A: Why would I even talk about such a thing?

Q: Well a lot of the members say they'd like to see their grandchildren more… But you see no end in sight?

A: The question is — we have to win, we have to achieve the goal. … I have absolutely no intention of engaging any conversation about when I'm leaving. I haven't even gotten there yet.

Q: Are you concerned with the Congressional Black Caucus [about Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.)]? Could that end up being a problem if you were ever Speaker, in the sense they will control four committee chairs, maybe even five?

A: I have a very long and serious and deep relationship with members of the Congressional Black Caucus. I feel comfortable when I go to that caucus, as I do any place in politics. We have shared values. We've worked hard on issues for many, many years. Some of us go back 30 years. … In these kinds of situations, people have to do what they have to do.

Agency Informs Workers About Data Theft (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, June 12, 2006

Energy Department officials have informed nearly 1,500 individuals that their Social Security numbers and other information may have been compromised when a hacker gained entry to a department computer system eight months ago, a spokesman said Monday.

The workers, mostly contract employees, worked for the National Nuclear Security Administration, a semiautonomous agency within the department that deals with the government's nuclear weapons programs.

The computer theft occurred last September, but Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and his deputy, Clay Sell, were not informed of it until last week. It was first publicly disclosed at a congressional hearing on Friday.

Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the NNSA, said about 800 workers were reached over the weekend and by late Monday all but a small number had been contacted. "We will keep calling until we get all of them," said Wilkes, adding that notifications also were being sent by mail.

The security breach occurred in a computer system at a service center in Albuquerque, N.M. The file that was compromised contained the names, Social Security numbers, security clearance levels and place of employment of 1,502 people working throughout the government nuclear weapons complex.

The system contained sensitive, but not classified material, department officials said. The NNSA also has a more secure computer system that includes nuclear weapons data and other classified material.

NNSA Administrator Linton Brooks told a House hearing on Friday that he learned of the security breach late last September, but did not inform either the two men to whom he reports — Bodman or Sell.

Bodman learned of the incident last week.

Brooks blamed a misunderstanding for the communications failure.

Rep. Joe Barton (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas., chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, on Friday said Brooks, a former ambassador and nuclear arms control negotiator, should resign over the incident.

Stevens on Monday declined to speculate on Brooks' future. Bodman wants the department's inspector general's office to investigate the communications failure.

___

On the Net:

Energy Department: http://www.energy.gov

National Nuclear Security Administration: http://www.nnsa

Senator Wants Raise-for-Performance Pay System (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

A key senator plans to introduce a bill today that would require federal managers to provide their employees with a written performance evaluation each year and would prohibit pay raises for employees rated as less than successful.

Describing current requirements as "vague," Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who oversees the civil service as chairman of a Senate subcommittee, said his bill would strengthen the employee performance appraisal system and help lay the foundation for an overhaul of federal pay.

"We must engage in a dialogue about the future of the public service and ask the difficult questions about what we want it to achieve and how do we make it happen," Voinovich said in remarks prepared for the bill's introduction. "This conversation will make many people uncomfortable, but it must take place."

Following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Congress gave the green light to the departments of Homeland Security and Defense to revamp their pay and workplace rules so they could reward their best workers with higher pay. Last year, the Bush administration urged Congress to shift the rest of the government into pay-for-performance systems and abolish the largest government-wide pay system, the General Schedule, by 2010.

The administration's proposal fizzled, however. Congress signaled it would rather see how well the new rules at the Homeland Security and Defense departments worked before taking up government-wide pay changes. Unions, meanwhile, have slowed the rollout of the new rules at the two departments through lawsuits filed in federal courts.

Voinovich's bill appears designed to find middle ground between proponents and opponents of performance-based pay for the federal workforce. "Instead of taking one giant bite at the apple, I believe it will be easier for federal agencies to implement enhanced employee appraisals first," Voinovich said in the prepared remarks. "By instituting a more rigorous performance-management standard on top of the current General Schedule, I am optimistic this will create less anxiety among federal employees."

Numerous federal employees prefer the approach of the General Schedule, which provides predictable raises over the course of a career in government. In their view, the General Schedule protects them against favoritism and political pressure. They are wary of promises that a performance-based pay system could be administered fairly.

But Voinovich said he believes that pay for performance "can work" and that employees should receive "a rigorous evaluation each year and that their pay should be determined based upon their performance."

"I would like to transform the culture of the federal workforce into a high-performing, continually improving organization," Voinovich added in his remarks. The government "must be as agile, nimble and intellectually energetic as the leading nongovernmental organizations or dot-com companies," he said.

Voinovich chairs the Senate subcommittee for federal management policy and federal workforce issues. His office provided an advance copy of his remarks, which expand on comments he made in May about tightening the government's job evaluation system.

Prospects for Voinovich's bill are uncertain. Congress is dealing with several contentious issues, such as Iraq and immigration, and is likely to be in session fewer days than normal because this is an election year. Unions and some Democrats also will probably raise numerous questions about the bill.

Voinovich said in the prepared remarks that he will pursue bipartisan support for his effort. The bill, he said, "is not set in stone, and I imagine that it will undergo many changes."Congressional Honors

The Blinded American Veterans Foundation will honor Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) at its 21st annual congressional awards ceremony on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0033459

The foundation, which is headed by John Fales and supports research, rehabilitation and reemployment of disabled veterans, also will present awards for media coverage and volunteer efforts on veterans' behalf. This year's corporate volunteer award goes to McCormick & Schmick's Seafood Restaurants.

Byrd Truly The Elder Statesman (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Robert C. Byrd, a champion of classical oratory in the Senate and pork barrel spending back home, yesterday became the longest-serving senator in U.S. history.

The West Virginia Democrat marked his 17,327th day in the Senate by visiting his wife's grave and then listening to several colleagues praise his career. Uncharacteristically for a man who has rhapsodized about spring, Mother's Day and countless other topics in the Senate chamber, Byrd left the floor without speaking, struggling to maintain his composure.

"My darling wife, I just wish she had lived to see this day," he told reporters as he left. Erma Ora James Byrd, who died March 25, would have turned 89 yesterday.

Byrd, 88, eclipsed the late Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) in Senate tenure. He long has held the record for the most Senate votes cast, and Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said yesterday that he "has held more leadership positions than any other senator."

Byrd aims to keep setting records, running this fall for a ninth six-year term, which would end when he is 95. In a state whose legislature named him "West Virginian of the 20th Century," Byrd is generally favored to defeat GOP business executive John Raese.

Although he is frail and walks with two canes, Byrd still gives theatrical speeches on the importance of preserving the Senate's traditional powers and other issues dear to him. Some of his most emotional orations in the past three years have involved the Iraq war, which he opposed from the start and considers a historic misadventure. He often rips President Bush, whom he has called "dangerous, reckless and arrogant," for launching the invasion with an incomplete assessment of Iraq's weapons.

Beyond Capitol Hill, Byrd's greatest legacy is in the asphalt, concrete, steel and hefty payrolls of the scores of federal projects he has steered to West Virginia from his Appropriations Committee seat, to which his ally Lyndon B. Johnson appointed him. He once said he wanted to be the state's "billion-dollar industry." Analysts say he exceeded the goal, planting major facilities for the FBI, the Treasury Department, Internal Revenue Service and many other agencies in the Mountain State.

Byrd's legacy has its darker sides, most notably his membership in the Ku Klux Klan as a young man eager to enter politics in the 1940s. He repeatedly calls it "the greatest mistake of my life" and acknowledges it will be part of his obituary.

Byrd's love of quoting the Bible, the Constitution, Shakespeare, Cicero, Thucydides and others is all the more notable because he entered office with one semester of college completed. He spent a dozen years in the West Virginia legislature and U.S. House before winning election to the Senate in November 1958. He earned a law degree at American University while he mastered the Senate's rules and climbed its leadership ranks.

Byrd co-wrote a four-volume history of the Senate and published a hefty autobiography last year, "Robert C. Byrd: Child of the Appalachian Coalfields." In an unusually testy exchange in 2002 with then-Treasury Secretary Paul H. O'Neill, Byrd attacked what he called executive branch abuses and arrogance, adding: "I lived in a house without electricity, too. No running water, no telephone, a little wooden outhouse. . . . I started out in life without any rungs in the bottom ladder."

Yesterday, Byrd played the humble official hoping to win one more election. "The people of West Virginia," he told reporters, "are the people to whom I owe the greatest of praise."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Washington Wives Were Goin' Out of Their Heads Over Faux Four Seasons

If the cast of Broadway's "Jersey Boys" had notions of celebrating hard after their big wins at Sunday's Tony Awards -- not a chance. They had a big date to keep with the Senate wives.

Oh, technically it was the Senate Spouses Club -- guys were invited, really! -- but it was clearly a chick thing as the four supple-voiced cuties who portray the Four Seasons in the jukebox musical serenaded Laura Bush's luncheon guests at the White House yesterday. The spouses of Senate and Cabinet members swayed and sang along to boomer classics such as "Big Girls Don't Cry," "Rag Doll" and "Can't Take My Eyes Off You." For one romantic song, cast member J. Robert Spencer asked to dim the East Room chandeliers "to set the mood." No go, but People magazine's Sandra Sobieraj spotted one wife jumping up on the press riser several times to get photos of the boys with her own happy-snap camera. Swoon!

DOJ_NMG_0033460

The first lady caught the show in New York before her U.N. speech on AIDS a few weeks ago. Sunday night, after "Jersey Boys" won best musical, the whole cast bused down to D.C: Spencer, John Lloyd Young (best actor in a musical for his portrayal of Frankie Valli), Christian Hoff (upset winner for best featured actor) and Daniel Reichard .

Mrs. Bush hosted the luncheon to thank the group for a dress auction that raised funds for her library charity. The meal of grilled tuna, vichyssoise and white chocolate almond terrine was served on historic White House china going all the way back to the FDR years. Yeah -- totally a chick event!

Start Spreading the News: Bush Twin Decides She'll Take Manhattan

Sorry, Washington: We're back to being a one-twin town. Barbara Bush -- the dark-haired, older-by-minutes one -- has pulled up stakes for Manhattan, sources confirmed yesterday. What the First Daughter has planned for NYC remains unknown; the White House maintains a firm policy of not commenting about the twins' personal lives. But then, it was never clear what exactly she had been up to the past several months in D.C. After graduating from Yale in '04, Barbara campaigned for her dad's reelection, then vanished from the scene to volunteer quietly at a South African hospital last summer.

She resurfaced at Thanksgiving, around the time of her 24th birthday. While sister Jenna was tied down to her D.C. charter-school teaching job, Barbara got to accompany her mother to the Winter Olympics in Turin and the inauguration of Liberia's female president. When she was spotted last month on a multi-hour date with a cute guy at Alexandria's Indigo Landing, we all hoped that perhaps she had found reason to stick around town -- alas, apparently not.

A Federal Office Where Heraldry Of Yore Is Only Yesterday (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

FORT BELVOIR, Va. — "A wives' tale," scoffed one official. "An urban myth," said another.

They would know. The officials were from the Institute of Heraldry, the government's chief guardian of insignia and heraldic tradition, and they were dismissing an oft-repeated canard about the presidential seal.

According to legend, the eagle in the seal faced the arrow-holding talon in times of war and switched its stern gaze toward the olive branch in times of peace.

The eagle's glare did indeed get reversed — just once, by President Harry S. Truman in 1945. But only, it turns out, to correct the grievous heraldic error that President Rutherford B. Hayes had made 65 years before, when he designed the first seal to adorn White House invitations.

"In point of fact, the viewer's left is the dexter side, the honorable side on any shield," said Joe Spollen, head sculptor at the heraldry institute, which among its other duties nurtures rules and terminology from the Middle Ages. "The sinister side, on the viewer's right, is the less honorable."

And so Truman, after learning the truth from the director of the heraldry office at the time, switched the gaze from sinister to dexter, where it remains today.

The Institute of Heraldry, located for historical reasons within the Army, has a budget of $2.3 million and 24 employees, including four well-schooled "heraldic designers." But the handiwork of this little office has had an outsize influence on the public face of the military and the government.

All plaques bearing presidential or vice-presidential seals, as seen on news conference lecterns and the bulkhead of Air Force One, are hand-sculpted and painted here.

The institute, conjoining modern images with ancient traditions, designs the shoulder insignia unique to every military unit and supervises their production. It designs military medals, with the Iraq Campaign Medal being one of the latest. It also, together with the captains, designs a custom coat of arms for every new ship in the Navy.

Though civilian agencies are not required to hire the institute's services, many consult it when they need a new seal for their doors and stationery.

"People rally around these symbols," said Charles V. Mugno, a retired Marine officer who heads the institute. "Each seal carries the strengths and identity of an institution."

Every new sub-office of the bureaucracy, it seems, needs its own emblem. So when the Pentagon recently created an obscure civilian agency called the Test Resource Management Center, which evaluates range and test facilities for the military, the heraldry institute was ready and able.

As the institute describes the final design, three crossed arrows signify the new center's three areas of responsibility: oversight of facilities, strategic planning and reviewing of budgets. A chevron of white and green is crisscrossed with grid lines, to evoke "a graph and the measurement of resources."

DOJ_NMG_0033461

"America has a funny relationship with heraldry," said Francois Velde, an economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago who is an amateur expert and maintains the heraldica.org Web site.

The Constitution expressly forbids the government to grant titles of nobility, but nearly half the signers of the Declaration of Independence had family coats of arms, Mr. Velde noted.

"The association of heraldry with aristocracy is really inaccurate," he said. "It's a system of identification for people and institutions, not just nobles and knights."

The intricate rules governing symbols and colors emerged rather suddenly in 12th-century Europe, Mr. Velde said, and spread quickly.

In the United States, European-style coats of arms, with lions and Latin, have been especially popular with universities, but several presidents were also "armigerous," as the American Heraldry Society describes them, including Washington and both Roosevelts.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower called on the heraldry office to invent his — featuring an anvil, a crest of five stars and the motto "Peace Through Understanding" — because he needed family arms in order to receive the Order of the Elephant from the Kingdom of Denmark.

The founding fathers wasted no time in devising a distinctly American seal. In 1782, years before the Constitution, Congress adopted the same two-sided Great Seal visible on every dollar bill today, describing it in full-fledged heraldic argot. On the front side is the familiar eagle, "holding in its dexter talon an olive branch, and in his sinister a bundle of 13 arrows," and in his beak a scroll inscribed "E pluribus unum." On the reverse side, "a pyramid unfinished" and "in the zenith an eye in a triangle, surrounded by a glory, proper."

From the beginning, the Great Seal's eagle faced the dexter talon; why President Hayes switched directions for his similar-looking presidential emblem is lost to the ages.

Mr. Mugno, the institute director, had been a student of military heraldry and said he got a thrill at the outset of the Iraq war, while he was still in the Marines and working in the Pentagon, when his proposal for the campaign medal was used on the reverse side.

The front of the medal, given to all who serve in Iraq, is a map of the country surrounded by palm wreaths. The back, drawing on Mr. Mugno's idea, features the Statue of Freedom from atop the Capitol and two scimitars with their blades arcing downward — a deliberate inversion, Mr. Mugno said, of a giant arch of crossed swords that Saddam Hussein had built in honor of himself in Baghdad.

When he heard that the institute directorship was coming open, Mr. Mugno said, he could not resist applying, even though it meant he had to retire from his beloved Marines. He has a dream for this office, he said, which could play a far more systematic role in overseeing the nation's insignia.

"Should there be a National Institute of Heraldry?" he asked. "One office overseeing the symbolism of the country and setting the standards?"

Correcting The Hayden Record (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

So what should we think of a senior official who knocks his own Administration to win easy Senate confirmation, apologizes profusely in private and promises to correct the record, and then fails to follow through on his promise?

That's the behavior of newly minted CIA Director Michael Hayden, who has done the Bush Administration a huge disservice by reinforcing the Democrats' "Bush lied" theme in his confirmation testimony. At his Senate hearing last month, General Hayden told Michigan Democrat Carl Levin not once but twice that he was not "comfortable" with intelligence-related work that had been done by an office reporting to former Undersecretary of Defense Doug Feith. He also suggested such work had been "wrong," "inaccurate," and "misleading."

As General Hayden would have known all too well, Mr. Feith's office has been an obsession of Senator Levin, who contends despite all evidence that mistakes on Iraq intelligence were all the fault of civilian appointees at the Pentagon. The truth, as a bipartisan report from his own committee attests, is that the CIA made most of the errors on its own.

Not surprisingly, Mr. Feith called General Hayden to object to his testimony. And, according to Mr. Feith, General Hayden was apologetic. He said he had not intended to say what he appeared to, and promised to issue a statement correcting the record. Arizona Senator Jon Kyl tells us he had a similar conversation with General Hayden, during which the CIA director promised a remedial letter that could be entered into the Congressional record. "He told us he did not intend those remarks to suggest Doug Feith or the Department of Defense did anything wrong, inaccurate or misleading. That is precisely what he told me," says Mr. Kyl.

DOJ_NMG_0033462

But the General's subsequent effort, provided to us by Mr. Kyl, is no retraction or correction at all. It says only that his concern about bad intelligence methodology "is not confined to any specific program." Both Mr. Feith and the Senator have asked Mr. Hayden to be more specific, but so far to no avail. Mr. Hayden also declined to comment for this editorial.

Let's be clear that while the CIA director apparently insists he was offering a generic statement on intelligence craft, he was not asked a generic question. Here's the exchange:

Senator Levin: "While the intelligence community was consistently dubious about links between Iraq and al Qaeda, Mr. Feith produced an alternative analysis, asserting that there was a strong connection. Were you comfortable with Mr. Feith's office's approach to intelligence analysis?"

General Hayden: "No, sir, I wasn't . . . No, sir, I wasn't comfortable."

Mr. Levin: ". . . well, what were you uncomfortable about?"

General Hayden: "Well, there were a couple of things." He then went on to suggest that, in the case of al Qaeda links to Iraq, the Pentagon had somehow become too "laser beam focused" and had not recognized "left-and-right-hand boundaries," whatever in the world that meant. And the General added, "That would be very wrong. That would be inaccurate. That would be misleading."

These and other similar remarks obviously pleased the likes of Senator Levin, who cited them specifically in justifying his vote for confirmation, and led other Democrats to back General Hayden in the 78-15 confirmation vote. But the remarks also fed an antiwar Democratic mythology evident in the fallacious premise of Senator Levin's question.

Mr. Feith's office did not freelance an "alternative analysis." Much of the work it did on the Iraq-al Qaeda connection was a response to a question for the record posed by the Senate Intelligence Committee itself. Nor did the Defense Department "assert" a "strong connection." Judging by leaked excerpts of the still highly classified work printed in the Weekly Standard, DOD merely provided the committee with a list of raw intelligence items on the topic.

The issue here is bigger than the credibility of General Hayden, or of Mr. Feith. Senator Levin has been pushing the Senate Intelligence Committee to publish a report, before this November's election, that would accuse Bush officials of misusing intelligence to push the country into war. General Hayden has played into the Senator's highly partisan, and historically inaccurate, hands. We can understand why the General is reluctant to take back his testimony at this stage and risk offending Mr. Levin, who can make life miserable for the CIA chief. But the General also has an obligation to the truth and to the President who appointed him.

His testimony, along with his subsequent failure to follow through on promises to correct the record, do not make for an auspicious, truth-telling start at CIA.

OTHER NEWS:

Broad Economic Worries Drive A Global Sell-Off (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Fears about higher interest rates, rising inflation and a slowing economy sent stocks sharply and broadly lower yesterday, with emerging markets taking the biggest hit.

In the United States, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.3 percent, erasing all of its gains for the year and closing at its lowest level since November. The Nasdaq fell more than 2 percent and the Dow Jones industrial average fell almost 1 percent.

But the damage was far worse in some other parts of the world. Trading at the Colombian stock exchange was briefly halted after its benchmark index fell more than 10 percent. Mexico's benchmark stock index fell 4.3 percent, its biggest one-day decline in more than three years. Markets in India, Brazil and Hungary also tumbled.

Emerging markets had enjoyed a strong surge in recent years because low interest-rate policies around the world pumped cheap money into the global economy, analysts said.

"Global liquidity has helped drive a lot of these risky assets," said Larry Adam, chief investment strategist at Deutsche Bank Alex.Brown. "And now you are seeing this flight to quality," including cash and investments in developed countries, he said.

At first glance, stocks in the United States and Western Europe do not appear to have benefited from the emerging-market retreat, but money coming out of emerging markets may be helping to cushion the blow, Mr. Adam said.

Yesterday's sell-off started early and gathered pace throughout the day. Some analysts suggested that a major catalyst was a speech by the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland, Sandra Pianalto, in which she said that inflation was higher than her "comfort level."

DOJ_NMG_0033463

Ms. Pianalto was the latest Fed official to express concerns about inflation in the last several days, a drumbeat that many investors think is a not-so-subtle message that the central bank will raise short-term interest rates, now at 5 percent, at its next meeting on June 29. Earlier, the Fed had indicated that it might pause in its two-year campaign of raising rates.

The Fed is "adding to a little of this hysteria that is building," said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management.

To be sure, Ms. Pianalto, who is one of the 11 officials who vote on Fed's interest rate policies, said that inflation, though worrisome, was not an ominous threat to the economy.

"Measures of long-term inflation expectations have been mixed lately, but, on the whole, I regard them as remaining contained," she said to a gathering of the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association in Florida. The challenge of Fed policy makers, she said, "is to make sure that they stay contained."

The government will issue reports on wholesale and consumer inflation today and Wednesday. Excluding energy and food prices, economists expect both the producer price and consumer price indexes to have risen 0.2 percent in May, a rate considered to be modest by most experts.

The biggest loser yesterday, as in the last few weeks, was the technology industry. Many large technology companies, struggling to match past growth as they mature, have been lowering their profit projections.

For the second quarter, the technology area's profits are expected to fall 2 percent from the same period last year while the overall increase in the S.& P. 500 is expected be 10 percent, noted Howard Silverblatt, senior index analyst at Standard & Poor's. "This is supposed to be a growth industry," he said.

The Nasdaq was led downward by Qualcomm, the maker of wireless technology, which fell 5 percent yesterday after it filed a complaint against its rival Nokia as part of a lengthy patent fight.

Shares of Apple fell almost 4 percent, apparently reflecting investors' concerns about efforts by some European countries to force the company to open up its music software to devices other than the iPod.

One of the few exception to yesterday's broad sell-off was General Motors, which rose 43 cents, or 1.7 percent, to $25.78. It was the Dow's biggest gainer. The shares moved higher as the president of the United Automobile Workers, the company's biggest union, told members that the union would have to rethink its traditional positions to ensure the domestic automobile industry's survival.

The stock also appeared to be reflecting investors reaction to news of an agreement late Friday that could avert a costly strike at G.M.'s largest supplier, Delphi.

Many market experts remain convinced that the recent correction in stock prices will prove temporary and will be contained to a few areas. They note that inflation, though rising, remains low by historical standards.

But the market's volatility has intensified and will probably remain high, analysts say.

"It is a retrenchment," Mr. Silverblatt said. But "companies are still in good shape."

The Dow fell 99.34 points, to close at 10,792.58, its lowest level since Feb. 7. The S.& P. 500 declined 15.90 points, to 1,236.40. The Nasdaq fell 43.74 points, to 2,091.32. The Russell 2000 stock indexof smaller-capitalization companies, fell 18.2 points, or 2.6 percent, to 683.19. Declining issues led advancing stocks by 3½ to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Treasuries fell slightly. The price of the benchmark 10-year note fell 1/32, to 1014/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.98 percent, from 4.97 on Friday.

Here are the results of yesterday's auction of three- and six-month Treasury bills:

Dow Industrials Tumble 99.34 Points As Rate Worries Continue To Take Toll (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Continuing interest-rate anxiety drove the Dow Jones Industrial Average down an additional 99.34 points, marking the sixth decline in the past seven sessions and leaving it up less than 1% for the year.

The beleaguered Nasdaq Composite Index, whose many technology stocks have been under attack for weeks, fell 2.05%, or 43.74 points, to 2091.32. That put the Nasdaq down 11.8% from the five-year high it hit in April. Wall Street terms that a correction -- or a decline of more than 10%. The Nasdaq is at its lowest point since October, though still well short of a bear market -- or 20% decline. It is down 5.2% since the year began.

The Dow industrials, which fell 0.91% to 10792.58, are 7.3% off the six-year high they hit last month. They are short of a 10% correction but up just 0.7% since the year began.

Some emerging markets tumbled again; shares in India fell 3%, and Brazil and Mexico slid more than 4% each.

DOJ_NMG_0033464

Investors fear another quarter-point interest-rate increase when the Federal Reserve holds its next policy meeting on June 28 and 29. Many people are concerned about more rate increases after that, and worry that the higher rates will spread pain through the economy, crimping consumer spending and corporate profits.

Adding to the anxiety, the government releases May wholesale-price data today and consumer-price data tomorrow. On top of that, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke was scheduled to speak three separate times this week, most notably Thursday to the Economic Club of Chicago.

"The speeches and the inflation data are holding people at bay," keeping them from buying stocks, said Mike Viracola, head of trading at brokerage firm Canaccord Adams, based in Boston.

Stoking the interest-rate concerns, Cleveland Federal Reserve Bank President Sandra Pianalto told a business group that inflation at recent levels "exceeds my comfort level."

Some investors were surprised that the Dow industrials and Standard & Poor's 500-stock index last week both posted their worst weekly declines in more than a year. They are worried that interest-rate uncertainty could last into the summer.

The S&P 500 yesterday fell 1.27%, or 15.90 points, to 1236.40. It is down 1% for 2006, 6.7% off its recent high and at its lowest point since last year.

But higher interest rates make the dollar more desirable, so the U.S. currency continued its rebound against the euro and the yen. Oil and gold fell.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.25 billion shares; 716 stocks rose and 2,591 fell.

Bond prices were mixed. The 10-year Treasury note fell 1/32, or 31 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.983%. The 30-year bond was up 1/32 to yield 5.024%.

The dollar strengthened. The currency traded at 114.30 yen, up from 113.97, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2599 from $1.2642.

S& P 500 Tumbles To A 7-Month Low As Once-Key Sectors Fall Out Of Favor (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

NEW YORK, June 12 -- U.S. stocks continued their five-week slide Monday as the Dow Jones industrial average lost about 100 points and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell to its lowest point in seven months, erasing all its gains for 2006.

World stock indexes from Germany and Britain to Mexico and Egypt also did badly as investors concerned about a tightening world monetary supply continue to flee high-risk investments such as emerging markets and commodities.

The tremendous amount of money available to be invested "fueled the commodity boom, the housing bubble, and the small and microcap stocks," said Liz Ann Sonders, chief investment strategist for Charles Schwab & Co. "Now the tide is going out, and it's taking out the same boats that it brought in."

The Dow, which closed at 10,792.58, has fallen 7.3 percent since its recent peak on May 10. The S&P 500, which closed at 1236.40, down 15.9, has dropped below its December 2005 close and is down 6.5 percent since the May peak. The technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index, which fell 43.74 to close at 2091.32, is down nearly 10 percent since May.

Among the big losers since that peak: housing-related firms, including KB Home, Home Depot Inc. and Pulte Homes Inc.; and industrial companies such as Caterpillar Inc., Alcoa Inc. and 3M Co.

The speed of the decline has surprised analysts, many of whom still believe that the U.S. economy is in reasonable shape and will continue to grow, albeit at a slower pace.

Hedge funds and other institutional investors may be one reason for the slide, said Dreyfus Corp. chief economist Richard B. Hoey. Over the past decade, these lightly regulated investment pools have exploded in size from $500 million in assets under management in 2000 to more than $1.1 trillion today, and many of them use borrowed money to make short-term trades to try to capitalize on market momentum.

While small investors "tend to react slowly, hoping it will turn around, this leveraged institutional money, when [the market] stops going, they tend to get out fast," Hoey said.

Some market watchers also argue that some investors are worried that the central banks in general -- and the Federal Reserve in particular -- will overreact to the early signs of inflation that emerged last month and raise interest rates high enough to push the U.S. economy into recession.

U.S. investors are waiting for two key monthly economic reports that may give clearer signals about inflation: the producer price index, due to be released Tuesday, and consumer price index, which comes out Wednesday. Most economists expect the core CPI rate, minus energy and food, to be up two-tenths of a percent.

DOJ_NMG_0033465

If it comes in lower "you're going to see a monster rally," predicted Alec Young, equity market strategist for Standard & Poor's. "With every [down] day like this the risk-reward ratio gets more and more favorable, especially for people who didn't have a lot of money in the market run-up of the last three years."

But Schwab's Sonders cautioned that the tighter money supply could continue to put a damper on stock prices. "I don't see a near-term buying opportunity," she said, adding that Schwab is encouraging its customers to keep more money than usual in cash.

Nasdaq Arrives In Correction Zone (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 13, 2006

A month ago, investors focused on the market's multiyear highs and how long-term damage to their portfolios was finally being erased. Now, the focus is on how quickly the bull market is limping toward the rendering plant.

Monday, stock investors got a double dose of bad news as the Nasdaq composite officially entered correction territory. The Nasdaq bled 44 points to 2091, knocking it down 11.8% from its 2006 high in April and down 5.2% for the year. A correction is commonly considered a more than 10% drop from a recent high.

And if that wasn't dire enough, the benchmark Standard & Poor's 500 dipped into the red for 2006 for the first time this year after falling 16 points to 1236. That's down only 1% from where it ended 2005 but a big reversal from its 6.2% gain for 2006 back on May 5.

Troubles with the mainstream Nasdaq and S&P make some suspect what started as a pullback in speculative assets such as commodities, emerging markets and small-company stocks is spreading. That would not be a happy prospect. For example, emerging markets measured by the iShares MSCI Emerging Markets ETF fell 3.7% Monday and have lost 25% since early May.

Talk is quickly morphing into speculation about a possible bear market. Already, the S&P is down 6.7% from its 2006 high and the Dow Jones industrials 7.3%. “This is a first leg of a moderate bear market,” says Charles Blood, strategist at Brown Bros. Harriman.

The troubles suffered by speculative areas of stocks, most recently the Nasdaq, are spreading because of:

·Tighter cash. Ready access to cash, enabled by accommodative global central banks, is ending, says Liz Ann Sonders, strategist at Charles Schwab. “There were tremendous amounts of individual investor, hedge fund and mutual fund money all moving in the same direction,” she says. Now, “Investors of all kinds are rushing to the exits.”

It's happening worldwide. Japan, for instance, has seen its money supply contract by 15% over the past two months, says Michael Holland, chairman of Holland & Co. That leaves less cash to buy “our stocks and commodities,” he says.

·Loser mentality. Hedge funds and other large investors, burned by big bets on commodities that have gone sour, are hoping to end the pain by selling mainstream assets, Holland says. “There is a negative psychology,” he says.

·Leadership vacuum. Even the big tech idols, Microsoft and Intel, are getting hammered as investors frustrated by waiting six years for gains are finally giving up, says Louise Yamada of Louise Yamada Technical Research Advisors.

Sonders says large-company stocks may hold up better than the riskier parts of the markets, as they have historically done. But she warns nothing is safe: “We have not seen a bottom.”

Fed Officials Reveal More Worries About Inflation (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve policymakers continued to sound inflation alarms Monday, strengthening expectations that they will raise interest rates for a 17th-straight time when they meet this month.

“The recent news on inflation troubles me,” Cleveland Fed President Sandra Pianalto said in a speech to members of the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association in Orlando. She noted the so-called core consumer price index, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, rose more than 3% at an annual pace during the first three months of 2006.

“This inflation picture, if sustained, exceeds my comfort level,” she said.

Board Gov. Susan Bies also said inflation data have been coming in high. She said the economy is growing rapidly, while energy prices are high — factors that could add to already elevated price pressures.

“At some point, that's putting pressure” on inflation, Bies told members of the Financial Women's Association here.

The latest inflation talk came a week after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke jolted financial markets when he said inflation had risen to an “unwelcome” level. Stock prices continued falling Monday as investors were unnerved by the Fed officials' latest inflation warnings.

DOJ_NMG_0033466

Earlier this month, investors and economists were evenly split about the chances the Fed would raise interest rates — its weapon against price pressures because higher interest rates curb borrowing and spending — at the next meeting June 28 and 29. Since the chairman's speech, the odds on another quarter-percentage point rate increase have risen significantly.

Helping cement those expectations: Other Fed officials, including Gov. Donald Kohn and the Atlanta Fed's Jack Guynn, also said last week that inflation is above desirable levels.

"It looks like they are all in agreement," says Christopher Rupkey, chief financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi in New York. "They are very afraid of letting inflation get away from them."

Bernanke did not discuss inflation, the economy or the outlook for interest rates in a speech Monday to the American Bankers Association's Stonier Graduate School of Banking, mainly focusing on risk management practices for banks.

Fed officials have raised the target for short-term interest rates 16 times in quarter-percentage point steps over the past two years. That's been partly to remove stimulus the Fed put in place earlier this decade when it lowered rates to bolster a slowing economy.

The Fed's target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, is 5%, the highest in more than five years. But that's considerably below the 6.5% peak hit in the last rate-raising cycle, which ended in 2000. Both Bies and Pianalto said the Fed likely isn't far from the interest rate peak for this cycle. But where that end point is, is unclear.

"If you ask me today, 'Sue, where are you going to stop?' I couldn't tell you," Bies said. "The economy is much stronger if we keep inflation low. That is why we are focusing on it."

More inflation news arrives today when the Labor Department issues data on producer prices in May and Wednesday when it reports on consumer prices. Rupkey says even if the data point to a small amount of inflation, the Fed will raise rates this month.

"It's not so much that inflation is a problem right now, but what about six to nine months from now?" Rupkey says. "Because inflation is so threatening, it's time to take away the punch bowl, because the economic party is in full swing."

Mr. Dummar Is Back, Taking Another Shot At The Hughes Estate (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

Melvin Dummar had long since given up on getting a share of the late billionaire Howard Hughes's fortune. And for good reason: In 1978, Mr. Dummar became a national joke when a Las Vegas jury ruled that the basis for his claim -- a handwritten will that surfaced mysteriously -- was fake.

"I've never really gotten over it," Mr. Dummar says. "For 30 years, everybody just laughed at me and treated me like some kind of criminal, a forger. Until a few months ago, I thought it was a lost cause."

But now Mr. Dummar is back, seeking another day in court and what he considers his rightful share of Mr. Hughes's estate. In a lawsuit filed yesterday, Mr. Dummar claims to have new evidence and a compelling new witness: a pilot who says he flew the late Mr. Hughes to a brothel near where Mr. Dummar claims he happened on to him.

With the suit filed yesterday in federal district court in Salt Lake City, Mr. Dummar began another chapter in one of the wildest estate battles in U.S. history.

When the eccentric billionaire died in 1976, Mr. Dummar (pronounced Doo-MAR) emerged as an improbable heir. He said a will delivered to a gas station he ran in Utah entitled him to $156 million, a reward for the night in 1967 when he said he had found a dazed man face down on a desert road and drove him to Las Vegas. That man, Mr. Dummar claimed, told him he was Howard Hughes.

But Mr. Dummar's tale fell apart at trial. And he got nothing but a dubious place in history, folklore and Hollywood, thanks to the Oscar-winning 1980 film "Melvin and Howard."

Now 61 years old and eking out a living delivering meat along those same desolate Nevada roads, Mr. Dummar is hoping for a real-life sequel. His co-stars this time include an author who once was a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent; a former Hughes pilot who is breaking his silence; a prostitute with a diamond-encrusted tooth; and a lawyer who has a weekly radio show about estate planning.

The lawsuit is based on new evidence that purportedly corroborates Mr. Dummar's claim that Mr. Hughes indeed was in the desert that late-December 1967 night. The defendants are two elderly Hughes beneficiaries: William Lummis, the main family heir, and Frank Gay, a former Hughes executive. Mr. Dummar alleges fraud, unjust enrichment and racketeering during the probate case, and requests $156 million, plus interest since 1978, and punitive damages.

Admitting the odds are long, Mr. Dummar says this won't be a "cakewalk." The new complaint doesn't specifically ask the court to reconsider the validity of the will. Rather, it contends, among other allegations, that Mr. Dummar was cheated out of a fair trial because Messrs. Lummis and Gay allegedly concealed evidence of Mr. Hughes's movements. Mr. Dummar's allies hope that new witnesses and indirect evidence will be enough to generate a settlement, if not a favorable verdict.

DOJ_NMG_0033467

Mr. Lummis, a cousin of Mr. Hughes, declined to comment. At 77, he lives in Houston and serves as a trustee for the nonprofit Howard Hughes Medical Institute. Mr. Gay, 85 and living in the Houston suburb of Humble, also declined to comment. He recently stepped down from the medical institute's board of trustees, his last tie to the Hughes empire.

The original Dummar claim was based on a document dubbed the "Mormon will," because it was disclosed by the Mormon Church. The will divided Mr. Hughes's $2.5 billion estate among several medical, educational and social groups, and relatives and employees. The Mormon Church was to receive one-sixteenth of the fortune, as was "Melvin DuMar."

But his credibility collapsed under attack by Hughes family lawyers. Mr. Dummar admitted he had lied when he said he didn't know about the will. In fact, he had steamed open an envelope left with him but addressed to the president of the Mormon Church. Because he had read it, he knew he was a named beneficiary when he dropped the envelope off at Mormon headquarters in Salt Lake City. The seven-month trial featured dueling testimony by handwriting and ink experts. Moreover, the Hughes entourage argued that the industrialist never left the suite he holed up in at Las Vegas's Desert Inn between 1966 and 1970. Therefore, Mr. Dummar couldn't be telling the truth about his supposed desert encounter with Mr. Hughes.

Broke from the trial and scorned as a con man, Mr. Dummar drifted from job to job and settled in Brigham City, Utah. He started Dummar's Premium Food -- bacon is his best seller -- and makes four-day delivery runs to rural Nevada and Wyoming in a pickup with nearly 400,000 miles of wear, and a broken radio and air conditioner.

Mr. Dummar suffered two bouts of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. In 2002, bald from chemotherapy and bedridden, he had a visit from Gary Magnesen, a former FBI agent who is the brother of a man for whom Mr. Dummar had worked. Mr. Magnesen took an interest in the case. "I was very skeptical of Melvin, but I decided to investigate as a personal challenge," says Mr. Magnesen, who in the FBI had battled organized crime in Las Vegas for 16 years.

At his own expense, Mr. Magnesen tracked down Hughes associates and pored over obscure property deeds. His confidence in Mr. Dummar grew as he developed a theory about why the reclusive billionaire might have ventured to the wasteland northwest of Las Vegas: Mr. Hughes had been buying mines in the area where Mr. Dummar said he found him.

Then a man named Robert Deiro -- once a Hughes Tool Co. pilot -- surfaced with a sexier explanation. Mr. Deiro had long dismissed Mr. Dummar as a charlatan. But in 2004, Mr. Deiro, a Las Vegas businessman, read a story in the Las Vegas Review-Journal that sent him bounding for the telephone to contact Mr. Dummar. A detail in the article, in which Mr. Dummar was interviewed, made him think: "Jesus Christ, this guy's telling the truth!"

That clue was Mr. Dummar's stray reference to finding Mr. Hughes near the Cottontail Ranch brothel. In 1967, Mr. Deiro was managing a North Las Vegas airport owned by Mr. Hughes and occasionally flying the boss on discreet missions. One night between Christmas and New Year's, Mr. Deiro says, he flew Mr. Hughes to the holiday-festooned Cottontail for a regular tryst with Sunny, a redhead who had a diamond in an upper incisor. "You couldn't see it unless she smiled broadly," he recalls. "She was the class of the field."

By Mr. Deiro's account, he fell asleep on a banquette in the brothel's kitchen, waking up around 4 a.m. to be told that his "friend," Mr. Hughes, had left. Mr. Deiro flew back to Las Vegas. No one mentioned the incident, and he never again saw Mr. Hughes or the aide who had arranged the secret flights.

Mr. Deiro says before that fateful night, he and Mr. Hughes had been in frequent contact. They flew together to scout sites for Mr. Hughes's dream: an airport for supersonic airliners.

Having run a side business of "midnight special" flights to brothels from Las Vegas, Mr. Deiro says he assumed that role for Mr. Hughes. On their first jaunt, "I had to get $100 from petty cash, and Hughes took it from me to pay," he recalls. In 1967, he says, he flew the billionaire to meet Sunny twice at Ash Meadows brothel and twice at Cottontail.

Mr. Deiro left Hughes for an aviation job in California that he believes Mr. Hughes arranged. Before he quit Hughes, he says, his boss ripped out pages of his pilot logbook to get rid of records of the brothel runs, and Mr. Deiro says he had to sign a nondisclosure agreement. He decided to go public after the 2004 newspaper article because "I felt instant empathy for Melvin. I realized he'd been diddled," the 68-year-old says.

Mr. Magnesen, the former FBI agent, checked Mr. Deiro's background and worked his account into a book about his investigation, which he published late last year. The revelations would have been little more than consolation to Mr. Dummar had Stuart Stein not read the book and called him.

Mr. Stein is an estate-planning lawyer in Albuquerque. He invited Messrs. Dummar and Magnesen to be guests on his Saturday morning radio show in January. Besides its entertainment value, Mr. Stein felt, the Hughes case was a cautionary tale: Let a professional prepare your will to avoid any probate "silliness." After some research, the 59-year-old lawyer agreed to represent Mr. Dummar. "It's karma coming back to right a terrible wrong," Mr. Stein says.

DOJ_NMG_0033468

It could also make several people very rich if Mr. Dummar wins -- or settles. Mr. Stein, as his lawyer, stands to collect a share. Mr. Magnesen says he will collect 10% of any court award. Mr. Deiro, who says he used to get kickbacks from brothels in his pilot days, says, "I don't have a dog in this hunt. I have my own money."

Getty Book Deal Led To Questions Of Conflict (LAT)

By Ralph Frammolino And Jason Felch, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

Ex-board chairman got contract after leaning on Munitz and others for pay and perks.

Former J. Paul Getty Trust chief Barry Munitz agreed to pay retired Getty board Chairman David Gardner nearly $300,000 to write a coffee-table book after Gardner left the foundation's board in 2004.

Gardner was hired to write the book just months after he intervened on Munitz's behalf to help the chief executive secure a five-year contract rather than the one-year extension some board members favored.

The book deal came after years of pressure from Gardner on Munitz and other Getty officials to find a way to compensate him for his service on the board, records and interviews show. The will of J. Paul Getty, whose oil fortune financed the educational trust that bears his name, specifically stipulates that board members are to serve without pay.

Plans for the book, which was to commemorate the Getty's 25th anniversary, were canceled in March, a month after Munitz resigned amid turmoil at the nonprofit foundation — but not before Gardner had collected $178,000 over 19 months for little work.

Gardner says he produced a rough outline during that time but did not conduct interviews or begin writing. He blamed his lack of progress on the trust, which he said did not provide the necessary cooperation.

Internal Getty documents show that Munitz and his staff were discussing a book deal for Gardner in 2003, while Gardner was chairman and Munitz was negotiating his own contract. Around the same time, Munitz also spoke directly to Gardner about writing a book after he stepped down as chairman, according to two former Getty officials familiar with the discussions. Citing ongoing investigations of the Getty, the officials asked not to be identified.

Munitz and Gardner, a former president of the University of California, deny any impropriety in the book deal.

Several experts on the laws governing nonprofits, however, said that discussions of the book deal while Gardner was chair created a potential conflict of interest, because both men stood to benefit personally from the official actions of the other.

They said that the book deal could also be viewed by tax authorities as a waste of the Getty's charitable assets — because no book was produced — or even as an "inurement," a serious misuse of tax-exempt resources to benefit an insider. Though rarely pursued by the IRS, a finding of inurement can lead to revocation of tax-exempt status.

"This is beyond self-dealing," said Frances Hill, a professor at the University of Miami School of Law. "It's insiders with a sweetheart deal."

Munitz and Gardner, who have known each other for 30 years, say there was no connection between the contract talks and the book assignment.

"There was absolutely no deal or arrangement linking the [book] project and the contract," Munitz said in an e-mail to The Times.

He added that Gardner, who sat on the executive compensation committee, played no direct role in negotiating Munitz's 2004 contract. Like most other board members, Gardner voted in January of that year to approve the committee's recommendation of a five-year pact.

Gardner, who holds a PhD in higher education and has written and edited several books, said he never discussed a possible book project until his last week as chairman in June 2004.

"Such a prospect never came up, until just before I left," said Gardner, 73. He said Munitz first suggested the idea the week before Gardner stepped down, and no deal was finalized until after he was off the board.

Gardner said he has not been asked, nor does he intend, to return the money. He said the questions he raised about compensation and perks were reasonable, and that he enjoyed similar benefits at UC.

John Biggs, the current board chairman and widely considered an authority on corporate governance, said in a recent interview that he was informed in advance about the book deal and raised no objection.

"I think it's the most honorable relationship that I can imagine," said Biggs, adding that the amount paid to Gardner was "peanuts."

Munitz resigned amid an investigation by the state attorney general into allegations that he steered grants to friends, used staff extensively for personal errands and spent the nonprofit's money on expensive or questionable trips. Munitz agreed to pay the Getty $250,000 and to forgo $2 million in severance pay.

DOJ_NMG_0033469

The relationship between Gardner and Munitz goes back to the 1970s, when they were both involved in higher education policy. In 1991, when Munitz came to California to become chancellor of the California State University system, Gardner, then president of the UC system, welcomed him with a reception.

Gardner retired a year later, after the Board of Regents voted in a closed-door session to give him an extra $857,000 in pension benefits. Coming in the midst of a state budget crunch and student fee increases, the deal triggered a public outcry and prompted an outside review that concluded Gardner's administration had acted contrary to "principles of public accountability and public trust."

That year, Gardner was named to the Getty board. He later served on the search committee that picked Munitz for the Getty's top job in 1997. Gardner was chosen as board chairman in 2000.

Several trust officials said Gardner put pressure on Munitz and his staff to find a way to compensate him. "This was a never-ending fixation," said one former senior Getty official. "It was a topic that never went away."

In 1999, Gardner asked Munitz and other trustees about the possibility of changing J. Paul Getty's will to allow board members to be compensated for attending four or five meetings a year and performing other oversight duties. A Getty review prompted by Gardner's request determined that, although many private foundations pay their boards, most museums do not. The Getty is a hybrid, with a trust controlling a museum and related institutes.

The idea was dismissed after an outside attorney for the Getty warned that paying trustees would require going to court to change the will and might draw opposition from the state attorney general.

Gardner continued to push for benefits such as secretarial help and a Getty-financed office in his Park City, Utah, home, but the staff concluded that such perks could violate Getty's will. He ultimately was given a cellphone and a computer.

He then asked for permission to have his wife travel with him on official business at Getty expense. Outside counsel had advised that the travel support might also violate Getty's will. Biggs introduced a rule change intended to get around the restriction by designating spouses of the board chairman and CEO as "senior volunteers" so that their travel could be covered as a business expense, records and interviews show.

"We in fact made an exception for the chairman of the board," Biggs said, conceding it was a stretch. "I think he would have declined to be board chairman" without the perk.

Gardner said he wasn't making demands, only raising unrelated questions about the possibility of changing Getty's will, receiving office support as chairman and having his wife's travel expenses covered.

"Each one seemed to me to be a perfectly reasonable, discrete inquiry, and that's how I approached it," Gardner said. "I didn't say, what can I get out of the Getty?"

Several former Getty officials said that pressure from Gardner for compensation and perks gave staff nowhere to turn with their concerns about Munitz's lavish spending.

"You felt like there's no one to go to," said a former senior official. "It's like the scene in Chinatown where the guy says, 'Why don't you to go the cops?' and the girl says, 'My father owns the cops.' "

By 2002, Munitz had begun having conversations with staff members about finding some kind of paid position for Gardner after he retired from the board, according to the former Getty officials. By 2003, Munitz was also talking generally to Gardner about the book project, two of the former Getty officials said.

Interviews and records show that by June 2003, as the book idea was taking shape, Getty chief of staff Jill Murphy became concerned about the discussions of work for Gardner and brought them to the attention of Getty general counsel Peter Erichsen.

In anticipation of a meeting between Gardner and Munitz, Erichsen issued a memo warning the chief executive to avoid any "formal exploration" of a book deal with Gardner "while he is a trustee and chair of the board."

"To do otherwise," Erichsen wrote, "would expose the trust and its board members to unnecessary legal jeopardy and accusations of self-dealing and conflict of interest, and, worst of all, could embarrass our distinguished chair."

Erichsen pointed to three legal areas that could be troublesome if his advice was ignored: IRS rules prohibiting self-dealing, the prohibition on trustee compensation in Getty's will, and conflict-of-interest law.

Two days later, Munitz and Gardner met to discuss complaints about Munitz's performance. Not long after, according to records and interviews, two key trustees approached Gardner with serious concerns about Munitz's out-of-town travel and his deteriorating relationship with then-museum director Deborah Gribbon.

Trustee Lewis Bernard, a retired Morgan Stanley executive who chaired the compensation committee, wanted to send a warning to Munitz by extending his contract for just one year, Gardner said. Bernard declined to comment for this story.

Gardner said he told Bernard that such a move would "undermine [Munitz's] position at the Getty." Gardner said he coached Munitz on how to be a better manager and then reported back to Bernard and others that Munitz was making progress. By the time the contract vote came up in January 2004, Bernard had changed his mind and recommended that Munitz be given a five-year deal, Gardner said. Gardner signed the contract in February 2004.

Over the next four months, Munitz and Gardner on at least two occasions discussed possible future compensated work for Gardner, a Getty review later found. In the first conversation, they discussed a management consulting job that never came to fruition, the review found.

Munitz's handwritten notes from the second conversation, which took place days before Gardner stepped down as chairman on June 30, show the two discussed the book project and whether the Getty would pay Gardner's wife to work as a researcher or editor, the review later found.

Records show that Munitz wrote Biggs in mid-July to report that Gardner was "willing, indeed happy, to consider taking the lead in writing what we discussed as a … visually attractive 'coffee-table volume' " and accompanying analysis for the board.

Gardner named his price, and Munitz agreed to pay him $8,000 a month for three years starting Sept. 1, 2004. Plans called for him to visit Getty projects in Tunisia, Egypt, China and Italy at trust expense as part of his research, records and interviews show.

Gardner said he met several times with Getty staff to view documents he needed for the project, but he found the records in disarray. The staff eventually sent him a laptop computer containing the records.

Gardner said the trust denied his request for access to its oral history collection, and that Getty officials eventually stopped returning his calls as they dealt with growing controversies.

In the fall, Munitz's staff proposed narrowing the scope of the book to a series of essays, with Gardner as editor and contributor, Gardner said. He realized the more modest effort was also in trouble when he called Munitz at home in early February, only to discover that the chief executive had resigned the day before, he said.

Gardner said he then called Biggs, who subsequently decided to cancel the project. Gardner, who recently moved to Bellevue, Wash., was taken off the payroll March 31, records show.

"I think they compensated me reasonably for what they asked me to do, and the fact that I wasn't able to do it was through no fault of my own," said Gardner. "None."

Federal tax law requires charitable institutions to disclose any transactions that involve self-dealing, the use of tax-exempt dollars for the personal benefit of top officials. The Getty did not report the book deal in its latest tax filing, but after questions from The Times, trust officials said they may amend the return. Biggs said he asked attorneys with Munger, Tolles & Olson to investigate whether the deal involved a quid pro quo between Munitz and Gardner.

During an internal review of the transaction, one person told investigators that the book deal was intended to reward Gardner for his help with Munitz's contract, Biggs said. But he added that the statement "doesn't hold any water" and that the investigation has turned up no credible evidence of a quid pro quo.

"We talked about it and came to the conclusion it was baloney," Biggs said, declining to disclose the details of the claim. "The person's not credible."

Biggs said the decision to terminate Gardner's contract was made because of other controversies engulfing the Getty. The institution is still recovering from the Munitz resignation, and its former antiquities curator is on trial in Rome for allegedly conspiring to buy looted art.

"We decided given what's happening, we didn't think this was a great time to write a history of the Getty," he said.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Anatomy of a deal

Discussions of a $300,000 book deal for J. Paul Getty Trust Chairman David Gardner overlapped with contract negotiations for Getty Chief Executive Barry Munitz's 2004 contract. Experts say the timing raises serious questions.

The chronology:

1992: David Gardner joins the board of the J. Paul Getty Trust.

1997: Munitz is hired as the trust's chief executive. Gardner is on the search committee that picks him.

October 1999: Gardner inquires about changing J. Paul Getty's will to allow for the compensation of trustees.

June 2000: Gardner is named chairman of the board.

January 2001: Munitz's new three-year contract is approved by the full board, granting him a substantial increase in retirement benefits. Gardner sits on the compensation committee and signs the contract.

January 2003: Munitz begins negotiating his next contract. Munitz and his staff also start discussing hiring Gardner to write a Getty book after he leaves the board.

June 2003: Two days before he is scheduled to meet with Gardner, the Getty's general counsel warns Munitz to avoid "formal exploration" of the project with the board chairman.

November 2003: Gardner discourages compensation committee Chairman Lewis Bernard from limiting Munitz's next contract to a one-year extension.

DOJ_NMG_0033471

January 2004: The Getty board approves a five-year contract for Munitz. Gardner votes for it and later signs it.
June 2004: Six days before Gardner retires from the board, Munitz and Gardner discuss the book project in detail.
Sept. 1, 2004: Gardner is put on the Getty payroll at $8,000 per month plus expenses to write the book.
August 2005: California's attorney general opens an investigation into Munitz's use of Getty resources.
February 2006: Munitz resigns as chief executive of the Getty Trust amid allegations he misused trust assets.
March 31, 2006: The book project is canceled by board Chairman John Biggs, after Gardner had been paid $178,000.
Source: Times reporting

Webb, Miller Refuel The Fires (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Chris L. Jenkins
The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

Virginia Senate candidate James Webb rallied supporters yesterday with the Democratic Party's 2004 presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), hoping to spark interest in a primary that is expected to draw a tiny percentage of voters today.

Before about 250 people in Arlington County, Kerry heartily endorsed Webb, President Ronald Reagan's former Navy secretary, saying that the Senate needs the "confident leadership" and "independent thinking" that Webb has offered during the campaign.

Webb's opponent, former lobbyist Harris Miller, spent the afternoon making last-minute phone calls to prospective voters and later held a rally at his Northern Virginia headquarters in McLean.

"We cannot rest. We need to win this election tomorrow so that we can win this election in November and get the country going back in the right direction," Miller told several dozen volunteers.

Both candidates continued to run campaign ads touting their ability to defeat incumbent Sen. George Allen (R) in the fall. Miller's television ads, made possible by his investing $1 million of his personal wealth, hammer Webb on his Republican past.

"The good news for Democrats is that both Miller and Webb have shown they've got the ability to take it to Senator Allen this fall," said former governor Mark R. Warner (D). "I don't think anyone would have thought nine months ago that we would have had two competitive candidates."

Miller and Webb jumped into the void left last year when Warner decided not to challenge Allen. Since then, the two Democratic candidates have waged a spirited and at times nasty campaign that has often involved questions about what it means to be a loyal Virginia Democrat.

In stump speeches and in his campaign commercials, Miller has never missed a chance to remind voters that Webb endorsed Allen in 2000 and campaigned for George Bush that same year. Webb responded by accusing Miller of making campaign contributions to several senior Republican lawmakers, including House of Representatives Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.).

Political observers, and even the candidates themselves, say they do not know how the primary will turn out. Elections officials have said they expect between 3 percent and 5 percent of the state's registered voters to show up at the polls.

"It's impossible to know what's going to happen in this primary," Webb told about a dozen supporters at a downtown Richmond restaurant yesterday afternoon.

Later, he thanked his campaign supporters in a speech in front of his Arlington campaign headquarters. He spent much of his speech attacking President Bush, the Iraq war and Allen for what he described as failed policies.

"We have a country to lead, and the way you lead is to come together and look to the future," he said. "We need to bring an end to the Iraq war. We need to focus on economic fairness for all America. These are the issues I want to bring to the United States Senate."

Kerry also criticized Allen for supporting the war in Iraq. He said Webb would bring a fresh perspective to the Senate.

"He's a man of integrity," Kerry said of Webb during a 10-minute address that often took a populist tone. "He is the kind of person that we need who will speak across party lines, who will reach out to people whether they are Republican, independent or Democrat and talk common sense . . . to America." He called Webb someone who would "bring truth" to the Senate.

"When Jim Webb writes fiction, it's a best-selling book. When George Allen writes fiction, it's a campaign platform," Kerry said.

Miller started yesterday at the crack of dawn, greeting commuters at the Vienna Metro station. Just after lunch, he joined about three dozen campaign volunteers and thanked them for their efforts during the primary battle.

The volunteers had been going through the tedious task of calling to remind prospective voters -- largely those who had cast ballots in recent Democratic primaries -- that they had a chance to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0033472

The college students, senior citizens and Miller's wife, Deborah Kahn, ate pizza, sandwiches and chocolate chip cookies as they listened to the candidate encourage them to keep up their effort for another 24 hours.

"We must get through the challenge of tomorrow," Miller said. "The Democratic Party needs someone at the top of the ticket who can win in November."

A Clash Of Styles In Virginia Vote (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — One is a warrior, the other a wonk. One says he was "born fighting," the other says he was "born to be bringing people together." One was a Republican for decades, the other is a lifelong Democrat.

Candidate A is James Webb, 60, a former Reagan administration Navy secretary who is also a decorated Marine veteran, best-selling novelist (Fields of Fire), award-winning journalist and Hollywood screenwriter (Rules of Engagement). Candidate B is Harris Miller, 54, a former Democratic congressional candidate and county chairman who represented 350 high-tech companies as president of the Information Technology Association of America.

Virginia Democrats will nominate one of them today to take on Sen. George Allen, a former governor and likely Republican presidential candidate. Prominent Senate Democrats — Majority Leader Harry Reid, 2004 presidential nominee John Kerry, Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer, Illinois' Barack Obama — already have made their choice. They say Webb is their "best hope" to gain a seat and hobble Allen's White House ambitions.

Mark Plotkin, a political analyst for Washington's WTOP-radio, calls the senators' intervention "unprecedented." In Webb's Renaissance-man résumé, his GOP past and his macho persona, Plotkin says, top Democrats see "political nirvana" — the return of white, male, rural and military voters to the Democratic Party.

In Miller's corner, The Washington Post. The editorial board called him "better-briefed, better-focused and more thoughtful" than Webb.

Webb and Miller often criticize President Bush's policies and Allen's support for them, but the Allen camp is holding its fire for now. Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, says "there's more to this campaign than not liking President Bush. We'll see who emerges from the Democratic primary and whether they have more to offer."

Allen, known for his cowboy boots, sports metaphors and Reaganesque style, is preparing for a 2008 presidential run. He's traveled to several key states this year and he's scheduled to speak Saturday in Des Moines. But he'll be campaigning for re-election in Virginia all summer, his onetime shoo-in status complicated by a national climate favoring Democrats.

On money, Allen is the clear leader. As of March 31, he had raised $10.4 million, according to the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics. The Democrats were way behind and dipping into personal funds. Webb had raised $253,000 (40% his own), compared with Miller's $537,000 (33% his own).

Webb and Miller disagree on a few issues, but the main contrast between them is style. Webb drives a camouflage-painted Jeep and campaigns in combat boots that belong to his son, a Marine bound for Iraq in fall. "I was raised to lead from when I was a kid," he says.

Miller says his people skills will make him an effective senator. His website is laden with 10- and 15-point plans to solve problems. (By contrast, major issues get just a paragraph apiece from Webb). "I've been accused of being a policy wonk," Miller says. "I plead guilty. U.S. senators are supposed to talk about policy."

Aiming at loyal Democrats most likely to vote in the primary, Miller attacks Webb's votes in 2000 for Allen and Bush. He notes his own long record of helping elect Democrats.

Webb's campaign has tried mightily to reinforce his new Democratic identity. At a spring rally in the Washington suburb of Arlington, Democratic county official Jay Fisette repeatedly referred to Webb as "our guy" — as in, "our guy" opposed the Iraq war before it started and "our guy" believes in the right to choose abortion.

Webb says defense, national security and veterans issues drew him to the GOP, but "I was never comfortable with Republicans on social policy." After the Iraq and Hurricane Katrina debacles, he says, he decided it was time for "new eyes" on national problems.

As for 2000, Webb says it was a mistake to vote for Allen instead of Democratic Sen. Chuck Robb. He says 11 former Robb aides now support him, and he notes that Miller has contributed to prominent Republicans such as House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. Miller says he made the donations — $5,500 vs. $250,000 to Democrats — because his job required bipartisanship.

Conflicts over race and religion have roiled the campaign. Webb called Miller, who is Jewish, "the anti-Christ of outsourcing." Then a Webb brochure, circulated at a union event in southwestern Virginia, caricatured Miller as a hook-nosed "job-killer" with cash spilling from his lapel pocket.

DOJ_NMG_0033473

Miller called the illustration a classic "Jewish financier stereotype." "I do not believe Jim Webb is anti-Semitic," he said, "but clearly there are just elements of what he's done and said that are not ready for prime time."

Webb said the brochure was not anti-Semitic. "I would never engage in that sort of conduct," he said in a debate Friday, but apologized if anyone perceived it that way. He then accused Miller of playing "the race card" by distorting Webb's views on affirmative action. Spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said Webb has always supported affirmative action for African-Americans but believes any broader application should also include poor white people.

Will State Democrats Back D.C.'s Horse? (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 13, 2006

ARLINGTON, VA.

War hero and former Reagan Navy secretary James Webb is the name that Senate Democrats hope will lead the ticket against Republican Sen. George Allen in this fall's election, because they're convinced he could win.

"He's our best hope for defeating Allen in November," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, in a statement last week.

But it's not clear that Virginia Democrats expected to turn out in Tuesday's primary election got the memo.

At an annual dinner on Friday, not a hint of applause from Arlington County Democrats greeted Mr. Webb's announcement that 13 Democratic senators had "stood up and endorsed my candidacy."

"I'm a yellow dog Democrat," explained retired teacher Jean Barton, a Democratic Party activist since the 1960s, in a reference to Southern Democrats' historical pattern of voting for their party's candidates whether they like them or not. "I like to dance with the guy who brought me."

That guy would be high-tech lobbyist and consultant Harris Miller, who was chairing the Fairfax County Democratic Committee when Mr. Webb, a Reagan Democrat, joined the Reagan administration.

"I've known [Mr. Harris] for 20-plus years. He's a Democrat whose values I share," says Mary Margaret Whipple of Arlington, Va., who chairs the state Senate Democratic Caucus.

"It wasn't easy to be a Democrat in Virginia in the 1980s," Mr. Miller told a hometown crowd in the state's most liberal district. He said he has driven more than 24,000 campaign-trail miles in his "hybrid vehicle" since January. He has also contributed nearly $1 million of his own money to his campaign, more than double what Webb has raised for this fight.

But if Webb were to pull off a primary victory, he could expect a surge of national funding to defeat Senator Allen, who is also a probable 2008 presidential contender.

"Webb would be a candidate that Allen cannot afford to ignore," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "Webb can serve as a very useful standard-bearer for the Democratic Party nationally, not just in Virginia. He's exactly the image that Democrats need to project to win in some red states."

Allen, elected to the Senate in 2000, is no longer a sure thing in Virginia, especially if state Democratic voters go with Webb as the challenger, says Jennifer Duffy, who handicaps Senate races for the Cook Political Report.

"Virginia is changing," she says. "It is not a solidly red state anymore."

Allen, she adds, "has been hampered by all the talk of his 2008 ambitions. Webb is a strong candidate because he speaks to all those voters who have a problem with the war." The Allen campaign launched its first TV ads last week.

A decorated marine, award-winning journalist, and author of six best-selling novels, Webb came out in opposition to the war in Iraq, which he characterized as the greatest strategic blunder in modern times, back in September 2002. His antiwar stance could draw antiwar conservatives, as well as libertarians, from the Allen camp.

"If Webb got the nomination, it would be an interesting opportunity for libertarians to think whether they prefer an orthodox, conservative, Bush Republican against an unorthodox antiwar Democrat," says David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank. "He's very critical of the war, but from a perspective that is not far left. It's a patriotic, mainstream, American criticism of the war. He was Reagan's secretary of the Navy, [he's] not [House Democratic leader] Nancy Pelosi."

Webb and Harris both oppose the war, but Webb did so earlier and publicly. The war would turn troops into "terrorist targets," and there was not an exit strategy "because the principal architects of this war did not intend for us to leave," he said last week during a debate with Harris on MSNBC's "Hardball."

They also take bookend positions on outsourcing of US jobs, especially high-tech jobs. Miller, a former president of the Information Technology Association of America, says outsourcing is good for the economy. Webb promises to stop good jobs from being exported overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0033474

But asked at the end of the MSNBC debate whether he would endorse Hillary Rodham Clinton or popular former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D) for the presidency in 2008 - a no-brainer for a Virginia Democrat - Webb said he was undecided.

"He's undisciplined as a candidate," says Ms. Duffy of the Cook Political Report.

While Harris has focused his campaign on traditional Democratic groups, Webb is counting on support from new voters, many recruited from the blogosphere.

In a race with no polling, and with the turnout percentage among Democrats expected to be in single digits, it's tough to predict the outcome. "If voters behave the way the textbook says they do, then Miller wins," she adds. "If voters start to contemplate electability, than Webb wins."

The Sway Of Senate Leaders Is Put To The Test In Virgina (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, June 13, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate Harris Miller spent a lot of time this past weekend glad-handing at Northern Virginia Metro stations, just a few stops from both the place he is trying to get to and the place that is standing in his way — Capitol Hill.

Meanwhile, Miller's Virginia primary opponent, Jim Webb, took the slate of Washington endorsements he has recently received from high-profile senators and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and made his final push for today's Democratic primary farther south.

The race to take on incumbent Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) this November is shaping up to be a test of how much influence Washington has on local politics across the Potomac River.

Miller noted that he has previously spent a good deal more time outside of Northern Virginia than inside it, traveling dozens of times to places like Norfolk and Hampton Roads. But he said the votes around the Beltway will play big today.

"Clearly, a large percentage of the votes are going to come from Northern Virginia — probably a third or more," said Miller, a businessman and lobbyist. "At the end of the day, there are a lot of voters up here."

Webb, a war hero and author who was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan and recently became an anti-war Democrat, has gathered endorsements from nine Democratic senators, including Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), 2004 presidential candidate John Kerry (Mass.) and senior senators Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Carl Levin (Mich.). He also has the support of Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), 2004 presidential candidate Gen. Wesley Clark and three well-known former senators.

The rare, last-minute backing of DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) last week, though, topped it all off. The move is seen as an indication that Webb would receive more national attention and help than Miller would in the Democrats' quest to unseat Allen.

Indeed, national Democrats aren't saying Webb is the better candidate so much as that he is the candidate better able to defeat Allen. A Rasmussen poll from April shows Webb trailing Allen by 20 points, while an earlier Zogby poll showed him behind by seven. Webb was closer than Miller in both polls.

Primary endorsements from national committees are rare and potentially embarrassing, Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report said. Just last week, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) repeatedly lampooned its House Democratic counterpart for endorsing primary loser Steve Filson in California's 11th District. Filson lost June 6 by nearly a 2-to-1 ratio.

The NRCC has also criticized the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) for its support of two other primary losers — Andrew Horne in Kentucky's 3rd District and Joe Sulzer in Ohio's 18th — though the DCCC says it remained neutral in both races. Sulzer finished third, and Horne did only slightly better than Filson.

Duffy said the decisionmakers at the DSCC "are sticking their neck out" for Webb.

"If you're them, maybe it's worth taking the gamble," she said. "But if Webb is the nominee, they're going to have to work with him a lot."

Miller, on the other hand, received his biggest national endorsement from Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), who offered it before Webb joined the race and said Webb would also be a "good alternative" to Allen.

Moran said that he is not heavily involved in Miller's campaign and that he understands why national Democrats are pushing Webb.

"I think they're looking at his résumé, and they think Webb has an interesting story to tell," Moran said. "Harris Miller is seen as the urban sophisticate in some people's minds."

Rep. Bobby Scott (D-Va.), who hasn't endorsed either candidate, downplayed the effect national Democrats like himself can have on Virginia voters: "Usually, Virginians make up their own minds."

That's what Miller is counting on. He touts support from dozens of state lawmakers, mayors and council members and said that, while national Democrats throw their support to Webb, local politicians have been hitting the ground for him.

DOJ_NMG_0033475

"Chuck Schumer's a good senator for New York City, and Harry Reid's a nice senator for Las Vegas," Miller said. "But I have the support of the people here in Virginia, and those are the people that count.

"[Local leaders] have the lists. They're calling out their troops to support me too. And that's what really counts on Election Day."

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said the national endorsements have overshadowed the amount of local support Webb has received — almost 50 local Democratic elected officials and 2,800 daily volunteers.

"I challenge the Miller campaign to come up with anything close to that number [of volunteers]," Todd said. Miller spokeswoman Taylor West said the campaign has exceeded every goal it's had for volunteer support.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer declined to say how the committee's backing of Webb translates into physical or monetary support for the final weekend of the campaign. Of the decision to support Webb's coming as late as it did, he said it was simply "the right time for us to mix in, and so we did."

While Webb has carved out a niche with the national support, help from bloggers and his personal biography, Miller's superior fundraising and political experience have helped him run a traditional campaign that many say would be just fine under other circumstances. He has outraised Webb more than 2-1.

Tuesday's primary is expected to be close, though Webb has touted sizable victories in several straw polls around the state, including Fairfax County in Northern Virginia.

Allen, who is running unopposed in the GOP primary, ran television ads over the weekend touting him as "independent" and a "common sense" leader.

Schumer Gets Cold Shoulder For Endorsement (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

It's not yet clear whether New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer's endorsement of James Webb over Harris Miller in today's Democratic Senate primary in Virginia will help move votes. But it did move money -- away from Schumer and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee he leads.

The DSCC's decision to break with custom and wade into a primary battle on behalf of a Reagan administration official against a longtime Democratic loyalist outraged many influential Democrats, including some who raise a lot of money that now won't be going to the DSCC.

The most immediate fallout of Schumer's endorsement was the relocation of a post-primary fundraiser for the DSCC that was scheduled to be at the home of former lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer Jr. and his wife, Megan. The longtime Democratic fundraisers are Miller supporters. The Beyers begged off after Schumer's move, for which they received no advance notice.

The event will be at another venue, but is likely to bring in considerably less money as irritated Miller backers join the Beyers in taking a pass on helping the DSCC.

Phil Singer, communications director at the DSCC, said his organization does not discuss internal fundraising matters.

Schumer, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and some other Washington Democrats believe that Webb, a former Republican and an opponent of the Iraq war, would be a more electable nominee against Sen. George Allen (R-Va.). Miller has focused his campaign more locally, touting his endorsements from Virginia leaders and his record of working to elect Democrats. Fueled by his own money, Miller has flooded the radio airwaves with ads attacking Webb's Democratic bona fides, pointing out that he endorsed Allen over Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

Beyer said the DSCC should have stayed out. "They've dug a hole that was unnecessary," he said. "If Harris wins, they are going to look ridiculous. They will have irritated an awful lot of people."Iowa Still Loves Edwards

The Des Moines Register recently released the results of a poll of likely 2008 Democratic caucus participants that established John Edwards -- not Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) -- as the current Iowa front-runner. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator and 2004 vice presidential nominee, took 30 percent to Clinton's 26 percent.

John Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, garnered 12 percent, while Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack had 10 percent. Other candidates who are expected to enter the 2008 Democratic presidential contest, such as former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner and Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.), garnered single-digit support.

Edwards finished a strong second behind Kerry in the 2004 Iowa caucuses and has never shut down his operation there. (Several top Edwards aides in Iowa are involved in Secretary of State Chet Culver's 2006 gubernatorial campaign.) Edwards spent Sunday and yesterday campaigning and raising money for Culver and Bruce Braley, the Democratic nominee in the open 1st Congressional District.

DOJ_NMG_0033476

If Edwards was the clear winner in the Register poll, the most obvious loser was Vilsack, who could do no better than fourth in his home state. While few political observers expect Vilsack to be able to equal or surpass Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's 76 percent showing in the 1992 Democratic caucuses, anything other than a victory in the state in the 2008 caucuses would almost certainly cripple the governor's chances in New Hampshire and beyond.

Miller, Webb Await Verdict In Primary (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The two Democrats vying to unseat Sen. George Allen have spent more than $1 million leading up to today's Democratic primary in Virginia.

The outcome will show how well Harris N. Miller, a former information-technology executive from McLean, and James H. Webb Jr., former Navy secretary under President Reagan, have pinpointed who will turn out at the polls today.

"You can't predict it," Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran from Falls Church, told The Washington Times last month.

Polls will be open from 6 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Both campaigns agree it is tough to forecast who will show up at the polls because voter turnout in primaries tends to be low. For example, in the 2005 Democratic primary for lieutenant governor, 115,379 people voted, which was less than 3 percent of the 4.4 million registered voters in Virginia.

Kristian Denny-Todd, a spokeswoman for Mr. Webb, said it also is difficult to target voters because Virginia does not require voters to register with a party, so anyone from any party can vote. And there have been a limited number of statewide Democratic primaries for federal office.

"It's not easy in Virginia," Mrs. Denny-Todd told The Times. "These kinds of primaries are few and far between."

That means "there is a huge influence to be had with a good get-out-the-vote operation," said Taylor West, a spokeswoman for Mr. Miller.

Both camps have analyzed poll numbers in previous primary elections and the 2004 presidential election, and taken into account an estimated 500,000 residents who moved to Virginia since Mr. Allen was elected in 2000.

"There is also a little bit of extra attention because of George Allen, who might run for president," Mrs. Denny-Todd said.

"So we make the assumption that a few more people might come out because George Allen has voted for [President] Bush 97 percent of the time."

Both campaigns have scrambled to raise money. As of May 25, Mr. Miller had raised $1.2 million -- of which $675,000 is his own money -- and Mr. Webb has raised $547,000 -- which includes a $100,000 loan.

The winner of today's primary will face an uphill battle against Mr. Allen, who has more than $7 million in his campaign war chest. Independent Green Party candidate Gail Parker, a retired federal employee from Alexandria, also is running.

In other primaries today, Democrats Andrew L. Hurst and Ken Longmyer face off for their party's nomination to run against Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, and Republicans Mark W. Ellmore and Tom M. O'Donoghue will challenge each other for their party's nomination to try to unseat Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat.

A Week Of Blessings For A GOP Majority That Needed Them (RC)

By David Winston

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

That sound you heard all over Washington, D.C., last Wednesday morning was Republicans breathing a huge collective sigh of relief that Republican Brian Bilbray had defeated Democrat Francine Busby in the special election to fill California's 50th district House seat. That GOP victory, however, was just the first in a series of political and policy events that challenged the prevailing conventional wisdom and sent Democrats scurrying to their spin doctors for something — anything — positive to say about what quickly turned into a 72-hour political nightmare.

It began with Busby's loss. For weeks, Democrats had been positioning for a win in this GOP-leaning seat, asserting that the "culture of corruption" would claim its first of many GOP victims thanks to the bribery conviction of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.).

Instead, Bilbray won the special election against Busby, who, despite the national hype, eked out only 45 percent of the vote — roughly the same percentage that the past two Democratic presidential candidates managed in the district. Clearly, predictions that voters would be outraged over Republican "corruption" and were ready to flock to the Democratic fold were wildly overblown.

DOJ_NMG_0033477

Voters were indeed unhappy, but the target of their ire was another national issue: immigration. And on this topic, Busby was on the wrong side of the majority, particularly when she dropped her bombshell comment that illegal immigrants "don't need papers to vote." This from a candidate offering herself up as an ethical alternative to corrupt Republicans.

It was Bilbray who reflected the immigration views of the majority of voters — a focus on securing the border first, a view that separated him publicly from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and his "comprehensive" position. On Wednesday, Democrats woke up to find that a seat they thought was in their grasp had slipped through their fingers.

If Democrats are to have any hope of winning back the House in November, California's 50th district is exactly the kind of seat they have to win. Yet they failed to do so, despite pouring millions into a district that had been represented by the House's poster boy for political corruption. What Democrats forgot is that when you try to nationalize an election, as they did using the "culture of corruption" mantra, winning candidates must offer voters more than an attack strategy. They also must have a platform of ideas that voters care about — a fact that Republicans understood in 1994.

But the loss of the special election was only the beginning of a bad week for Democrats. By Thursday, they once again found themselves on the defensive when good news arrived from Iraq — news too big to be ignored. Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the most wanted terrorist in Iraq, had been killed by U.S. military air strikes on the same day that the new Iraqi government had filled its last and most important cabinet posts, Defense and Interior.

While many Democrats praised the military for their success, it was the outspoken and harsh comments of some in the party that put the media spotlight on the Democrats' schizophrenic view of the war. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) said, "I don't think we can win this," while Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) predicted, "Two weeks from now you're going to be showing people ripped off buses and beheaded."

Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.) won the prize, however, with his over-the-top comment that "this is just to cover Bush's [rear] so he doesn't have to answer" for the deaths of Iraqi civilians killed by the U.S. military. Other Bush critics such as The Nation's David Corn tried desperately to downplay the significance of Zarqawi's death by describing this most powerful of terrorists as "something of a sideshow." Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) called Zarqawi a minor part in a "growing anti-American insurgency" and called for the U.S. to get out. This kind of naysaying about an undeniably important military victory won't sit well with most Americans.

But if Thursday was bad for Democrats, by Friday, things had gotten even worse. Rumors of serious rifts in the House Democratic leadership burst into the open Friday as an apparently clairvoyant Murtha announced his intention to seek the Majority Leader's job if Democrats win the House in November. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) did nothing to stop what was sure to be seen by Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and his supporters as a leadership "coup."

Pelosi, still clinging to her "culture of corruption" strategy despite the Busby loss, had on Thursday evening tried and failed, at least temporarily, to oust the ethically challenged William Jefferson (D-La.) from his Ways and Means Committee post. In reality, she did little more than remind Americans about Democratic corruption while in the process angering the Congressional Black Caucus.

Murtha's announcement only added to the perception that the Democratic House leadership is in disarray — hardly unified behind a national strategy or agenda to win in November. For Murtha to fire a shot over Hoyer's bow almost five months before an election is a gift that Republicans hadn't counted on.

Hoyer — who, unlike Pelosi, seems to have a better grasp of electoral reality — probably hadn't counted on it either. Interestingly, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, took great pains Sunday on ABC's "This Week" to avoid taking a position on the Murtha bid — a bit of a surprise from the Democrats' usually pragmatic "Enforcer."

In 1997, as a member of the leadership senior staff, I saw the impact of an attempted leadership "coup" on the morale and management of a House majority. It wasn't pretty, and it certainly didn't produce positive election results. The 1998 elections, in which the GOP lost seats counter to historical trends, offered proof that dissension can trigger negative outcomes.

Whether Pelosi was behind Murtha's move or simply let it happen, the prospect of one of the House's most hard-core liberals teaming with one of its most strident anti-war Democrats as the "face" of the Democratic Party this fall has Republicans smiling for a change.

One good week, however, doesn't mean the GOP won't face a big challenge in November. It will, and most GOP leaders understand that. But for Republicans who have suffered through a long spell of bad news, they were grateful that Democrats reminded the country last week why it remains a minority party.

David Winston is president of The Winston Group, a Republican polling firm.

Texas Democrat Faces Uphill Fight (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

DOJ_NMG_0033478

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

FORT WORTH, Texas -- State Democrats emerged from their convention here over the weekend with conviction and verve, but they still face an uphill battle to take back the governor's mansion.

Chris Bell, the one-term congressman from Houston who was gerrymandered out of his district in 2002, is the party's choice to oppose Republican Gov. Rick Perry. Mr. Perry is seeking his second full term.

Mr. Bell, 46, said he could win if the party faithful would stick together.

The Houston Democrat certainly needs that, but his own campaign workers concede that few voters have ever heard of Mr. Bell, making name recognition a dominant theme in the campaign.

"If we don't solve this problem," said Bell spokesman Jason Stanford, "then nothing else matters."

Texas Monthly magazine recently nicknamed the likable Mr. Bell "Sisyphus," after the mythological Greek figure who spent most of his life unsuccessfully trying to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain.

But Mr. Bell is an optimist, and he was buoyed by the excitement of an estimated 6,000 people who packed the convention. He told them that he would lead a "new Texas revolution" to make the state's school and health systems among the best in the nation.

He urged delegates to embrace "the party's traditional core issues of education and health care" as the key to winning in November.

The 2006 governor's race is one of the most interesting -- and probably the most unpredictable -- in recent memory. There are likely to be five candidates -- Republican incumbent Mr. Perry; Mr. Bell; two independent candidates, Carole Keeton Strayhorn and Kinky Friedman; and Libertarian James Werner.

Mr. Perry has led most every early poll, hanging solidly at 35 percent to 40 percent. Mrs. Strayhorn -- once a Democrat, then a Republican, now independent -- usually has placed second.

Mr. Bell finished second in a March poll commissioned by the Wall Street Journal, getting 21 percent of public support to Mr. Perry's 36 percent, with Mrs. Strayhorn and Mr. Friedman at 19 percent and 17 percent, respectively.

To win the office, a majority of the vote is not needed. The candidate with the most votes wins. Some say that unless there is a huge turnout, the next governor could garner less than 40 percent of the vote.

Although his campaign says name recognition is Mr. Bell's biggest hurdle, there seems little doubt that money is also a problem.

Campaign-expense reports won't be made public for a few days, but Bell staffers privately say he has raised "more than $1 million." Mr. Perry reported more than $9 million before the March primary election, and Mrs. Strayhorn came in at more than $8 million. Mr. Bell had only about $100,000 at that point.

"He's got to find some deep pockets, or he can't compete," said Ray Gravely, a San Antonio salesman. "Texas is so vast. It costs so much to run."

'08 Hopefuls May Cause Leaders Fits (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 13, 2006

With an extraordinary 11 sitting Senators seriously eyeing a bid for the White House in 2008, both parties are already dealing with logistical and personality headaches as the lawmakers use the chamber as a testing ground for their competing agendas.

At least five Republican and six Democratic Senators are currently looking at the idea of mounting presidential campaigns — the most in recent memory. And, at least one other Member of Congress, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), is considered a possible candidate.

"It's going to be an absolute circus," acknowledged one GOP Senate aide. "There's going to be a lot of thumping of the chests, a lot of third-person speaking."

On the Democratic side, Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), Joseph Biden (Del.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Russ Feingold (Wis.) and John Kerry (Mass.) already are viewed as committed contenders. Despite his protests, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) is also seen by some observers as a possible candidate, although many believe he is disinclined to run in 2008.

The early Republican field includes Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), who is retiring after this Congress, as well as Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and George Allen (Va.).

While none of the dozen or so Members has formally launched campaigns, the groundswell of interest from sitting lawmakers makes it likely they will surpass the most recent high-water mark for Members seeking the White House, set in 1972 when nine Members of Congress officially launched bids. Then, five Senators and four House Members threw their hats in the ring, resulting in the nomination of South Dakota Democrat George McGovern, the last sitting Senator to win either party's nomination until Kerry accomplished the feat in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0033479

Aides and Senators from both parties said managing the presidential hopefuls' egos will be tricky at a time when both parties are banking on heightened unity to gain an election-year advantage on the issues of the day. But those sources are quick to note that personalities always play a role in the Senate regardless of whether a lawmaker is aspiring for another office.

As such, leaders in both parties recognize there is little they can do to restrain individual Senators as they seek to carve out their presidential platforms. But several senior Senate aides said leadership continues to press the case internally that sticking together — at least through this high-stakes election year — is a priority.

"Right now, '06 is keep people pretty unified," said one GOP Senate aide. "Next year it will be a much bigger problem."

Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.), the GOP Conference chairman and candidate for Majority Whip in the 110th Congress, said the real difficulties are likely to develop in the months leading up to the major presidential primaries when Senators are spending more time on the campaign trail than on the floor. Ensuring that Senators are present for key votes will be the pressing issue for leadership on both sides of the aisle, he said. The fact that the chamber could be even more closely divided in 2007 only exacerbates that.

"Counting votes will be the struggle," said Santorum, stressing he personally has no plans to pursue the White House in 2008. "There could be a big logistical challenge as we approach the next Congress."

Santorum harkened back to 2004, when Democrats Kerry and then-Sen. John Edwards (N.C.), then the minority party's ticket for president, were often absent as they campaigned across the country.

Those two had squared off, among others, against two House Members and two other Senators for the Democratic nomination. Then-Rep. Richard Gephardt (Mo.), Rep. Dennis Kucinich (Ohio), then-Sen. Bob Graham (Fla.) and Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) also had hopes of knocking off President Bush in 2004.

Santorum said that depending on the outcome of the November election, the vote- casting problems could even be heightened next year if the margins of Republican to Democratic control narrow. Many observers predict Democrats will at least close the 55-44 gap in November, meaning that even one Senator's vote could tip the scales on key votes.

"Who knows what the situation will be," Santorum said, but "under the worst-case scenario" leadership could have serious challenges to overcome.

A former aide to then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) said that inevitably "it gets more difficult when you have people staking out differences and positions as they run or try to position themselves to run." The aide said that for Democrats, led by now-Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), "the biggest challenge is managing egos — that's the hardest part of the job in the Senate — managing everyone.

"They really think they are the smartest person in the room and know better than everyone else."

In the nearer term, the Republicans have had a unique set of circumstances as Frist toys with a presidential bid of his own. Several Senate aides said the next six months are likely to be awkward for the GOP Conference as Frist pushes a propspective vote-courting agenda, as well as an election-year platform designed to sustain the party's majorities.

"Sen. Frist still needs to demonstrate to his colleagues that he can run this place," said a senior GOP aide.

Some believe that once Frist leaves office, the job of managing presidential hopefuls will become simpler on the Republican side knowing that the majority leader's White House bid rests largely on his stewardship of the Senate.

Others, however, believe the task will become more difficult since the contenders will inevitably kick their campaigns into high gear.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.), the No. 4 Senate Democrat as Caucus secretary, said she believes, at least on the Democratic side, that leadership will be able to keep the contenders in check through 2008. She said Senators are in sync on the vast majority of the party's priorities and will stick together moving through the cycle as they oppose the GOP-Bush agenda.

"Certainly there are always challenges, but on our side of the aisle there is real unity for what we stand for and what we are fighting for," she said. "It will sort itself out. I'm not worried about it."

Kerry said he doesn't fear that the number of Senators running for the White House will hamstring progress in the chamber, although he acknowledged that it is a time-consuming venture and in many ways "a full-time job."

"You have to decide which votes are the most important, and obviously you will miss a few," Kerry said. "But it is an important aspect of public life."

While clearly not a discouraging factor, few Senators in the nation's history have ascended from Capitol Hill to Pennsylvania Avenue. In fact, the last Member of Congress to win the slot was then-Sen. John Kennedy (D-Mass.), who secured the presidency in 1960.

But 2008 is shaping up to be a rare election year since Bush is a lame-duck president whose second in command, Vice President Cheney, is not running to succeed him.

DOJ_NMG_0033480

While keeping coy about his presidential plans, Allen said his approach to the Senate remains consistent — keeping focus as a Virginia Senator on the issues and values about which he has fought as governor and now in Congress. When asked about how the number of White House candidates could affect the Senate in the coming months, Allen would only say that it inevitably creates more commitments.

"You end up getting more invitations to different places, to speak here or there across the country," he said.

Biden agreed, noting that even on the Foreign Relations Committee, on which he serves as ranking member, at least three other Senate Democrats and two other Republicans are possible contenders.

But Biden said that for him, individually, 2008 is a different climate than in 1988 when he first ran as a younger, more junior Senator who lacked the profile he enjoys now both in stature and on national security issues. Plus, he said, it is easier to run as a member of the minority party simply because the Republicans control, set and manage the Senate floor.

"For all those reasons, it is more manageable to be a responsible Senator than it was 20 years ago," Biden said.

In Kansas, A Troubling Fissure For GOP (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, June 13, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan. — Mark Parkinson got his start in Republican politics at age 19, as a precinct committeeman. He served six years as a Republican state legislator, eventually becoming state Republican chairman.

But two weeks ago, Parkinson announced he was running for lieutenant governor — as a Democrat. He said he no longer felt welcome in the increasingly conservative Kansas Republican Party.

Parkinson became the third Republican politician in the last nine months to startle this red state by switching to the minority party. The other two are targeting GOP incumbents in the attorney general's office and in the state House of Representatives.

Political observers say the fracture within the Kansas GOP may foreshadow the future for the national party. The division between moderates and social conservatives is expected to define the contest for the party's 2008 presidential nomination.

Kansas has been at the forefront of the culture wars that helped the Republican Party gain national dominance this decade. Twice in the last seven years, its Board of Education voted to teach alternatives to evolution in public schools. Voters in 2005 overwhelmingly approved a ban on gay marriage. The state's attorney general last year subpoenaed medical records of abortion patients.

"A lot of people in Kansas are feeling lost right now," said Parkinson, 48, who was invited onto the ticket by popular Democratic incumbent Gov. Kathleen Sebelius. "I decided I'd rather spend time building great universities than wondering if Charles Darwin was right."

Moderates who emphasize economic development and religious conservatives concerned with limiting abortion and gay rights have battled for more than a decade for control of the Kansas Republican Party, which dominates the state with 48% of registered voters. The remaining voters are split evenly between Democratic and Independent registration.

In 1994, when the GOP won both houses of Congress for the first time in 40 years, a group of religious conservatives in Kansas ousted the moderates who ran the party. The intramural squabbling grew so great that four years later, the then-chair of the party unsuccessfully ran against the moderate Republican governor.

Today, websites for some county branches of the party instruct on how to identify RINOs — Republicans In Name Only — and keep them from gaining influence. Social conservatives have solidified their power over the party and are especially influential in low-turnout primaries and local elections. Increasing numbers of moderates like Parkinson are saying they've had enough.

Alan Cigler, a political science professor at the University of Kansas, compares the intra-party turmoil to the national schism between business-friendly moderate Republicans and cultural conservatives over illegal immigration.

"The state is kind of dividing up," Cigler said. "It's the Christian right versus the business interests of the Republican party. That's what Kansas is all about now."

The Kansas Republican Party, Cigler said, "has been ahead of the curve."

Ron Freeman, executive director of the state GOP, says the recent defections are due to the personal ambitions of the politicians, not because of any ideological shift.

"To say it's gone way to the right, that's not a fair analysis," Freeman said, noting that two of the party's four statewide officeholders back abortion rights.

One of those officials, Insurance Commissioner Sandy Praeger, is opposed in the GOP primary by a candidate opposed to abortion rights. Another moderate, Secretary of State Ron Thornburg, is facing a primary challenge from a female GOP state senator who was reported in 2001 as saying family values began to erode when women got the right to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0033481

Some Kansas voters say they feel shut out. "I'm absolutely fed up with the conservative Republicans," said Richard Meidinger, a retired physician in Topeka. "All the abortion stuff, gay marriage stuff doesn't belong in the legislative debate."

Martin Hawver has a name for lifelong members of the GOP like Meidinger: "failed Republicans." The editor of a respected Kansas political newsletter, Hawver's Capitol Report, Hawver counts himself among their number, occasionally doing the unthinkable and voting Democratic.

"It used to be you could never go wrong with voting for who the Republicans nominated," Hawver said. "But that's changing now. People are a little uneasy."

Cindy Neighbor is one of them. A veteran member of her local school board and a moderate, Neighbor, 57, unsuccessfully ran against a conservative for an open seat in the statehouse in 2000. She narrowly lost, but won in 2002.

Neighbor wasn't long for Kansas Republican politics, however. She backed an education bill that could have raised taxes, and party conservatives told her there would be retaliation. She lost the next primary to the same representative she'd ousted two years earlier. Another moderate Republican who'd co-sponsored her bill — Bill Kassebaum, the son of former Kansas U.S. Sen. Nancy Kassebaum Baker — was ousted at the same time.

Now Neighbor's running for her old seat — as a Democrat.

"It was, 'If you don't like this — goodbye,' " she said of her struggles to stay in the Republican Party. As a Democrat, Neighbor added, "you can still have your ideas and you're accepted."

Paul Morrison, the 51-year-old district attorney of the state's largest county, also switched to the Democratic Party. The laconic Morrison, who served as Johnson County's top prosecutor for 17 years, said he'd never been particularly partisan but thought the Democratic Party was "a better fit" for challenging state Atty. Gen. Phill Kline.

An outspoken evangelical, Kline has gained national attention for subpoenaing records of patients who had abortions at two Kansas clinics, as well as for saying that state social workers and psychologists are required to report teenagers who admit they have sex so law enforcement can conduct child abuse investigations. Morrison criticized Kline for "forging a public policy that fits a narrow agenda that most people don't agree with."

Whitney Watson, a spokesman for Kline, dismissed Morrison's challenge and noted that all of Kansas' county sheriffs, including some Democrats, had endorsed Kline. "It's unfortunate that Mr. Morrison believes that protecting Kansas children … is a peripheral issue," Watson said.

When Morrison announced he was challenging Kline last fall, Parkinson, a longtime friend, endorsed him. Parkinson said he figured it was the end of his political career. So the former GOP chairman and legislator was surprised to get a call from the Sebelius campaign exploring whether he'd join the governor's ticket.

Sebelius, whose Cabinet includes a former Republican governor, said she contacted Parkinson because she knew him from his time in the Legislature, not because of his party. Democrats in Kansas, she said, have a natural inclination to reach across party lines.

"Even if 100% of Democrats vote for something," Sebelius said, "it won't happen unless you can draw out Republicans."

Area Candidates Embrace A Visit By Laura Bush (PHI)

By Cynthia Burton

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 13, 2006

As Republican candidates around the country avoid appearances with President Bush or Vice President Cheney, two in the Philadelphia area - U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Senate challenger Thomas H. Kean Jr. in New Jersey - welcome visiting Laura Bush today with open war chests.

"Laura Bush is safe," Republican political consultant Dave Murray said.

People don't blame her for the war in Iraq, rising gasoline prices, or unpopular administration policies.

"It's a simple matter of arithmetic. Her numbers are better," said Democratic consultant David Axelrod, who has worked for U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D., N.Y.) and Mayor Street. "Despite her husband's travails, she remains an enormously popular figure."

She also helps raise money.

Laura Bush is scheduled to appear this morning at a fund-raising breakfast for Santorum at the Appleford Estate in Villanova. Santorum is hoping for 300 attendees and $400,000, according to spokeswoman Virginia Davis.

Bush also is to attend an afternoon reception for Kean at a law office in Lakewood, N.J., where the Kean campaign expects as many as 500 guests and at least $500,000 in contributions, which it will split with the New Jersey Republican Committee.

Kean and Santorum have avoided being seen with icons of the Bush administration, whose popularity has plunged in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Polls show about 80 percent are favorable toward Laura Bush, while approval ratings of her husband and Cheney are in the low 30s.

DOJ_NMG_0033482

Santorum, who trails Democrat Bob Casey Jr. in opinion polls, ducked the president at recent Pennsylvania appearances.

Kean famously was "stuck in traffic" and was late for a March fund-raiser featuring Cheney in Newark, N.J.

Laura Bush has stumped for other Senate and House candidates in North Carolina, New Mexico, Missouri, Vermont and Connecticut.

"I have been pleasantly surprised on this fund-raiser," said Republican lion Lawrence Bathgate, host of today's Kean event.

He said Democrats also planned to attend, though with tickets bought by their companies or Republican associates.

"Whether you're a Republican or a Democrat or an independent, one thing about her is she is absolutely a very, very nice person," said Bathgate, who has raised money for President Bush, Bush's father, Kean's father, and President Ronald Reagan. "And she is a good wife and a good mother. She's not trying to run the country."

Kean may not be able to duck the president for long. He trails his Democratic opponent, U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez, in the money race, and the president is a prodigious fund-raiser.

Kean campaign spokeswoman Jill Hazelbaker said, "There have been no discussions about having fund-raisers with the president."

According to Aaron McLear, regional press secretary for the Republican National Committee, the president has raised $125 million at 37 events for candidates in this election cycle. Cheney has hauled in $22 million from 66 events. Laura Bush has brought in $8.2 million at 17 events.

Murray, who has worked for Kean's father - a former governor - and former Gov. Christie Whitman, said that if the opposition wanted to link Kean with the Bush administration, it would just go ahead and do it.

"Politicians are very image-conscious," Murray said, reflecting on the distance Kean and Santorum have tried to keep between themselves and the administration. "They believe in guilt or credit by association."

Menendez was appointed to the Senate seat vacated by Gov. Corzine.

He and Kean have launched a vigorous battle and have agreed to two televised debates before the end of the month. So far, Menendez has raised more than $7.1 million to Kean's $2.6 million.

In Pennsylvania, Santorum and Casey have attacked each other for months. So far, Santorum has raised about $16 million to Casey's $8 million.

Traffic Alert

Laura Bush is scheduled to appear at a fund-raising breakfast today for U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.) at the Appleford Estate in Villanova and at an afternoon reception for New Jersey U.S. Senate candidate Thomas H. Kean Jr. at a law office in Lakewood, N.J.

Expect major roads in those areas to be shut down for her motorcade. Check traffic reports before heading out on the road.

More Adults Are Finding Time To Volunteer (WT)

By Stefanie Hausner

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Volunteerism is on the rise as 5.6 million more Americans donated their time last year than in 2002, a recent study found, with women besting men in every state.

A federal study on state volunteerism, released yesterday by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS), found that 65.4 million (28.8 percent) of American adults volunteered last year. In every region and state, women volunteered at a higher rate than men and married people were more likely to donate time and resources than single people.

The study also showed that more Americans 35 to 44 years old volunteered than any other age group.

The CNCS hopes states will use the report to do a "strong self-assessment" to determine the effectiveness of their volunteer outreach. Although the CNCS is a federal agency, Chief Executive Officer David Eisner said they "long ago realized that the most important work toward building momentum around service actually happens at the state and local levels."

State patterns varied, with Utah leading the nation with the highest volunteer rate and intensity in every age group. The Midwest held the highest regional volunteer rate at 33.3 percent. However, the largest growth in volunteering comes from the South (2.4 million) and the West (2 million).

Last year, Americans contributed 8.2 billion hours of volunteer work, totaling nearly $150 billion in service. The greatest percentage of volunteers worked primarily through religious organizations. Top volunteer activities include coaching, teaching or mentoring (35 percent); fundraising (29.7 percent); and collecting, preparing and distributing food (26.3 percent).

The study also found that "youth who regularly attend religious services" are nearly twice as likely to be "regular volunteers" as those who did not attend any services. Young people from a family where at least one parent volunteers are almost twice as likely to volunteer as a youth with no family members who volunteer, and nearly three times as likely to regularly volunteer.

DOJ_NMG_0033483

The District held the highest percentage of people volunteering in civic, political, professional or international organizations, the study showed.

Marcus Rosano, coordinator of communications and media relations for the National Capital Area Red Cross, said area volunteer rates tend to fluctuate. After events, such as September 11, and the recent tsunami and hurricanes, he said the Red Cross sees more of an "episodic volunteer turnover." Many people from Virginia, Maryland and the District called the Red Cross hoping to be deployed to the Gulf Coast, while others asked how they could help with office work.

The CNCS is not daunted by a fluctuation of volunteers. No one was surprised to see involvement rise after September 11.

Mr. Eisner said a "fair amount of the growth" resulted from recent disasters, but he is optimistic that the CNCS can add 10 million more volunteers by 2010.

Getting Punitive (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

One of the great sources of disrespect for the law in our time has been outlandish punitive damages. So when the Supreme Court laid down a marker on excessive damages in the 2003 State Farm case, we suggested it might take more than one try before courts at the lower level got the message.

The high court has now agreed to hear an appeal in an Oregon case in which Philip Morris was dinged for punitive damages 97 times greater than the compensatory damages awarded in a smoker's death. Looks like the moment of revisitation has arrived. The Supreme Court had already sent the judgment back to the state courts once, but on remand the Oregon Supreme Court upheld the judgment. So the high court's decision to hear the case suggests that the Justices have decided someone isn't getting the State Farm message.

In that case Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the 6-3 majority, refused to establish a "bright line" rule for any ratio between compensatory and punitive damages, but he offered some hints. "Quadruple damages" were an instructive guidepost, the Justice wrote. He also implied that a punitive award very much higher than a single-digit ratio to the actual damages probably raised due-process concerns.

Still, a series of state-court decisions have tried to test the outer limits of State Farm, so it could be that the Philip Morris case is intended to clear all this up. Alas, only four members of the original majority remain. Besides, there are no clear ideological battle lines on this issue; in State Farm, Ruth Bader Ginsburg's dissent was joined by Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. It's hard to know how Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito might rule.

That said, Philip Morris v. Williams seems clearly to run afoul of the standards set down in State Farm. Jesse Williams smoked Marlboros for decades before dying of lung cancer in 1997. His wife, Mayola Williams, sued the tobacco company and won a judgment of about $821,000 in compensatory damages -- and $79.5 million in punitive damages. Six months after the State Farm decision, the Supreme Court vacated the Philip Morris judgment and remanded it to the Oregon Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of the earlier ruling. The state Supreme Court upheld the decision and its huge award, citing the length of Philip Morris's bad behavior and the "reprehensibility" of its conduct.

It appears that wasn't the answer the Supreme Court was looking for when it vacated the $79.5 million judgment in 2003. The reference to "reprehensibility" comes straight from State Farm and an earlier case, BMW v. Gore, in which a plaintiff had been awarded millions over a touched-up paint job on his new car. But this term has been widely misinterpreted. As described in both cases, "reprehensibility" is one of three factors to consider in weighing whether punitive damages are warranted at all. It's not a carte blanche for punitive-damage ratios in some ballpark between 500-to-1 or 97-to-1.

The Supreme Court acknowledged in State Farm that punitive damages may play a role to deter bad conduct. But it was also clear that they're not intended to cover damages to non-parties to these cases or to take account of the losing party's net worth. Justice Kennedy wrote in State Farm that the case was "neither difficult nor close." The same would seem to apply here; the question is whether the new cast of players at the High Court will see it the same way.

Nuclear Monitor Says Iran Fails To Provide Data (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

PARIS, June 12 — As Iran weighs how to respond to an international package of incentives intended to curb its nuclear activities, the chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency on Monday faulted Iran for failing to provide information crucial to understanding fully the nature and intent of its nuclear program.

In prepared remarks in Vienna opening the agency's 35-country board meeting, Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general, said his agency "has not made much progress in resolving outstanding verification issues." He added, "I would continue to urge Iran to provide the cooperation needed to resolve these issues."

DOJ_NMG_0033484

Dr. ElBaradei's assessment was expected. Since February, Iran has substantially reduced access to dozens of atomic sites, programs and personnel, abiding only by the minimum cooperation required under arms-control accords.

But the board meeting of the agency, the United Nations' nuclear monitoring group, comes at a delicate diplomatic moment as Iran is considering an offer by the United States, China, Russia and three European nations to freeze major nuclear activities in exchange for the promise of economic and political incentives.

Dr. ElBaradei kept his comments on Iran short and declined to take questions from reporters.

Still, he made it clear that he welcomed the initiative by the six nations, calling it a way "to reach a comprehensive agreement that would address the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program, while also simultaneously addressing Iran's security, technology and economic needs."

The incentives package, the details of which have not been made public, offers Iran the chance, among other things, to buy light-water reactors for energy purposes and new civilian airplanes and spare parts for its aging fleet as well as to hold substantive talks with the United States.

Iran would be required to agree to freeze its uranium enrichment-related and reprocessing activities before formal talks on the substance of the package could begin, and the freeze would continue until Iran met a strict list of requirements. Because of opposition from the United States, the package does not include an offer to open an intergovernmental dialogue with Iran about security issues.

Dr. ElBaradei did not refer to the fact that Iran restarted enriching uranium in Natanz last Tuesday. On Monday, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said he expected an initial response from Iran at any time.

In Tehran on Monday, an Iranian government spokesman, Gholam Hossein Elham, suggested that the country was unwilling to bend to the will of the outside world and freeze its enrichment-related activities.

"Iran has achieved nuclear fuel technology," he told reporters. "And we will not negotiate our absolute right with anyone."

ElBaradei Sees U.S.-Iran Talks As Ending Stalemate (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Tirone

Bloomberg, June 13, 2006

June 12 (Bloomberg) -- United Nations nuclear chief Mohammed ElBaradei said a U.S. offer to join direct talks with Iran about security issues may provide an end to the stalemate over the Islamic Republic's atomic program.

A U.S.-backed European proposal given to Iran ``would address the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program, while also simultaneously addressing Iran's security, technology and economic needs," ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said today in Vienna.

ElBaradei's comments came during opening remarks at a regular meeting of the 35-member IAEA board of governors. He outlined the results of the agency's latest inspections of Iran's nuclear facilities, which will be presented in a report to the board this week.

The Bush administration on May 31 said it would join its European allies in direct talks with Iran, ending a 27-year U.S. diplomatic embargo, if the Islamic Republic stopped making nuclear fuel and accepted the EU proposal. The U.S. agreed to enter negotiations after gaining assurances from Russia and China that they wouldn't block a U.S.-led effort for UN sanctions against Iran if the talks fail or never get started.

Iran is continuing with the nuclear program in defiance of international pressure and a non-binding UN resolution. The nation has yet to react to the European Union plan, which offers technological and economic incentives for Iran to end its atomic work. The U.S. accuses Iran of developing a bomb, in violation of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, while Iran maintains the program is aimed at generating electricity in compliance with the accord.

`Diplomatic Opportunity'

The U.S. and other board members want Iran to ``refrain from further uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities, including research and development, and to take advantage of the enormous diplomatic opportunity that lays in front," the U.S. ambassador to the IAEA, Gregory Schulte, said today at a briefing in Vienna.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana, who carried the offer to Tehran last week, said he expects an Iranian response ``very soon. I hope before the end of the week I will have contact with them."

Speaking after a meeting of EU foreign ministers in Luxembourg today, Solana said ``there are a lot of things in it. It is not easy to digest in a short period of time."

ElBaradei also urged Iran to provide better cooperation and to address unanswered questions by IAEA inspectors about the nature and intent of the nuclear program.

Iran today reiterated that the nuclear program wasn't negotiable, Agence France-Presse reported from Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0033485

Iran will not ``compromise'' or ``negotiate'' its rights, Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said yesterday. The country ``will act on the basis of its responsibilities, duties and rights,'' he said, adding that ``Iran has the initiative.''

Saudi Backing

Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal told reporters in Tehran today that his country believes Iran has the right to the peaceful use of nuclear technology, Kuwait's state- run news agency reported.

The IAEA board sent the Iranian case to the UN Security Council on Feb. 4, after the Islamic Republic refused to heed calls for the suspension of the enrichment program.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, yesterday expressed optimism about the European-led proposal.

``What was given is a program with a positive tendency toward Iran and there is no mention of punishments,'' the state- run Iranian Students News Agency quoted Larijani as saying in Cairo yesterday. ``It is said that a deadline has been set for Iran, which is not correct.''

The incentive plan was agreed on June 1 by diplomats from the five permanent members of the UN Security Council -- the U.S., China, Russia, the U.K. and France -- as well as by Germany. Each of the permanent members has a veto over the council's resolutions.

Japan Wary Of Plan For Sanctions Against Iran (WP)

By Anthony Faiola And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

TOKYO, June 12 -- Despite months of pressure from Washington, Japan has become increasingly reluctant to join a Bush administration plan for sanctions against Iran if negotiations fail to resolve concerns over the country's nuclear program, Japanese and U.S. officials said Monday.

Japanese officials are suggesting that their country, which has more at stake in Iran financially than any other potential sanctions partner, may not join in punitive measures unless there is a broad international consensus along the lines of a U.N. Security Council resolution or other measure backed by nations now reluctant to impose sanctions, such as China. The White House had hoped instead to bring Japan into a "coalition of the willing" that avoided dealing with "recalcitrants" such as Russia and China.

The administration's fallback plan if talks with Iran fail -- tough financial measures imposed by a small group of like-minded countries -- depends strongly on Japanese participation. Without it, administration officials have calculated, the impact would significantly decrease.

Japan consumes 22 percent of Iranian oil exports and is slated to begin development this year of the largest and most modern onshore petroleum fields built in Iran since the 1979 Islamic revolution. That has caused Japan to experience an uncomfortable tug of war between its allegiance to Washington and its financial and energy interests in Iran.

Analysts and Western diplomats have called the Bush administration's bid to sway Japan -- by far Iran's largest trading partner -- a key test of the likelihood that U.S. allies will ultimately agree to make painful sacrifices to force Tehran into compliance.

At a meeting of finance ministers of the Group of Eight major industrial powers in Russia last Friday, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow asked Japan to consider sanctions, including barring financial institutions from conducting transactions in Iran. Japan's finance minister, Sadakazu Tanigaki, replied that any such move would first need to be discussed "more broadly with Europe and others."

On Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso discussed the Iranian situation by telephone, agreeing to cooperate in resolving the standoff, the Japanese Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

Initial sanctions under consideration against Iran would largely spare the global trade in Iranian crude oil. But the most severe sanctions -- including cutting Tehran off from access to the dollar, euro, British pound and yen -- would be a step "potentially imperiling European and Japanese trade, including the oil trade," according to a Treasury Department task force report on the measures' likely international impact.

Privately, Japanese officials have said they intend to set a high bar for any action. "We would not do anything without the full support of the international community," a senior Japanese government official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity. "For example, we would need a vote of the U.N. Security Council or a similar measure that would have to include China and Russia. Otherwise, Japan might end up moving out of Iran only to see someone else's oil companies rush in."

Japanese officials have said that while they have deep concerns about Iran's nuclear program, they worry that aggressive sanctions could create a foothold for China. Viewed by Japan as its prime competitor in the global energy market, China ranks just behind Japan in consumption of Iranian oil.

DOJ_NMG_0033486

Iranian officials have already threatened to nullify a massive contract signed with Tokyo-based Inpex, an energy giant that is partly owned by the Japanese government, for development of the Azadegan petroleum fields along Iran's long and treacherous border with Iraq.

Inpex has so far postponed full-scale development work, citing a dispute over the number of land mines to be cleared from a drilling area that is estimated to contain reserves of about 26 billion barrels of oil. But sources familiar with the project have also described the delay as an effort by Japan to buy time -- to ensure that progress is made in the nuclear standoff before the Japanese company pumps hundreds of millions of dollars into the project.

The Iranians appear to be running out of patience. Last week, Iran's oil minister reiterated on national television a threat to cancel the contract. "If the Japanese do not develop Azadegan, we will not tolerate any more delay and will hand over the job to our own engineers," Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh said.

Since Inpex struck the Azadegan deal with Iran in 2004, Bush administration officials have sniped at it repeatedly. Japanese officials characterize this as a rare cold patch in otherwise very warm U.S.-Japan relations.

The Japanese call the project essential to securing increasingly rare dedicated energy sources for the world's second-largest economy. U.S. officials insist it would only make Japan more dependent on Iran. "I ask Japan not to be pressed into a dilemma on the nuclear proliferation issue by Iran, which is using oil resources as its shield," the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, said in a March interview with Japan's Nihon Keizai newspaper.

Japanese pundits are increasingly citing "U.S. pressure" on Japan over Iran. Earlier this month, President Bush placed a call to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, urging his friend to support a consensus that Iran must open its nuclear program to international security.

Japan is smarting about being largely left out of negotiations with Iran even while it is being asked to make the largest potential sacrifice. A new proposal -- including incentives for Iran to open its nuclear program that have somewhat brightened the prospects for a negotiated settlement -- was presented to Tehran this month by a club of nations comprising the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China.

As a country whose armed forces are restricted by a postwar pacifist constitution and which is protected by the American nuclear umbrella, Japan often finds that its interests naturally coincide with Washington's. But there is a growing sentiment in Japan that, particularly in the Iranian situation, Tokyo and Washington have divergent interests and that Japan's support for U.S. policy is being taken for granted.

"I think we should stand with the international community once a consensus is made on the Iran nuclear issue," said Hideki Wakabayashi, a member of Japan's upper house who was part of a delegation to Iran last month from the opposition Democratic Party of Japan. "But it's not a good idea for the Bush administration to pressure Japan before negotiations fail."

China Opposed To Joint Statement On Iran (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, June 12, 2006

China and Russia are holding back from a united message with Western powers to insist that Tehran halt uranium enrichment, a stance that could encourage Iranian defiance, diplomats said Monday.

Speaking outside a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency's 35-nation board, the diplomats told The Associated Press that China was opposed to signing a joint statement and Russia was leaning against participating.

Their reluctance reflected the East-West divide among the six world powers that just two weeks ago appeared to be in agreement about how to engage Iran over enrichment and to persuade it to give up technology that could be used to make nuclear arms. Iran says its program has the sole purpose of generating electricity.

"China is not OK and Russia might follow" Beijing's lead in opposing the joint statement, said a diplomat accredited to the meeting, who like other diplomats agreed to discuss the issue only if not quoted by name because the information was confidential.

Another diplomat said China appeared to be feeling pressure from the Nonaligned Movement, which last month emphatically backed Iran in its nuclear standoff with the West.

Russia's stance was less clear. But Moscow for months has hindered attempts by the United States and its European allies to turn up the heat on Iran in the U.N. Security Council.

Resistance by Russia and China to tough U.N. action contributed to Washington's decision last month to reverse decades of policy and agree to join in multinational talks with Iran — if Tehran accepts a package of rewards, freezes enrichment during the talks and places a long-term moratorium on such activity.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett announced at the end of high-level talks in Vienna on June 2 that all five permanent Security Council members plus Germany supported the joint approach on engaging Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0033487

But the signs of discord Monday reflected continuing differences despite the public show of unity.

One diplomat said Britain, France and Germany — the three European nations participating in the six-nation Iran package — were modifying a draft statement on Iran hoping to secure Moscow's and Beijing's backing on a final version.

Other diplomats spoke of more potential divisions. China, Russia and possibly Germany might push to allow Iran some tightly controlled small-scale enrichment rather than see talks founder. Russia and China also might balk at enforcing selective U.N. sanctions on Iranian officials and activities.

But long-term, verifiable suspension of Iranian enrichment is a "red line" for the United States and its key Western allies, one diplomat said.

While the IAEA meeting is not expected to formally focus on the Iranian nuclear standoff until Wednesday at the earliest, the issue dominated the gathering on its first day Monday.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei told the meeting his agency had not made much progress in resolving verification issues with Iran, alluding to suspicions that some of Tehran's nuclear activities could be used for the development of an atomic weapons program.

He described the rewards offered to entice the Tehran regime into negotiations as addressing "the need of the international community to establish confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program."

Chief U.S. delegate Gregory L. Schulte called on Iran to respond positively to the offer for talks — and suspend enrichment, which can be used both to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that generate power and to create the core of atomic warheads.

"The next decision needs to be taken not in Vienna but in Tehran," Schulte told reporters.

In Luxembourg, the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said he expected an Iranian response to the six-power offer this week.

But Iran suggested it was digging in its heels on enrichment. When asked if Iran would suspend enrichment for the sake of negotiations, spokesman Gholam Hossein Elham repeated the government line that enrichment is Iran's "obvious right."

U.S. Approach To Iran Has A Familiar Ring (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush contemplates the possibility of nonproliferation talks with Iran, he runs some of the same risks he said the Clinton administration took when dealing with North Korea.

Mr. Bush and his top aides were critical five years ago of the Clinton team's negotiating tactics with the regime in Pyongyang, charging that despotic states made unstable, untrustworthy negotiating partners. The White House's fears about Pyongyang remain, as American officials say they see signs North Korea may be preparing to test a long-range missile.

Now the Bush team has opened the door to the possibility of holding similar talks with Iran -- not direct talks, but as part of an international dialogue already started by America's European allies. Indeed, these talks could ultimately lead to an agreement like the one the Clinton team reached with North Korea.

The reasons for such a profound shift in the Bush foreign-policy agenda say much about the struggles the administration faced during its first term trying to contain both Pyongyang and Tehran, say current and former American diplomats.

Many counterproliferation experts support this evolving U.S. approach, saying it is a more realistic and potentially sustainable than avoiding direct talks. They also see the White House's diplomatic U-turn as an unstated recognition of the limits of unilateral American power.

"They were in the bunker at the White House, thinking, eventually, these countries would have to succumb to our power," says George Perkovich, a counterproliferation expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, a Washington think tank. "But it turns out we can't do everything out there alone."

In recent weeks, American officials say, U.S. spy satellites have picked up images from North Korea indicating Pyongyang is preparing to test launch its long-range missile, the Taepo Dong-2, which American intelligence believes has the potential to hit U.S. territory. A launch would be seen as a move by North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to wrest more economic incentives from Washington in return for Pyongyang dismantling its weapons systems.

Before al Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S., North Korea's nuclear program was among the Bush administration's top foreign-policy issues. President Clinton had forged a deal with Pyongyang in his first term, whereby North Korea agreed to give up its capacity for producing nuclear fuel in exchange for what were described as proliferation-proof light-water nuclear reactors. The Agreed Framework, as it was called, also pledged economic incentives for Pyongyang and a gradual normalization of relations between the U.S. and North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0033488

The Bush administration, from its earliest days, challenged the terms of the 1994 Clinton agreement. In 2001, the White House tried to broaden the deal, citing the need to discuss human rights and North Korea's conventional military forces if relations were to be normalized between Washington and Pyongyang. They also questioned the amount of monitoring the international community was able to pursue inside North Korea through the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency.

Ultimately, the entire Agreed Framework would collapse in 2002 after North Korean diplomats admitted to an American delegation that it had been cheating by seeking to develop a separate nuclear-fuel source. The collapse of the deal has ushered in nearly four years of new talks among the U.S., North Korea and four other regional powers, in a bid to come to a more comprehensive agreement.

No new agreement has been made with Pyongyang's leadership. Repeated attempts by the U.S. to bring Pyongyang back to the negotiating table have so far failed. A North Korean missile launch could significantly increase tensions.

Counterproliferation experts say the White House could ultimately agree to engage in a similar multiparty structure for its talks with Iran, though the members would be different.

Many former and current Bush administration officials also say any talks with Iran could very well end up producing a deal mirroring the original Agreed Framework. Last week, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign-policy chief, presented to Tehran a list of incentives that the U.S. and the U.N. Security Council would support if Iran agreed to freeze its nuclear program. Among the perks are light-water nuclear reactors and fuel guarantees as well as a list of economic incentives that includes lifting the ban on the sale of airplane parts to Tehran and assistance in Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization.

The U.S. didn't offer to normalize relations with Iran. But the White House did vow to work to establish a security framework for the Middle East, which could assuage some of Iran's concerns about the U.S. military presence in the region.

Iran's leadership says it is studying the package offered by the U.S. and its partners but gave no specific time frame for responding. Iran's lead negotiator on the nuclear issue, Ali Larijani, said last week that Tehran was eager to negotiate but that Iran maintains its right to develop uranium-enrichment technologies.

"This is all a Middle East equivalent of an Agreed Framework, essentially offering economic incentives in return for certain behavior on the nuclear program," says Richard Haass, who headed the State Department's policy-planning staff during the first Bush administration. "It's structurally very similar" to what was offered to North Korea.

American diplomats involved in the Iran issue say there are many reasons why talks with Tehran could prove more productive then those that have stalled with North Korea. For one, they say Iran fears it could be isolated economically if it doesn't come to an agreement with the U.S. and its dialogue partners. While Pyongyang, they say, seems to covet its international pariah status, Iran seems to want to integrate economically to placate a growing, and young, population.

And they stress that any formal agreements made by the international community with Tehran would likely be much easier to verify.

Still, there are many in the counterproliferation community who fear Tehran is essentially preparing to mirror North Korea's efforts to wait out the international community. They say even if Tehran fails to comply with Western demands to freeze its uranium-enrichment programs, there are indications China and Russia still wouldn't agree to coercive measures.

"The Iranians could hardly think the situation North Korea finds itself in is bad," says Henry Sokolski of the Nonproliferation Education Policy Center in Washington. "They haven't been punished at all," and they continue to fail to comply.

Welcome To The Bazaar (NYT)

By Warren Christopher

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Los Angeles

THE welcome recent announcement that the United States is willing to join face-to-face talks with Iran rekindled memories of my own experiences, 25 years ago, as chief negotiator in the Iranian hostage crisis. The subject of that negotiation was the 52 American diplomats who were taken hostage in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979. The result was their release, 444 days later, on the day of Ronald Reagan's inauguration in 1981. Since that day we have had no diplomatic relations and virtually no direct dialogue with Iran.

There are obvious differences between the situation in 1979-81 and now. Then it was the United States that wanted face-to-face negotiations. Today it is Iran that wants direct talks — talks that will help make up for what its leaders view as decades of humiliation and abuse by America. While the negotiations 25 years ago involved the future and well-being of 52 individuals, the 2006 negotiations, if they occur, will deal with a problem that potentially threatens the lives of millions.

Nevertheless, there are lessons from our 1979-81 negotiations with Iran that can inform our efforts in 2006. First, we must be sure we are talking with the right people. One of the most frustrating dead ends we encountered in the hostage negotiations was learning that despite prolonged efforts to forge a settlement with President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, he did not even have the power to move the hostages from one location to another, much less cause their release. If our 2006 negotiators study the vectors of power in Iran, they may be able to avoid such frustrations.

DOJ_NMG_0033489

At the moment, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is riding high. But he may not be as powerful as he seems and, in any event, power may shift over time. Ultimate authority remains with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and we have not heard from Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, former two-term president and now chairman of the Expediency Council. In short, we should look for seams, even small ones, in the cloak of power.

Second, our negotiators should prepare themselves for what might be called "bazaar behavior." For all my difficult dealings with interlocutors like China's foreign minister, Qian Qichen, I always knew what he really wanted and that if an agreement was reached, its terms would be carried out. But with the Iranians, the negotiating style is likely to resemble that of a Middle Eastern marketplace, with outlandish demands, feints at abandoning the process and haggling over minor details up to the very last moment.

Even after the agreement was signed on Jan. 19, 1981, the Iranians disavowed a vital technical annex. To bring them back in line, I directed the pilot of my plane, on a telephone line that I knew was tapped, to warm up the engines. The Iranians quickly dropped their claim, and a day later the hostages were released.

If the Iranians ultimately come to the table, our negotiators will need to be patient, almost superhumanly so. The subtext for everything the Iranians do and say will be their historic sense of grievance against the United States, stretching back at least to the C.I.A.-engineered overthrow of the government and restoration of the shah to his throne in 1953.

The hostage crisis probably dragged on because the Iranians wanted to maximize their exposure on the world stage and to humiliate the Great Satan (and its president) for as long as possible. One long and bewildering delay occurred when the Iranians refused to sign any direct agreement with the United States. We finally suggested that the agreement take the form of mutually dependent promises to Algeria, and that was acceptable for reasons that still remain obscure.

Third, if the new package of incentives offered by Britain, China, France, Germany, Russia and the United States does not persuade the Iranians to suspend their enrichment program, which was Washington's condition for joining the talks, I believe sanctions can play a valuable role. The hostage crisis shows that we must assemble the broadest possible spectrum of participants, including the Russians, in any sanctions regime. Although enforcement of the sanctions we achieved through the United Nations began to fray toward the end of the 444-day ordeal, they plainly had an impact on the Iranian population. When the Iranian leadership had to assess the potential benefits of keeping the hostages against the costs of doing so, sanctions must have weighed heavily in the balance.

As in the hostage crisis, a military solution is unwise and probably infeasible. Though possible use of our military should not be taken off the table, we must stay on the diplomatic and, if necessary, the punitive economic track. Our negotiators must be firm and resolute not just with their counterparts, but with those in the press, the administration and the public who will inevitably pressure them to declare prematurely that the talking is over.

Shortly before Christmas in 1980, in the gloom of a defeated administration, we received a message from the Iranians tripling their monetary demand to $24 billion for the release of our hostages. I was tempted to pull the plug and leave the matter for resolution by the incoming Reagan administration, but I concluded we had come too far to give up. Ultimately, those demands were dropped and the negotiations concluded on terms similar to what we had previously offered. When those who represent America in any coming negotiations face similar moments — and they inevitably will — I hope they will recognize that persevering is indispensable to our national interest.

Warren Christopher, secretary of state from 1993 to 1997, is the co-chairman of the Pacific Council on International Policy.

Violence Erupts Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 12 — Hundreds of Palestinian security personnel loyal to the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, went on a rampage Monday night in the West Bank town of Ramallah, attacking the parliament and cabinet buildings controlled by his rivals in the Hamas-led government.

The attack by forces from the Fatah faction loyal to Mr. Abbas, who fired bullets at the buildings and set them on fire, came after Hamas gunmen attacked the Gaza headquarters of the Fatah-dominated security forces with rockets and grenades.

The Ramallah buildings were not occupied at the time, but the fire gutted a floor of one of the two cabinet buildings after the security forces, joined by gunmen from Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, part of the Fatah movement, shot out the windows of the parliament building and tried to prevent firefighters from entering the area.

DOJ_NMG_0033490

In the growing violence between the major Palestinian factions, at least 2 people were killed and 15 wounded in the fighting in Gaza. In Ramallah, a member of the security forces told The Associated Press, "Every time they touch one of ours in Gaza, we will get 10 of theirs in the West Bank."

Mr. Abbas declared a state of emergency and ordered people off the streets on a chaotic and violent day. The Palestinian leader, who advocates negotiation with Israel, is facing increasing political isolation, especially in the wake of Friday's killing of seven members of a Palestinian family on a Gaza beach, apparently by an errant Israeli shell. The deaths have strengthened Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's legitimacy.

The Hamas majority in parliament decided Monday to allow dialogue between the factions to continue on a unified political platform, hoping to make a referendum called by Mr. Abbas for July 26 unnecessary.

Hamas had called the emergency session of the legislature to challenge the referendum on a document drafted by Palestinian prisoners calling for a Palestinian state within pre-1967 borders, implicitly recognizing Israel.

Hamas opposes the referendum as illegal and vows to block it. The main Hamas negotiator on the document, Abdel Khaleq Natche — the highest-ranking Hamas prisoner held by Israel — said Sunday that he had withdrawn his support. He accused Mr. Abbas of "unacceptable abuse" of the document and exploiting it for political gain, saying that it was intended to promote unity.

Hamas has refused demands from Mr. Abbas and other nations to recognize the right of Israel to exist and to accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements that are explicit in their support of a two-state solution. Hamas sees the referendum as an effort by Mr. Abbas to undermine its authority.

But Hamas legislators pulled back a little on Monday, criticizing Mr. Abbas for exceeding his legal powers but voting for a continuation of talks between the factions. "We are going to continue our efforts over the coming days and are hopeful of resolving the whole crisis," said the speaker, Aziz Dweik of Hamas.

Hamas said it would wait until June 20 before bringing the referendum back before the legislature. "If we succeed through dialogue in stopping the referendum then it will be better, but if we hit a dead end, parliament will assume its responsibilities and hold the vote," said a Hamas legislator and spokesman, Mushir al-Masri.

It is unclear whether Mr. Abbas has the authority to call a referendum or what a vote in parliament against holding it would mean.

In Damascus, Syria, Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy chief of Hamas's political bureau in Syria, told The Associated Press that Hamas would do its best to stop the vote. "Even if it is carried out, Hamas would not recognize it or accept its outcome, whatever it might be," he said.

In Gaza, Hamas gunmen fired rocket-propelled grenades and antitank rockets at the Rafah headquarters of the Preventive Security force loyal to Mr. Abbas and Fatah. Two people were killed, including a deaf passer-by, Suleiman Zanoun, 34, and at least 15 people were wounded in the fighting, which involved at least 100 armed men.

Earlier in the day, a Hamas paramilitary fighter was killed when fighting erupted after a funeral for another Hamas militant who died overnight from wounds suffered 10 days ago in a previous intra-Palestinian clash.

Hamas accused the Preventive Security force of being behind Monday's shooting, and a Palestinian security officer was shot and critically wounded later on his way home from work in Rafah. At least 20 people, mostly gunmen, have been killed in clashes between the factions in Gaza in the past two months.

As the barrage of Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israel slowed Monday, Israeli officials warned Hamas leaders that they would have no immunity from assassination if they were responsible for the deaths of Israeli civilians. A senior member of the ruling Kadima Party, Tzachi Hanegbi, said the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, could be assassinated if the group began further suicide bombings in Israel.

Referring to previous Hamas leaders assassinated by Israel, Mr. Hanegbi said, "Yassin and Rantissi are waiting for you, Haniya, if you implement the same stance of liquidating Jews, indiscriminate firing and suicide terror attacks aimed at paralyzing Israeli society anew."

Mr. Haniya said the threat was an example "of a type of political madness from some Israeli leaders."

Israeli newspapers suggested that the defense minister, Amir Peretz, leader of the Labor Party, had rejected army plans for intensified airstrikes against rocket-launching teams and sites, including some Hamas workshops where the crude Qassam rockets are assembled. Mr. Peretz, according to the news media, told the generals to keep planning.

At the same time, an Israeli investigation continued into the deaths of eight Palestinian civilians on a northern Gaza beach on Friday, with Israeli officials continuing to suggest that the explosion may not have been caused by an Israeli artillery shell, but by an errant Qassam rocket or explosives hidden in the sand.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was in London meeting with his British counterpart, Tony Blair, who said Israel was right to have no contacts with Hamas until it renounces violence. Mr. Olmert repeated his promise to try to negotiate first with Mr. Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0033491

Asked about the comments by Mr. Hanegbi, the Kadima Party member, Mr. Olmert, said, "Whoever is implicated in terrorism cannot claim to have immunity," and added: "I do not think it would be wise of me to be more specific."

Hamas Gunmen Rampage Through Ramallah (FT)

By Harvey Morris, Ben Hall

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Gunmen loyal to Fatah rampaged through the West Bank city of Ramallah on Monday night, shooting up parliament and torching the prime minister's office in a worsening power struggle with the ruling Hamas movement.

The attacks were launched after Hamas militants besieged the southern Gaza headquarters of the Palestinian preventive security force, which is Fatah-controlled, and fired rocket-propelled grenades. Five people were wounded in the assault.

The events in Ramallah began shortly after Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority's Fatah president, ordered security forces on to the streets to maintain law and order in the light of the Gaza violence. The prime minister's office and parliament building are both symbols of Hamas power following the Islamists' victory in elections in January.

Ismail Haniya, the Hamas prime minister, is banned by Israel from leaving the Gaza Strip. Hamas on Monday deferred a parliamentary motion to outlaw a national referendum called by Mr Abbas for July 26 that would ask the electorate to vote on proposals that implicitly recognise Israel.

Hamas, which does not recognise Israel, has declared the referendum illegal. The gunmen involved in the Ramallah attacks included security men and elements of the Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a Fatah military wing. Police on Monday night entered the prime minister's office to evict them.

The Hamas government, locked in a power struggle with the president and his party, has set up a 3,000-strong security force that answers to it directly but which is deployed only in the Gaza Strip.

The deterioration in the Palestinian territories came as Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, held talks in London to try to gain international support for his plans to redefine Israel's borders, with or without Palestinian consent. Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, urged both sides to pursue a negotiated settlement of their conflict, but did not endorse a unilateral Israeli solution in the event of a stalemate. Speaking in Downing Street after talks with Mr Olmert, Mr Blair promised to give "every support and every impetus we can from the international community" to ensure that talks could begin.

Mr Olmert is on the first leg of a European tour to win support for his proposals to withdraw from large parts of the West Bank and define Israel's borders unilaterally if talks with Mr Abbas fail to produce a deal. Mr Blair said the Palestinians had to recognise Israel's right to exist and renounce violence. Both sides had to adhere to the international community's "road map" for talks, he said.

Israel also needed to address the "main issue" of how to create a viable Palestinian state. Only a negotiated settlement was likely to last, Mr Blair said. But he acknowledged that there had to be progress towards some form of resolution to prevent a slipping back into "chaos", and hinted that could lead to a unilateral redrawing of the borders. "This thing either moves forward by way of agreement or other ways of moving it forward have to be found," he said.

Palestinian Security Men Go On Rampage (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, June 12, 2006

Hundreds of Palestinian security men loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas went on a rampage against the Hamas-led government Monday, riddling the parliament building and Cabinet offices with bullets before setting them ablaze in retaliation for an attack by Hamas gunmen in the Gaza Strip.

The violence was the most serious in the West Bank since Hamas defeated Abbas' Fatah movement in legislative elections in January and raised new fears the Palestinians could be headed toward civil war. It also cast doubt on renewed calls for Palestinian unity by the rival factions.

Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately last year, has been locked in a bitter power struggle with Hamas. The dispute has focused largely on control of the powerful security forces.

In Monday's unrest, hundreds of members of the Preventive Security force shot out the windows of the parliament building before storming the two-building Cabinet complex, where they smashed furniture, destroyed computers and tore up documents. No casualties were reported.

Shooting wildly in the air, the mob then set fire to one of the Cabinet buildings, gutting the fourth floor. When a fire engine approached the scene, one gunman lay on the road, preventing it from reaching the building.

"Every time they touch one of ours in Gaza, we will get 10 of theirs in the West Bank," said one member of the Preventive Security force. Dozens of gunmen from the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a pro-Fatah militia, joined the mob.

DOJ_NMG_0033492

The crowd also set fire to the parliament building and a Hamas office. Both blazes were quickly contained. Abbas' presidential guard later arrived to guard the burnt-out parliament and Cabinet buildings.

Late Monday, Fatah gunmen briefly abducted a Hamas lawmaker, Khalil Rabei, after attacking his office and setting it on fire. Rabei said he was kicked and threatened before he was released.

Abbas' personal guard granted refuge to Rabei and nine other Hamas lawmakers, and was ordered to escort the men home safely.

The rampage in Ramallah followed an earlier attack by Hamas gunmen on a Preventive Security installation in Gaza. The attack set off daylong clashes that left two people dead and 14 wounded.

Most of the Palestinian infighting in recent weeks has occurred in Gaza, Hamas' stronghold. Monday's incident signaled that Fatah is now ready to move the conflict to its West Bank power center.

Abbas was in Gaza at the time of the rampage, where he has been holding negotiations with Hamas in hopes of ending the political deadlock.

"The president strongly condemns the attacks and the assault against the public institutions and the building that took place in the West Bank tonight," said a statement issued by Abbas' office.

"Whatever is going on must be stopped," said Nabil Abu Rdeneh, a close aide to Abbas. "Everybody must obey the law."

Officials said Abbas had appointed a retired commander to serve as a military adviser and liaison to the Hamas-run Interior Ministry. The appointment of Lt. Gen. Abdel Razek Majaide could help ease tensions. Majaide is respected by Fatah and Hamas alike.

Internal tensions have heightened since Abbas scheduled a July 26 referendum on a plan that calls for recognition of Israel. Abbas has endorsed the plan as a way out of the stalemate. But Hamas objects to the vote.

In a conciliatory gesture, the Hamas-dominated Palestinian parliament pulled back from a plan to block the referendum, delaying a vote on the issue until June 20 to allow negotiations to continue. But the violence cast serious doubts on the efforts to bridge the gaps.

Early Tuesday, several thousand Hamas supporters demonstrated outside the Palestinian parliament building in Gaza. They condemned the violence in Ramallah, rejected the referendum and threatened retaliation against the Preventive Security forces.

"What happened today in Ramallah is very shameful and I think the president did not use all his efforts to prevent it," said Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri.

Seeking a way out of the infighting, Abbas last weekend scheduled the referendum on a plan calling for a Palestinian state alongside Israel, implicitly recognizing the Jewish state.

Abbas believes a unified political platform by Palestinian factions would help end crushing international sanctions against the Hamas-led government and allow him to restart peace talks with Israel.

Hamas, which is sworn to Israel's destruction, opposes the referendum vote. But it has entered a "dialogue" with Abbas over the plan. The sides were meeting late Monday when violence erupted in the West Bank.

"We want to get to a situation of calm and prevent the shedding of Palestinian blood," said Hamas lawmaker Khalil al-Haye.

Abbas is pushing forward with the referendum despite calls for a delay following an explosion on a Gaza beach Friday that killed eight civilians.

Palestinians said an Israeli artillery shell caused the explosion, which has inflamed passions against Israel. Israel is conducting an investigation and has suggested its army wasn't responsible.

Israel-Palestinian violence has escalated since the beach explosion, with Hamas officially calling off a 16-month truce.

Hamas militants have fired several dozen rockets at southern Israel, including one that landed in the southern town of Sderot on Monday, slightly wounding a woman in the shoulder. A total of three people have been wounded in the recent rocket attacks, including one man in serious condition.

The end of the truce has raised concerns that Hamas could resume the suicide attacks. But with Hamas now the governing power, it might pressure its military wing to avoid deadly confrontation with Israel for fear of deepening its international isolation.

Fatah Gunmen Go On Rampage In West Bank (CHIT)

By Joel Greenberg

Chicago Tribune, June 13, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Palestinian gunmen from the Fatah movement of President Mahmoud Abbas went on a rampage against the Hamas-led government in the West Bank city of Ramallah on Monday night, shooting at the Cabinet and parliament buildings and setting them on fire.

DOJ_NMG_0033493

The attack by scores of armed men, many from the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security force, followed a deadly clash between Hamas gunmen and security officers in the Gaza Strip and signaled a spread of factional violence to the West Bank.

The rampage was the worst outbreak of internal unrest in the West Bank since Hamas defeated Fatah in legislative elections in January and raised new fears of possible civil war. It showed that Fatah was ready to take its confrontation with Hamas to its West Bank power center.

The unrest has been fueled by a power struggle between Abbas and the Hamas-led government that has focused on control of the security forces and Abbas's call for a referendum on a statehood plan that implicitly recognizes Israel. Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, has rejected the referendum.

In Monday's shooting spree, the Fatah gunmen targeted the symbols of Hamas rule.

At the Cabinet complex, gunmen destroyed computers and smashed furniture, hurled office equipment out of windows and tore up documents. The fourth floor was set on fire, and a fire truck was blocked from approaching by a gunman who lay on the road.

Gunmen also stormed the parliament building, shooting out the windows and bursting inside, where they set fire to offices. The blazes in both buildings were quickly contained.

A Hamas lawmaker, Khalil al-Rabai, was briefly abducted outside another building, but was later released to Abbas's presidential guard, which rushed reinforcements to the area.

Several Hamas lawmakers were evacuated to safety in the presidential compound.

The Fatah gunmen included members of the group's armed wing, Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, who joined the officers of Preventive Security, which has spearheaded recent clashes with Hamas in Gaza.

Violence was also reported in Nablus, where gunmen fired at parliament offices, and in Jenin, where Fatah gunmen took to the streets, firing in the air.

The unrest was triggered by clashes earlier in the day in the Gaza Strip town of Rafah, where Hamas gunmen battled officers at Preventive Security headquarters, hurling grenades and firing anti-tank rockets, according to reports from the scene.

The firefight, which erupted during the funeral of a Hamas militant killed in an earlier clash, left two people dead—a Hamas gunman and a bystander—and more than a dozen wounded.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas lawmaker, said the rampage in Ramallah was carried out by "gangs" who want to "make the government fail."

Ahmad Abdel Rahman, an adviser to Abbas, said the source of the problem was a new Hamas-led security force put on the streets of Gaza in defiance of a presidential veto. The force has been involved in repeated clashes with Preventive Security members in recent weeks.

"This match must be removed from the streets," Abdel Rahman told the Arabic satellite channel Al-Jazeera.

Abbas was in Gaza on Monday, where he has been meeting with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas in an effort to end the political stalemate, so far without success.

In an emergency parliament session Monday, Hamas lawmakers challenged the legality of Abbas's referendum decree but put off a vote on the issue, saying they want to give more time for negotiations.

After the events in Ramallah, Abbas issued a presidential order banning displays of weapons on the streets, Abdel Rahman said. However similar orders in the past have been ignored.

"The president strongly condemns the attacks and the assault against the public institutions and the building that took place in the West Bank tonight," said a statement from Abbas's office.

Early Tuesday, a few thousand Hamas supporters demonstrated outside the Palestinian parliament building in Gaza, condemning the violence in Ramallah.

"What happened today in Ramallah is very shameful, and I think the president did not make every effort to prevent it," said Sami Abu Zuhri, the Hamas spokesman.

Fatah Officers Attack Hamas Sites In West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 12 -- Several hundred members of the Fatah-dominated Palestinian security services shot up or set fire to two official buildings associated with the rival Hamas movement in the West Bank city of Ramallah on Monday, hours after partisan clashes killed two people and wounded 15 others in the Gaza Strip.

The assaults on the buildings were among the biggest shows of force in weeks of clashes between rival Palestinian factions in the occupied territories.

DOJ_NMG_0033494

Members of security services loyal to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas savaged the Palestinian parliament building and the cabinet headquarters, the homes of institutions run by Hamas. The radical Islamic movement won January parliamentary elections, ending Fatah's long monopoly on Palestinian political power.

After shooting out the windows of parliament, the officers entered the cabinet headquarters, where they smashed furniture and computers before setting the building on fire. Witnesses said the armed men, including some members of Fatah's military wing, known as the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, prevented firefighters from putting out the blaze.

Late Monday, Fatah gunmen abducted a Hamas lawmaker, Khalil Rabei, after setting fire to his office in Ramallah. He was released soon after to Abbas's bodyguards and took refuge along with seven other Hamas legislators in the Muqata government compound. Abbas, who is the Palestinian Authority president, ordered his bodyguards to protect the group.

Palestinian security services, with more than 70,000 members, are dominated by Fatah loyalists. Because of economic sanctions that Israel and foreign donors have imposed against the Hamas-led government, most of the men have not received any pay in three months.

Hamas officials, meanwhile, have deployed a 3,000-member security force on the streets of Gaza that is filled out mostly by members of its armed wing.

The divide within the security forces, widening at a time of increasing political rivalry between Abbas and the Hamas leadership, has led to deadly clashes in recent weeks. Most of those have occurred in Gaza. Monday's rampage showed that the partisan violence can spread to the West Bank as well.

"Every time they touch one of ours in Gaza, we will get 10 of theirs in the West Bank," a member of the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security Service told the Associated Press.

Earlier in the day in Gaza, Hamas and Fatah gunmen battled in the streets of Rafah, leaving one Hamas gunman and one civilian dead. Fifteen others were wounded; their partisan allegiances were unclear.

There were differing accounts as to how this fighting began. Some witnesses said Fatah gunmen fired on a Hamas funeral procession, while others said Hamas gunmen attacked the Preventive Security headquarters along the procession's route with rifles and rocket-propelled grenades.

The clashes came as the Palestinian parliament, which Hamas controls, debated Abbas's plan to hold a referendum on the shape of a future Palestinian state.

The July 26 vote would ask Palestinians to vote yes or no on an 18-point document drafted by the leaders of Hamas, Fatah and other Palestinian factions in Israeli prisons. At the heart of the "prisoners' document," signed by major Palestinian leaders held in Israeli jails, is a proposal for a future Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem -- all territories that Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

Abbas favors such a state alongside Israel. But Hamas, which does not recognize the Jewish state's right to exist, has long called for a Palestinian state on land that now includes Israel. The prisoners, a very influential group in Palestinian politics, withdrew their support for the document after Abbas issued a presidential decree Saturday setting the date for a nonbinding vote on it.

The session Monday was called by Hamas legislators in the hopes of blocking the referendum, although whether the parliament has the legal standing to do so is unclear. After hours of sometimes angry debate, Hamas lawmakers decided to postpone a vote on the issue until next week, saying they wanted to give talks between Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas a chance to reach a compromise.

Violence Strains Informal Cease-Fire (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Israel and Hamas seemed on the brink of abandoning a 17-month calm on Wednesday as Islamic militants lobbed rockets at Israeli towns and Israeli generals reportedly recommended an invasion of Gaza to snuff out the salvos, but officials and analysts think both sides will honor the informal cease-fire.

Hamas and Fatah loyalists showed no such restraint yesterday. Two Palestinians died in internecine Gaza street battles, while gunmen linked to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party ransacked and burned government buildings in Ramallah.

Meanwhile, the Hamas-majority parliament delayed a decision on a measure that would outlaw a referendum. Mr. Abbas backs the referendum, which seeks implicit recognition of a two-state solution.

Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority face growing domestic pressure to launch retaliatory attacks. Seven Palestinians from one family were killed on a Gaza beach by an errant explosive, and the southern Israeli city of Sderot has come under frequent attack by Qassam rockets. So far, political leaders have resisted the temptation.

DOJ_NMG_0033495

Attacks on Israel would disrupt Hamas' effort to consolidate its power after taking over the government in March, said a member of the Hamas-run Cabinet. The government also has struggled with a suspension of international aid to the Palestinian Authority, which has left government employees without pay for at least three months.

"The military escalation is the last thing that the government needs," said Abdel Rahman Zaidan, the Palestinian minister of public works.

Israelis hope to avoid a risky military gambit that could undermine international support for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's "realignment" plan to uproot settlement in the West Bank.

"What can we do? Reinvade Gaza? We've been there already," said Labor parliament member Efraim Sneh.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz said he turned down a recommendation from Israeli generals for a large-scale offensive against the cells that launch the homemade rockets into Israel. His decision is aimed at allowing tempers to cool.

For the first time in months, Hamas' military wing took responsibility for the rocket salvos, prompting Israeli talk of assassination strikes on senior figures in the organization.

Critics of the government's policy said Israel should move against rocket foundries in Gaza and against weapons smugglers to weaken a militant group that has used the calm to restock.

But backers of the defense minister said the price -- Israeli military casualties, international criticism and a cancellation of the Palestinian referendum -- was too high. Even though Israel could justify the offensive, it is likely to strengthen Hamas' hand against Fatah.

"You can have some short-term gains," said Yossi Alpher, the former head of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, but in the long term, "there is no military solution. And it's not going to change anything."

Blair Urges Negotiated Mideast Solution (FT)

By Ben Hall In London

Financial Times, June 13, 2006

Tony Blair, UK prime minister, on Monday urged Israelis and Palestinians to pursue a negotiated settlement of their conflict, but did not endorse a unilateral Israeli solution in the event of a stalemate.

Speaking in Downing Street after talks with Ehud Olmert, Israel's new prime minister, Mr Blair promised to give "every support and every impetus we can from the international community" to ensure that talks could begin.

Mr Olmert is on the first leg of a European tour to win support for his proposals to withdraw from large parts of the West Bank and define Israel's borders unilaterally if talks with Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, fail to produce a deal.

Mr Blair said the Palestinians had to recognise Israel's right to exist and renounce violence and both sides had to adhere to the international community's "road map" for talks. Israel also needed to address the "main issue" of how to create a viable Palestinian state.

Only a negotiated settlement was likely to last, Mr Blair said. But he acknowledged that there had to be progress towards some form of resolution to prevent the Middle East from slipping back into "chaos", and hinted that that could require a unilateral redrawing of the borders.

"This thing either moves forward by way of agreement or other ways of moving it forward have to be found," he said.

The Israeli leader reiterated his willingness to work towards a negotiated solution, which he said was based on "a generous compromise" by Israel. He would "go a long way" to convincing the Palestinians that it was worthwhle entering talks, under conditions set out in the "international road map".

"We are not impatient, therefore we are willing to give it some time," Mr Olmert said, revealing that he would be meeting Mr Abbas within the next few weeks.

But he also re-stated his readiness to go it alone in re-drawing Israel's map, adding that only a few years ago an Israeli offer to vacate 90 per cent of the West Bank would have been considered a "miracle".

"In spite of our obvious efforts, we may not be able to achieve our primary goal to negotiate with the Palestinians on the principles of the road map. We will have to move forward...to separate from the Palestinians, pull out from areas of the West Bank to realign Israelis to other parts of Israel to leave very large contiguous territories for a state to be formed by the Palestinians," he said.

Mr Blair agreed that negotiations could not start until the Palestinians renounced violence and accepted Israel's right to exist.

However, he declined to endorse Mr Olmert's view – expressed last week in an interview with the Financial Times – that a proposed referendum on Palestinian peace proposals was "meaningless".

DOJ_NMG_0033496

Mr Olmert dismissed the referendum on proposals that implicitly recognise Israel as an internal Palestinian “game between one faction and another”.

Mr Blair said that “anything that helps move the peace process forward is valuable”.

The Israeli prime minister said his country could not allow Iran to “cross the nuclear threshold”, warning that equipped with atomic weapons it would pose a “serious danger to the entire world”.

Olmert Won't Rule Out Unilateral Action (AP)

By Steve Weizman

AP, June 12, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday that he would make "every possible effort" to negotiate peace with the Palestinians but will act unilaterally without an agreement.

Olmert said at a news conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair that Israel "will not tolerate nuclear weapons in the hands of Iran" — but sidestepped a question about possible Israeli action.

Olmert went further than before in his statements about a pullout from the West Bank, suggesting that a withdrawal would encompass "90 percent" of the territory Israel occupies, although he said that figure was approximate.

He left the door open to future negotiated pullouts even after a unilateral and partial withdrawal.

The prime minister is visiting Britain and France to win support for his approach to the West Bank. Under his plan, Israel would pull out of most of the territory and dismantle dozens of Jewish settlements but retain key areas, including major settlement blocs and east Jerusalem, which the Palestinians seek for a capital.

"What will happen when we will come to the point of the 90 percent of the territories, and the remaining 10 percent remains to be seen?" Olmert said.

If "the day will come when the Palestinians will be ready to negotiate with us ... I will then be willing to come to discuss it in detail," he continued.

In a briefing with reporters later, he said he was "not talking precisely down to the millimeter."

Asked about the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran, Olmert said Israel "will not be able to accept such a reality."

Olmert sidestepped a question on whether Israel would act alone against Iran's nuclear program — as it did in 1981, when Israeli warplanes destroyed Iraq's Osirak nuclear facility. He said he hoped recent U.S. and European efforts "will stop any events that will advance Iran toward the possession of nuclear weapons."

Blair's response to Olmert's pullout comments balanced support for negotiations with a nuanced acceptance of what Israel calls its other options should talks lead nowhere.

Israel withdrew unilaterally from all of the Gaza Strip last year.

On the West Bank, Olmert has signaled he will give the Palestinians until year's end to resume peace talks before unilateral action. The Palestinians view a unilateral pullout as a way to strengthen Israel's hold on parts of the West Bank that the Jewish state would retain.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is eager to restart negotiations with Israel. But Olmert has said meaningful talks cannot take place as long as the militant group Hamas, which controls the Palestinian legislature and Cabinet, remains committed to Israel's destruction.

North Korea Flexes Missile Muscle To Grab US Attention (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, June 12, 2006

North Korea's preparations for possible long-range missile tests -- its first in nearly a decade -- may be an attempt to grab the attention of a US government distracted by its nuclear row with Iran, experts said.

A senior US official said in a weekend report that there were "enough indications" to suggest that the Stalinist state was getting ready to test-fire an intercontinental ballistic missile, eight years after sending a missile over northern Japan.

Current test preparations are reportedly far more advanced than on previous occasions when North Korea appeared to be gearing up for a missile launch.

Pyongyang, which claims to have nuclear bombs, has frequently used missile tests and other provocative military activity to spur either diplomatic efforts or to shake up what they view as a unfavourable diplomatic situations.

But Pyongyang's latest demonstration of a planned long range missile test, against the backdrop of stalled nuclear talks, is seen by some analysts as a plea for US attention.

DOJ_NMG_0033497

"It is very likely that North Korea believes that with Iran being offered a very reasonable package of incentives to abandon their nuclear program, they too would like to ensure that they are geting the appropriate attention and incentives from the United States," said Jon Wolfsthal, a weapons expert at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies.

North Korea's missile test preparations pre-date a US offer this month to join in the negotiations between Iran and the European nations to end a nuclear standoff with the Islamic republic.

But Wolfsthal said the hardline communist state's stepped up missile activity could be an indication that Pyongyang "is very frustrated with its inability to get political and economic benefits from its nuclear program."

The United States had been involved with China, Russia, Japan and South Korea in talks with North Korea to disband the reclusive state's nuclear arms in return for security and diplomatic guarantees and critical energy aid.

Six-party talks climaxed in September 2005, with North Korea agreeing in principle to end its atomic weapons program.

But negotiations have collapsed since November, after the United States imposed financial sanctions on Pyongyang for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering activities.

During the impasse, Washington has been actively involved in diplomacy to defuse the Iranian nuclear crisis.

It has offered to directly talk to the Iranians and provide various incentives to encourage Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment, a process that could lead to making nuclear bombs.

"The North Koreans do not like to be ignored and they are famous for staging provocative actions to remind the United States that they are still potentially dangerous," noted Joseph Cirincione, a nuclear expert at the Center for American Progress.

He said that increased activity at a North Korean missile launch site, being monitored by US satellites, may be aimed more at "stimulating the six-party negotiating process than actually developing a capability that could actually threaten the United States."

Indications are that the North Koreans are itching for a nuclear deal but are frustrated by the on-again, off-again negotiating tactics of the United States.

Recently, the administration of President George W. Bush signalled it was prepared to consider opening a parallel track of negotiations with North Korea on a peace treaty to replace the 1953 armistice that ended the Korean War.

Some believe the move could result in a breakthrough to get talks moving again.

"But we haven't seen any results of the reported action yet, and the North Koreans may be getting impatient and are sort of puffing themselves up," Cirincione said.

Senator Scolds U.N.'s No. 2 For Snub (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- One of the Senate's most prominent conservatives came to the United Nations yesterday to explain that Middle America does appreciate the work of the world body, they just want to see it better managed.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, visited Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown to rebut what he considered unfair criticism of the American people.

"I expressed disappointment on the lack of insight that was displayed in the speech given last week," Mr. Coburn told reporters after meeting in Mr. Malloch Brown's office. "The vast majority of Oklahomans believe in the function of the U.N. and recognize the positive contributions."

However, he added, the international organization still suffers from a lack of transparency and accountability. Mr. Coburn has scheduled a hearing on plans to renovate the aging U.N. headquarters later this month.

Mr. Malloch Brown, the senior deputy to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, set off a firestorm of criticism last Tuesday when he said that "Middle America" doesn't know about the good work the United Nations does because Washington rarely defends the world body against its critics.

"The prevailing practice of seeking to use the U.N. almost by stealth as a diplomatic tool, while failing to stand up for it against its domestic critics, is simply not sustainable," Mr. Malloch Brown told two left-leaning think tanks.

He also said that U.N. successes are better reported in the Middle East than in Middle America because "much of the public discourse that reaches the U.S. heartland has been largely abandoned to its loudest detractors such as Rush Limbaugh and Fox News."

The next day U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton blasted the remarks as "condescending" and "patronizing," and threatened to make the United Nations "a victim" if Mr. Annan did not immediately repudiate the speech.

But Mr. Annan is standing by his deputy, and on Thursday urged everyone to let it go.

Bush administration officials have not fleshed out the details of their strategy, but they do note that the organization is less than three weeks away from a fiscal crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0033498

The U.N.'s current spending authority expires at the end of June and Washington and other key donor states must come to an agreement with the rest of the membership on how to make substantial management changes before that time.

The United States pays one-quarter of the U.N.'s operating budget.

"We are now perilously near the deadline, and it is far from clear that enough reform to satisfy them has been achieved," wrote Mr. Annan in an op-ed piece in yesterday's Financial Times. "Neither side has found a way of engaging with the other to agree on further reforms."

Although Mr. Malloch Brown, who is British, has insisted that he is not anti-American, his remarks have riled Midwestern lawmakers. Rep. Dan Burton, Indiana Republican and an outspoken critic of U.N. mismanagement, was scheduled to take the House floor last night "to support the deputy secretary-general's immediate removal," said his spokesman, Stephen Schatz.

Cuba Cuts Off Power To U.S. Mission (AP)

AP, June 12, 2006

The Cuban government cut off electricity to the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana a week ago, and U.S. requests for power to be restored have gone unanswered, the State Department said Monday.

The facility has been operating with generator power.

Work at the mission continues, including interviews of refugees and outreach programs for the Cuban people, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"I would just say that the bullying tactics of the Castro regime aren't going to work," he added.

He said Cuban authorities also reduce the availability of water to the mission from time to time.

McCormack said he suspects that the decision to cut the power was in response to efforts by the mission to provide information to the Cuban people.

"That, of course, is not something that the Castro regime takes kindly to," he said.

In January, President Fidel Castro complained about use of the U.S. mission to carry human rights messages to passersby on outdoor electronic signs.

Castro called the signs provocations.

U.S. Mission Hit By Power Failure, Water Shortage (WT)

By Tom Carter

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

The main office of the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana has been without electricity since June 5, water is available only sporadically and U.S. diplomats have begun burning "nonessential" documents, the State Department said yesterday.

The State Department called the power cut part of a campaign of harassment of U.S. diplomats by the Cuban government.

"On Monday, June 5th, at approximately 3:00 a.m., electricity to the main building at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana was cut off," said department spokesman Sean McCormack. "The U.S. Interests Section building is the only building in the neighborhood without electricity. I wonder how that happened."

The U.S. mission is running on backup generators.

Cuba and the United States do not have diplomatic relations. Rather than embassies, they maintain "interests sections" in each other's capital. Switzerland acts as the official go-between.

Calls to the Swiss Embassy and the Cuba Interests Section in Washington yesterday seeking comment were not returned.

Drew G. Blakeney, a spokesman for the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, said the harassment of U.S. diplomats was minor compared with the repression of the Cuban people by the regime led by President Fidel Castro.

"The Cuban people, especially human rights and pro-democracy activists, continue to suffer much more severe harassment on a daily basis than does the U.S. Interests Section in Havana," Mr. Blakeney said.

The State Department said the harassment is thought to be the Cuban response to the U.S. Interests Section's "outreach" on behalf of the Cuban people.

The U.S. mission infuriated the Castro government at Christmastime when it displayed a lighted sign on the building to flash news and messages to the Cuban people. The initial sign displayed "75" -- the number of dissidents jailed by the regime in the past few years.

The Cuban government responded in January by erecting a large billboard to block the messages from the thousands of Cubans who drive, bicycle or walk past the Interests Section each day.

"The American requests to the Cuban government to restore power have gone unanswered," Mr. McCormack said. "As of this morning, the power remains cut off and the U.S. Interests Section is operating on generator power."

DOJ_NMG_0033499

He added that work at the Interests Section "continues unabated, including interviews of refugees and direct outreach to the Cuban people."

"I would just say that the bullying tactics of the Castro regime aren't going to work," Mr. McCormack said.

The Miami Herald reported late yesterday afternoon that the Interests Section had begun burning "nonessential" papers. State Department officials confirmed the report but said this is a standard procedure when power is out.

The cutoff continues even though Cuban Basic Industry Minister Yadira Garcia told parliament Saturday that a $1 billion program to link hundreds of large generators to the energy grid meant more power was available for peak energy demands.

"In less than eight months, conditions have been created that guarantee that there will be no blackouts in our country due to a lack of generating capacity," the minister said in her report, published by the official press yesterday.

Leader Of Islamic Forces In Somalia Seeks "Understanding" With U.S. (KRT)

By Hannah Allam

Knight Ridder, June 12, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -The Islamist leader whose Islamic Courts Union militia seized control of this lawless east African capital last week after fierce fighting with U.S.-backed warlords said Monday that he seeks "an understanding" with the United States and denied that his group is sheltering al-Qaida terrorists.

But in his first face-to-face interview with an American journalist since his forces' triumph, Sheik Sherif Ahmed told Knight Ridder that he doesn't plan full ties with the United States, and he dodged questions about his views on al-Qaida.

"The Americans were getting wrong information from the warlords, and since that strategy failed, the Americans have a good opportunity," Ahmed said. "They can help us with offers of humanitarian assistance. We cannot say there will be full cooperation, but we can foresee an understanding between the United States and Somalia."

He also said he would never agree to a call for international peacekeepers by Somalia's nearly powerless transitional government, based 150 miles away in the city of Baidoa.

"They only brought destruction and killing when they were here," he said. "There is no reason for the request for foreign troops. The cruel warlords were totally eliminated by the uprising."

Ahmed has been the focus of international speculation about whether he plans to create a Taliban-style state that would shelter al-Qaida in this strategic Horn of Africa country. But Ahmed offered no clear political agenda during the interview, which was conducted in his heavily fortified office on a leafy residential street in the capital.

Ahmed said he believes "the world is truly governed by God," but that his religious courts will reach out to intellectuals, secular politicians and clan elders as the Islamists craft a plan for the city.

"Our people have been freed from the warlords. Now, we want all Somali people to decide their future," he said.

Outside, boyish-looking militia members, most still in their teens, patrolled in castoff military uniforms aboard trucks affixed with anti-aircraft artillery. There were no sounds of fighting, and residents said the militia introduced a fragile calm after 15 years of bloodshed.

The United States ended direct involvement in Somalia in 1994, after 18 Army Rangers were killed when rebels shot down a military helicopter in Mogadishu - an event dramatized in the film "Black Hawk Down." In the years since, the city has been the subject of near constant violence as rival clans competed for control.

The Bush administration is widely believed to have begun providing covert funding to some of the warlords during the past year in an effort to thwart the Islamic Courts' rise. It's a claim the administration hasn't confirmed, but one that Ahmed and others here believe.

President Bush said last week that the administration's "first concern would be to make sure that Somalia does not become an al-Qaida safe haven, doesn't become a place from which terrorists plot and plan."

"So we're watching very carefully developments there," Bush said.

Somalis who took part in the formation of the Islamic Courts Union in 2003 say Ahmed, a scion of one of Somalia's most powerful clans who studied law in Libya, was installed as chairman because of his reputation for fairness.

"He was the consensus person," said Abdullahi M. Shirwa, a secular peace activist who was involved in the establishment of the Islamic Courts Union. "He got support from the clans, from the neighborhoods, from civil society and from the Islamists. He's a politician more than he's a religious man."

In person, Ahmed appears far younger than his 42 years and eschews the traditional trappings of power. His entire two-story compound is treated as a holy site. Visitors are required to take off their shoes when entering, and Ahmed was barefoot throughout the interview. His office furnishings consisted of a desk and a chair. He declined to discuss personal details of his life. "I'm from the people," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0033500

During a casual first meeting Sunday night, he came across as charming, with a good sense of humor. But he was far more guarded during Monday's formal interview, during which he occasionally shifted into fluent Arabic from his native Somali.

He didn't lose his sense of humor, however. Asked to pose with a reporter for a picture, Ahmed at first hesitated. "It might be dangerous for you," he said with a laugh, before agreeing to the request.

The Islamic Courts Union is still in battle mode, preparing for fresh clashes as the group moves to the outskirts of Mogadishu in a push to take the last warlord strongholds. Ahmed defended the leader of his military wing, Adan Hashi Ayro, who reportedly fought U.S. troops alongside the Taliban in Afghanistan.

"One should not be taken in by Western propaganda," he said in response to questions about Ayro.

The sheik also said that the United States hasn't responded to a letter he wrote in which he categorically denied that his group is sheltering al-Qaida figures thought to be responsible for attacks on American targets.

"Al-Qaida or terrorist members are not here at all," Ahmed said. "As far as we know, the claims by the Americans against Somali suspects are exaggerated."

Setback In Somalia (WT)

By John B. Roberts

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

Two-and-a-half years ago, I first learned of the CIA's covert program to use secular warlords to contain al Qaeda in Somalia. As early as 2002 intelligence officials concluded that al Qaeda had re-established an operational network in Somalia after being routed in Afghanistan. Some reports even suggested that Osama bin Laden crossed the Arabian Sea in a dhow and found sanctuary in Somalia after escaping the noose in Tora Bora.

Until now, I refrained from writing about the Somali front in the war on al Qaeda because of its extreme sensitivity and its vital importance. Regrettably, State Department career officials, in order to condemn the program, have now confirmed to the New York Times the existence of the covert operation being run by the CIA station in Nairobi, Kenya. This is an unconscionable breach of security that ought to outrage us all.

The links between Somalia and al Qaeda predate September 11 and unlike the disputed links between al Qaeda and Iraq before the war, these ties are incontestable. The 1998 bombings of our embassies in Tanzania and Kenya were carried out through the Somali networks. Since September 11, Somali-linked terrorists have bombed a hotel catering to Israeli tourists in Mombasa, attempted to shoot down an Israeli airliner, have been tied to the London transit bombings and were caught with radioactive contraband in Britain.

To counter the risk that Somalia will become a terrorist safe haven, the United States has stationed 2,000 fast-reaction troops in neighboring Djibouti. Under presidential authority, Washington also launched a covert action program relying on a coalition of secular Somali warlords called the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism.

The alliance has been used to harass and disrupt terrorist operations in Somalia and to capture al Qaeda operatives like Suleiman Abdalla Salim Hemed for interrogation by the United States. The callow exposure of this program's existence complicates our ability to work through proxy allies in fighting terrorism.

Critics who charge that the alliance has been counterproductive and resulted in new support for the Islamic court militias who claim to have seized Mogadishu ignore the fact that al Qaeda was already well-established in Somalia before the CIA program began.

This creative, risk-taking approach to the Somali problem exemplifies the best of the CIA. It was overseen by a talented CIA station chief with a long history in the region. It was a vital program because the other alternatives are so dire.

There is no easy solution in Somalia. Allowing the country to become a safe haven for terrorists threatens not only the entire Arabian Peninsula and the Gulfs of Aden and Oman but gives al Qaeda a base for global operations. This is why Secretary of State Colin Powell, in Senate testimony in 2003, named Somalia on a short list of countries where the U.S. might have to take military action after Iraq.

The military option is undesirable for several reasons. Because of the clan structure of Somali society and widespread possession of arms, an invasion would require a level of civilian casualties that would horrify U.S. and world public opinion. Occupying forces would face an insurgency even more tenacious than in Iraq.

That is why it is crucial for the CIA-backed warlords to succeed in containing al Qaeda. But the odds have been made much more difficult by State Department disclosure of the covert program.

Every CIA officer knows covert action can be a career killer when operations are exposed or fail. The political fallout and second-guessing has just begun. How CIA Director Michael Hayden and Deputy Director Steve Kappes handle the Nairobi station chief will be closely watched by CIA officers, especially in operations. This is the acid test of whether the new CIA is a risk-averse agency where creativity and daring will be rewarded.

DOJ_NMG_0033501

To send a message throughout CIA, Messrs. Hayden and Kappes should promote the Nairobi station chief instead of sacrificing him to appease critics in other agencies or Congress.

John B. Roberts II served in the Reagan White House. He writes frequently on terrorism and national security.

Indonesia Lacks Funds To Fight Flu, World Bank Says (AP)

The Associated Press, June 13, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- Indonesia's fight against bird flu is underfunded and poorly coordinated, the World Bank said, urging the government to be more aggressive in culling fowl in infected areas.

The bank, in a report to be released today to Indonesia's biggest aid donors, also said the government needed to improve surveillance of poultry stocks to better detect outbreaks of the disease and to modify its vaccination program.

Indonesia has said it will need $900 million over the next three years to fight the H5N1 virus, which has killed at least 37 people in the nation, but has budgeted only $59 million for 2006.

"The current allocation of donor funds, about $55 million, does not correct this imbalance," the bank said yesterday, adding that it is "unclear how the government of Indonesia intends to finance the shortfall."

Bird flu has killed at least 128 people world-wide since late 2003.

So far, most human cases have been linked to contact with infected birds, but experts fear the virus could mutate into a form more easily transmissible between humans, potentially sparking a pandemic that could kill millions world-wide.

Indonesia trails only Vietnam, where 42 people have died, in human bird-flu deaths and the H5N1 virus is considered endemic in poultry in most provinces across the sprawling archipelago.

"But surveillance coverage is limited and generally unreliable to detect outbreaks," the bank said, adding that "control measures, including vaccination and culling of infected stocks are seriously underfinanced and fraught with implementation problems."

Mass culling of poultry in infected areas is one of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization's most basic containment guidelines, but Indonesia has said it can't afford to compensate farmers.

The World Bank also expressed concern about a recent cluster of cases on Sumatra island, which has raised suspicions of limited human-to-human transmission.

Bumpy Ride As China's Auto Market Booms, Leaders Clash Over Heavy Toll (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, June 13, 2006

BEIJING -- Nearly 1,000 new cars hit the streets here every day, crowding a city already choked with pollution. Levels of nitrogen dioxide currently exceed the World Health Organization's clean-air guidelines by 78%.

The mayor, Wang Qishan, complains that the number of cars flooding the roads makes it "more difficult to run the city." Local officials are so worried about air quality for the 2008 summer Olympic Games that they are considering a temporary ban on private cars.

At the same time, the city owns Beijing Automotive Industry Corp., a car maker that has joint ventures with DaimlerChrysler AG and South Korea's Hyundai Motor Co. Last year, the company and its affiliates made more than 500,000 cars, trucks and buses, employed 48,000 workers and paid more than $500 million in local taxes. By 2008, they expect to produce one million vehicles a year.

After various on-and-off restrictions, Beijing, which has more vehicles than any other Chinese city, has almost no limitations on car usage.

"This is something of great difficulty for us. The contradiction of population and the environment -- for us and the whole of China," said Mr. Wang at a March meeting.

The rise of the automobile highlights the wrenching balancing act China faces as it tries to join the ranks of modern consumer societies: improving living standards and creating jobs for the country's 1.3 billion people while keeping pollution and oil demand under control.

Officials from China's central government are divided over how to proceed. The country's powerful economic planners see the auto industry as a "pillar" of the national economy. Others, including those from the State Environmental Protection Administration, argue that China needs to limit car use and move more quickly to tighten clean-air rules.

Local leaders are also torn. Many city and provincial governments, like Beijing, have a financial stake in the industry and are eager to capitalize on ramped-up production. But they also face complaints from citizens about snarled traffic and dirty air.

DOJ_NMG_0033502

China's car debate stands out because its population is the planet's largest. Across the country, rising incomes and falling auto prices have led to an explosion in car sales, up 54% in the first three months of 2006, compared with the year-earlier period. China's auto market is now the world's second biggest, and the motor-vehicle industry employs 1.7 million workers.

The shift is happening so quickly that McDonald's Corp. said last week that it expects at least half of its new outlets in China to be drive-throughs.

And the car craze here has just begun. China now has about 25 vehicles -- and fewer than seven cars -- for every thousand people, roughly the same level as the U.S. had in 1915. If auto sales continue apace, there will be more than 130 million vehicles on China's roads by 2020 -- up from about 33 million today. That could help double China's demand for crude oil and lead to a sharp increase in greenhouse-gas emissions, according to estimates by the government and environmental groups.

"If we follow the current track of consumption patterns to develop the automobile in China," says Pan Yue, vice minister of the State Environmental Protection Administration, "the world will not be able to support" it.

Complicating matters, Chinese gasoline contains high levels of sulfur and other contaminants. It will take years and billions of dollars to improve China's refineries to make higher-quality, cleaner-burning gas.

So far, calls for stricter car controls have been largely muted by the powerful National Development and Reform Commission, which sets the country's economic-development policies.

The commission has put a priority on expanding the economy to generate jobs for the millions streaming into cities from China's countryside. Officials of provincial governments and cities -- whose performance is judged largely on their ability to boost gross domestic product -- are rushing into auto-making.

Guangdong, long known as China's export capital for consumer goods, says it wants to triple its auto-making capacity by 2010.

"How many color TV sets and refrigerators are equal to one automobile?" asked Huang Huahua, governor of Guangdong on China's southern coast, at a government conference earlier this year. "You are a fool if you don't make cars....If we still depend on color TVs and a few similar industries, then Guangdong's 9% GDP growth can no longer be assured."

In 1997, Anhui province, one of the poorest in China, teamed up with the city of Wuhu to start a government-owned car maker, Chery Automobile Co. Last year, Chery sold nearly 190,000 vehicles, more than double its sales from 2004. The company says it has had trouble expanding capacity to keep pace with demand for its cars, which sell from $3,700 up to about $25,000.

In some cases, local governments share directly in car manufacturers' profits. Shanghai's government, for example, controls and receives dividend payments from state-owned Shanghai Automotive Industry Corp., which has joint ventures with both General Motors Corp. and Volkswagen AG.

For most of the auto's history in China, there were few cars and different priorities. After the Communists rose to power in 1949, China's auto industry focused on building military vehicles, buses and trucks. The Cultural Revolution of the mid-1960s to the mid-1970s, which led to mass upheavals, hobbled the industry.

A Shift in the 1980s

China's modern car market grew slowly at first, as demand for relatively expensive cars was limited largely to government and Communist Party officials. After launching market overhauls more than two decades ago, China decided to bring in foreign expertise. In 1983, state-run Beijing Automotive signed the first joint-venture deal with American Motors Corp. to make Jeeps. Soon after, Shanghai Automotive went into business with Volkswagen.

By 1994, the government had decided that cars should play a central role in driving the country's industrial engine. The official government policy nodded toward environmental concerns, saying the government "encourages" the use of "fuel-efficient and low-polluting" vehicles. At the same time, however, officials also pressed for stepped-up production.

Even then, officials in Beijing and other cities were worried about mounting congestion and auto pollution. Beijing put varying restrictions on small cars and trucks, limiting where and when they could drive.

Development of mass transit lagged in Beijing and many other cities, creating more demand for cars. In the late 1990s, more than a dozen cities wanted subway systems. But China's central government delayed approval, partly due to budget constraints. Beijing's main east-west subway line was only finished in 2000, and large parts of the city are still inaccessible by rail.

The central government, meanwhile, was looking to strengthen the car industry by bringing in additional foreign expertise and resources. In 1997, GM won a coveted deal for a joint venture with Shanghai Automotive that now produces Buicks and other models. Many other foreign auto makers followed.

After China joined the World Trade Organization in 2001, falling prices sparked a jump in car purchases by China's more-affluent consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0033503

Today, demand by middle-class buyers is surging as salaries rise and car prices, driven down by competition, plummet.

Liu Yunzhi, a 25-year-old computer-hardware designer, bought his first car, a $5,200 Chinese-made hatchback, soon after moving into an apartment in a Beijing suburb last year. He used it to haul furniture to his new home from Ikea.

"You don't have to be a rich guy to own a car," says Mr. Liu. "You can enjoy your life more."

Price wars have heated up as more local manufacturers have entered the fray. Mr. Liu's hatchback, for instance, was made by Geely Holding Group, which moved into autos after making motorcycles. BYD Co., a producer of cellphone batteries, got into the car business in 2003 after acquiring a formerly state-run assembly plant.

Rolling Stock

In Chongqing, a city in southwest China that is hoping to become the nation's car capital, auto factories spread over more than 20 million square meters, or around 5,000 acres. Metal-stamping plants, paint shops and assembly lines churned out more than 600,000 cars and other vehicles last year -- capacity that city officials hope to more than double by 2010.

Even in Shanghai's relatively diverse economy, the auto industry employed nearly 416,000 people, accounting for about 3.4% of GDP and more than $900 million in taxes in 2005, according to government figures.

Li Qisheng is 24 and has spent two years working on assembly lines for Geely in Zhejiang province, south of Shanghai. The son of farmers, Mr. Li now earns about $250 a month, or about $1.27 an hour, doing quality-control checks on new vehicles.

Mr. Li, who also receives subsidized meals and housing in a company dormitory, says he sends about half of his earnings home every month. "It relieves the pressure on my parents," he says. Last year, his family used the money to build a new, five-story concrete house to replace an old two-floor wood home. "I'm proud of myself," Mr. Li says.

The trickle-down of industry benefits has made it hard to put on the brakes. In 2000, Shanghai decided to tighten restrictions on new car registrations, auctioning off a limited number of license plates annually. But it has gradually loosened the strictures.

During the first year of the new program, Shanghai issued 14,000 plates for an average price of $1,700. Last year, it issued 67,078 for an average price of more than $4,000.

"Residents have a very strong demand of car use," says Zhu Junyi, a researcher at the Shanghai Information Center, a government think tank. The government, he adds, "has to try its best to meet the demand."

High Toll

The toll is high. Exhaust from an estimated 2.5 million vehicles has helped make Beijing one of the most polluted cities in China, even though it has shuttered many of the coal-burning factories that once fouled its air. In 2004, levels of airborne particulate in Beijing were more than six times as high as in New York, and sulfur-dioxide levels were more than double, according to Chinese and U.S. government figures.

It wasn't until 2000 that China passed its first comprehensive emissions law and made catalytic converters, which clean vehicle exhaust, mandatory. China has modeled is auto-emissions standards after those in Europe. Still, most of the country still lags behind Europe, using rules implemented there back in 1996. Beijing has a stricter standard, in line with regulations set by the European Union in 2000. The entire nation is slated to move to that cleaner standard by 2008.

Emissions testing for cars has been spotty, and experts complain that little is known about what comes out of China's tailpipes. Beijing officials say that more than 60% of the vehicles in the city have some emissions controls, an acknowledgment that up to 40% of them -- mostly older models -- have none at all.

In 2005, China imposed its first fuel-efficiency standards, which some analysts say will eventually be stricter than in the U.S. Earlier this year, the central government called on cities like Beijing to lift bans originally imposed on small cars in order to encourage purchases of more energy-efficient models. The government also instituted a graduated tax on new cars, designed to discourage purchases of gas guzzlers.

But to really limit cars' environmental toll and energy consumption, experts such as Lee Schipper, director of research at the World Resources Institute's Embarq Center for Transportation and the Environment in Washington, D.C., say China needs to levy road-use fees, lift gas prices and encourage the use of mass transit, as well as hybrid and electric vehicles.

"The rapid rate of growth is more than government institutions are prepared to deal with," says Mr. Schipper. When he suggests to local officials that Chinese cities limit the number of cars on the road, he says they resist. "They say: 'You can't restrict cars.' "

Russian Party Asks Young: Who Wants To Be A Deputy? (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

LIPETSK, Russia -- To the list of contest prizes that stoke fantasies worldwide -- riches, fame, a dream date, a new washer-dryer -- add another: a seat in parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0033504

Shunning pinstripes for shorts and bathing suits, a group of potential legislators was unveiled at a beach party here last weekend -- the first-round winners in a competition called Political Factory, modeled on the popular Russian television show "Star Factory." Plucked from obscurity, a few of these aspiring lawmakers, or deputies, are due to join the Russian ruling class by October.

"I'm ready to fight and to solve the problems of young people!" proclaimed a beaming Svetlana Kondakova, 21, on hearing she'd made the cut. When a DJ in wraparound shades remarked that what her bikini top concealed would help her advance in politics, the crowd roared its approval.

In April, the Supreme Council of United Russia, the political party that supports President Vladimir Putin and controls legislatures at both the federal and regional levels, decided that 20 percent of all candidates on party lists in future elections must be between 21 and 28 years of age.

The move is part of efforts to broaden the party's membership beyond the stolid bureaucrats and businessmen who currently stuff its ranks -- many of them inspired not by ideological fervor but by the party's almost complete electoral dominance.

Lipetsk's regional governor, Oleg Korolyov, joined United Russia last October, part of a wave of political grandees switching sides. But how to recruit at the entry level? Young Guard, the party's youth wing, hatched the idea of a reality contest and opened it up to all comers. The competition was launched in May in nine regions, including Lipetsk, that are scheduled to hold local parliamentary elections in the fall.

"It's the first time in Russian history that a party has made a decision to share real power . . . on every level from local to federal," said Ivan Demidov, a Young Guard leader and well-known television personality. "It's the first actual step toward renewing the elite."

According to surveys, young people in Russia are largely indifferent to politics, despite Kremlin fears that they could become the vanguard of the kind of popular revolt that toppled governments in neighboring Ukraine and Georgia. Although a host of youth organizations were formed in the last two years to tame or channel youth activism, most of them quickly faded.

So Young Guard used modern marketing to try to attract recruits.

You are young.

You are active.

You are moving forward,

And Political Factory will open the doors for you!

Political Factory gives you a chance to get to power!

So promised a jingle aired over the last two months on local radio stations in Lipetsk, which is about 225 miles south of Moscow.

Critics call this approach a desperate gimmick. "Demidov is a showman," said Vladimir Pribylovsky, head of the Panorama research institute in Moscow. "The president asked him to propagandize among young people and he had to come up with something new to generate some interest. But I don't believe they'll give away parliamentary seats. There are too many of the party's adults who want them."

One young person who embraced the idea was Kondakova. "You look at politicians, and all you see are middle-aged men -- and how are they going to solve the questions of young people?" she said, speaking on the beach of an artificial lake outside Lipetsk. "This competition is a real surprise and a chance for young people to actually do things."

Contestants were invited to come to a Young Guard office in the city. There they had to fill out a long questionnaire on their personal backgrounds and political views.

"The USA is our friend, enemy or economic partner?" one question asked. Respondents were instructed to elaborate on their answers. There are no set correct answers, they were told.

"The U.S. is our strong competitor," wrote Andrei Trofimenkov, 26, who works for a local private group that promotes cooperation between government and business, in a fairly typical response. The Lipetsk branch of Young Guard provided The Washington Post with the completed questionnaires of all 60 people who entered the contest in the city.

"It is not our friend because it is not interested in restoring Russia's greatness," continued Trofimenkov. "Neither is it our enemy because it's not interested in Russia's total elimination."

"It's too tough to say enemy," wrote Dmitry Zakhvatayev, 24, a manager at a small company. "But they don't wish us any good, that's for sure."

Some responses were inflammatory. Asked what the first action of a new youth movement should be, Kondakova wrote that she would like "to disperse a gay parade." An attempt to stage the first gay and lesbian pride parade in Moscow last month ended in violence when it was broken up by police and skinheads.

"I expected worse," Demidov said after reviewing questionnaires from the first nine regions taking part in the contest. "We wanted to find those who have desire, who identify themselves as leaders. There was a lot of confusion about ideology, in their understanding of power, but the main thing is they have the desire to take part. Some people say it's an artificial thing. It's always difficult to find talented people, but it's better to have this 20 percent as a door, rather than the wall we've had until now."

DOJ_NMG_0033505

One question asked why Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the Russian oil tycoon who clashed with the Kremlin, was in prison. Almost everyone wrote that he was guilty of financial crimes.

But others showed independence from the government's line.

Pavel Lysenko, a 21-year-old who works for the local Interior Ministry, said Khodorkovsky was in jail only because "he was able to earn money and the Russian mentality can't tolerate that." Yevgeny Zenkov, a 23-year-old chemistry teacher and boy scout leader, said Khodorkovsky was "in jail for his political views."

Both Lysenko and Zenkov are still in the contest.

Entrants also recorded 45-second videos in which they stated why they wanted to be members of parliament. A panel of judges, including Young Guard activists and well-known young people from Lipetsk, conducted follow-up interviews by phone.

"I was looking for some creativity," said Maxim Bereznev, a 23-year-old break dancer who took part in the judging.

On June 4, the original field of 60 was cut to 20, half of whom had no previous affiliation with United Russia or Young Guard, according to their questionnaires.

Contestants heard the news on the beach, where United Russia had set up a stage and DJs from a local radio station played Russian hip-hop and house music. To the side, under a stand of trees, young activists grilled hot dogs and people helped themselves to the mineral water for which Lipetsk has been famous since the days of Czar Peter the Great.

The winners were called up to the stage in groups of four. In responses to a DJ, the fledgling politicians proclaimed their devotion to the party, democracy and the Russian way of life.

"It's not important which party you belong to," said Sergei Pozdnyakov, 26, a former Communist Party loyalist who was among the 20 preliminary winners. "The main thing is to be with people who have some sincere beliefs."

Over the next month, the winners have to gather the signatures of 500 people who pledge to support them in the fall elections. They also have to organize some local events to show their political smarts. The contest will end with a debate among the 20 aspirants before the judging panel makes its final decision.

On June 27, five final winners will be chosen in Lipetsk and added to the party list. Three of those will almost certainly end up in parliament.

"We're looking for energetic, thinking patriots," said Alexei Demikhov, head of Young Guard in Lipetsk. "And our main task is to choose those we won't feel ashamed of when they become deputies."

The Wrong Way To Sway Egypt (WP)

By Jon B. Alterman

The Washington Post, June 13, 2006

There are many in Washington who think that Egyptian politics turned around last spring because of President Bush's demonstrated resolve to promote political change in that country. They further believe that the leadership in Cairo reverted to its bad old ways when Bush's attention strayed.

They are wrong on both counts. Profound change was never in the air in Egypt. Some Americans may have been ebullient about changes afoot there, but Egyptians' level of political participation told a different story: Fewer than 5 percent of the electorate bothered to vote in last May's referendum on allowing multi-candidate elections for president, and perhaps 20 percent voted in the presidential election itself.

Misreading this history causes many to believe that the United States should turn up the pressure and condition its aid to Egypt on continued political reform. This is a move that makes sense on its face. It also happens to make bad policy. The U.S. government should continue to press hard for reform in Egypt, and it should closely scrutinize the aid package. But linking the two would be counterproductive, if not disastrous.

Like the aging villas in downtown Cairo, U.S. aid to Egypt is the fading legacy of another time. In the 1970s, when peace between Israel and any of its Arab neighbors was a fantastic dream, and when picking Egypt off from the East Bloc was a major coup in the Cold War, Egypt was worth every penny of the billions of dollars in U.S. aid that it received.

Three decades later, the Soviet Union is gone, the Arab League has embraced a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, and al-Jazeera's maps label Israel as such. Egypt helps the United States in a wide number of areas -- especially with regard to counterterrorism cooperation and Arab-Israeli peace issues -- but it is increasingly difficult to find instances in which Egyptian assistance has been vital to the success of a critical U.S. mission.

Meanwhile, more than $60 billion in U.S. assistance over 30 years has engendered little goodwill on Egypt's streets. According to a Gallup poll released last month, 72 percent of Egyptians believe that the United States is not serious about improving economic conditions in the Middle East -- U.S. assistance notwithstanding.

DOJ_NMG_0033506

The United States may well decide to reduce assistance to Egypt on the merits. But reducing it as part of a conditionality scheme would not only not work, it would also be damaging.

Studies strongly suggest that foreign aid conditionality works best when it concentrates on objective measures of actions that are controlled by a small group of people. Conditioning preferential interest rates on monetary reserve targets is a perfect example. Tying assistance to democratization is exactly the opposite. Democratization is notoriously subjective, and the product of millions of small decisions every day. By many measures, especially freedom of speech, Egypt is far freer than it was even three years ago. But the brutal repression of street demonstrations in recent weeks is a sign that freedom of action lags behind. Measuring either one with precision is impossible.

Outside of the academic literature, there are other reasons political conditionality is unlikely to work with Egypt. First, even millions of dollars in aid are unlikely to persuade the Egyptian leadership to roll the dice when it feels its very survival is at stake. The breakdown of public order in Iraq further undermines the confidence of Egypt's leaders that Americans' judgment is better than their own in this regard. Second, Egyptian officials feel outsiders are deeply naive about the threats posed by local radical groups, which many of Egypt's oppressive measures seek to curtail. Third, for more than a century Egyptians have been hypersensitive to foreign diktats because of the country's long history of occupation.

Thus far the Egyptian government has discredited advocates of democratization as foreign agents while gaining domestic credit for defending the nation against foreign intrigue. In any highly public spat over whether Egypt has met U.S.-imposed conditions, citizens would almost certainly rally around the government, and our friends would be isolated. In addition, the Egyptian government would be far less cooperative on a variety of important security issues, significantly increasing the cost of U.S. military and intelligence operations. There is no question that the Egyptian government would rather harm its own interests than be humiliated.

Conditioning aid might make us feel better, but it would not change Egypt. We need a less flashy but more effective approach. We do need to redesign the aid program, but we should do so in a way that allows Egyptians to claim victory while diminishing the overall amount of aid.

We also need to have our security and intelligence professionals work with their Egyptian counterparts to reach common understandings of common threats, especially with regard to radicalism and violence. Such efforts should simultaneously seek to reach agreement on the kinds of political activity that are not threatening to public order.

Finally, the United States needs to continue to press for greater openness and participation in Egypt. The world is changing, and the old methods of political control no longer work. The Egyptian government knows this, and it is seeking to adapt. Its efforts may be insufficient or ineffective, and it will have to live with the consequences. Our role should be to encourage and prod. Getting into a public spitting match with the Egyptian government would have precisely the opposite effect.

The writer directs the Middle East Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Foreign Aid Has Flaws. So What? (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, June 13, 2006

Don't tell anyone, but a dirty little secret within the foreign aid world is that aid often doesn't work very well.

Now that truth has been aired (and sometimes exaggerated) in a provocative new book by William Easterly, "The White Man's Burden." Mr. Easterly, a former World Bank official who is now an economics professor at New York University, has tossed a hand grenade at the world's bleeding hearts — and, worst of all, he makes some valid points.

Let me say right off that stingy Republicans should not read this book. It might inflame their worst suspicions.

But the rest of us should read it, because there is a growing constituency for fighting global poverty, and we need to figure out how to make that money more effective.

I disagree with many of Professor Easterly's arguments, but he's right about one central reality: helping people can be much harder than it looks. When people are chronically hungry, for example, shipping in food can actually make things worse, because the imported food lowers prices and thus discourages farmers from planting in the next season. (That's why the United Nations, when spending aid money, tries to buy food in the region rather than import it.)

On one of my last trips to Darfur, I had dinner at a restaurant in Nyala called K2. Out back were 18 big white S.U.V.'s belonging to the U.N. and aid groups; that amounted to nearly $1 million worth of vehicles, in a country where people are starving.

The aid workers are struggling heroically in a dangerous and difficult place, and I don't begrudge them reliable vehicles. But something seems wrong when international agencies are more successful at maintaining S.U.V.'s than clinics. (One reason is that budgeting is often done annually, and one of the ways to spend a grant in a single year is to buy a vehicle.)

DOJ_NMG_0033507

It's well-known that the countries that have succeeded best in lifting people out of poverty (China, Singapore, Malaysia) have received minimal aid, while many that have been flooded with aid (Niger, Togo, Zambia) have ended up poorer. Thus many economists accept that aid doesn't generally help poor countries grow, but argue that it does stimulate growth in poor countries with good governance. That was the conclusion of a study in 2000 by Craig Burnside and David Dollar.

Professor Easterly repeated that study, using a larger pool of data, and — alas — found no improvement even in countries with good governance.

Saddest of all, Raghuram Rajan and Arvind Subramanian of the International Monetary Fund have found that "aid inflows have systematic adverse effects on a country's competitiveness." One problem is that aid pushes up the local exchange rate, discouraging local manufacturing. Mr. Subramanian also argues that aid income can create the same kinds of problems as oil income — that famous "oil curse" — by breeding dependency and undermining local institutions.

All these findings can be pretty shattering to a bleeding-heart American. But cheer up.

Some other studies indicate that aid does improve growth (economists don't agree about this any more than they agree about anything else). And whatever the impact on economic growth rates, aid definitely does something far more important: it saves lives.

For pennies, you can vaccinate a child and save his or her life. For $5 you can buy a family a large mosquito net and save several people from malaria. For $250, you can repair a teenage girl's fistula, a common childbirth injury, and give her a life again.

The Center for Global Development, a Washington think tank, has published a terrific book, "Millions Saved," demonstrating how health projects have saved lives. Eradicating smallpox and reducing river blindness have improved the lives of more people for less money than almost any investment imaginable. In Darfur, we haven't done nearly enough. But our aid shipments have kept alive hundreds of thousands of people.

For my whole adult life, I've sponsored children through Plan USA, and in visiting my "adopted" child in places like the Philippines and Sudan, I've seen how the kids' lives are transformed by American sponsors. Aid is no panacea, but it is a lifesaver.

So let's not shy away from a conversation about the effectiveness of aid. The problems are real, but so are the millions of people alive today who wouldn't be if not for aid. In the end, if we have tough conversations about foreign aid, then I believe Americans will acknowledge the challenges — and then, clear-eyed, agree to dig more deeply than ever, for that is simply the best way we have of asserting our own humanity.

DOJ_NMG_0033508

Ames, Andrew

From: Ames, Andrew
Sent: Tuesday, June 13, 2006 11:15 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brett Gerry; Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennifer Brosnahan; Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/13/06 Civil Division News

Press Release: Former Head of FDA to be Deposed on Tuesday, June 13 in 'Morning-After Pill' Case as Agency Rejects Petition

Judges Press C.I.A. Lawyer Over Withheld Documents

White House: Defending spy case could imperil U.S. Revealing program's details in court would be dangerous, officials say

US court tosses lawsuit over "In God We Trust"

Atheist's currency suit tossed

Indian plaintiffs ask judge to hold official in contempt

Court orders state to pay federal government

Law firms sue VA for loss of files

Press Release: Government moves for seizure and forfeiture of 2.7 million dollars of unapproved medical devices

Drugmaker to pay $8.5 million to settle Texas Medicaid lawsuit

MARIO GABELLI'S BROKEN LEGACY

FDA sued for lax regulation of GM foods

Atlanta system to pay $3 million in False Claims suit

Ex-FBI agent tells of '81 probe

PRNewswire

June 12, 2006

Press Release: Former Head of FDA to be Deposed on Tuesday, June 13 in 'Morning-After Pill' Case as Agency Rejects Petition

NEW YORK, June 12 /PRNewswire/ -- On Tuesday, June 13, 2006, attorneys from the Center for Reproductive Rights will question former U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) Commissioner Dr. Mark B. McClellan in a court- ordered deposition about the FDA's continued failure to make the emergency contraceptive Plan B available without a prescription.

The deposition comes as the FDA announced this past Friday, June 9, that it rejected the Center's 2001 citizen's petition requesting emergency contraceptive products be granted over-the-counter status. Five years ago, the Center filed the petition on behalf of numerous health care and reproductive rights organizations and until last week, the FDA claimed that it was still actively considering the petition.

"The FDA's rejection of our citizen's petition in the midst of this lawsuit simply confirms what we have believed all along. The FDA, in the thrall of the Bush administration's anti-science agenda, has put aside its mission to promote public health in favor of depriving women of easier access to this important drug," said Simon Heller, staff attorney at the Center for Reproductive Rights and lead attorney in the case.

The McClellan testimony will be the fourth in a series taken by the Center as part of its lawsuit against the FDA. Last month, the Center deposed three other key figures associated with the agency's refusal to allow women to buy Plan B over-the-counter-former Commissioner Dr. Lester Crawford, Deputy Commissioner Dr. Janet Woodcock, and the Director of the Center for Drug Evaluation and Research Dr. Steven Galson.

Next month, the Center will question another former FDA official, Dr. Susan Wood, the director of the Office of Women's Health, who resigned last August in protest of the agency's handling of Plan B.

In December 2003, an FDA Advisory Committee voted 23-4 to approve Barr Laboratories' application to the FDA to make Plan B available over-the- counter, rather than just by prescription. The agency's scientific staff supported approval, but in May of 2004, FDA senior management overruled them and rejected the application, citing concern about the pill's use by teenagers under the age of 16.

Every year, three million women experience unplanned pregnancies in this country -- one every 10.5 seconds -- according to the non-partisan research organization The Guttmacher Institute. Experts estimate that better access to emergency contraception could prevent as many as half of these pregnancies.

"Decades of scientific research and years of international use of the "morning-after pill" among women of all ages have proven that it is safe, effective and belongs on drug store shelves," said Nancy Northup, President of the Center for Reproductive Rights. "We are now more determined than ever to use the courts to force the FDA to do its job and make Plan B available without prescription."

The lawsuit Tummino v. von Eschenbach was filed on January 21, 2005, by the Center for Reproductive Rights in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York on behalf of the Association of Reproductive Health Professionals (ARHP), National Latina Institute for Reproductive Health, and individuals from a grassroots advocacy group, the Morning-After Pill Conspiracy.

END

New York Times

June 13, 2006

Judges Press C.I.A. Lawyer Over Withheld Documents

By ANEMONA HARTOCOLLIS

A federal appeals court panel in Manhattan questioned a lawyer for the federal government yesterday as to whether the Central Intelligence Agency had a legitimate national security interest in refusing to confirm or deny the existence of documents authorizing it to detain and interrogate terrorism suspects overseas.

The tough questioning came in oral arguments by the American Civil Liberties Union and lawyers for the C.I.A. before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The civil liberties group is trying to force the C.I.A. to disclose how much authority it has been given to interrogate detainees since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Through the Freedom of Information Act, the A.C.L.U. is seeking documents, including a directive said to have been signed by President Bush, giving the agency the authority to set up detention sites outside the United States and to interrogate prisoners. In its lawsuit, the group says the existence of these documents has been hinted at in news reports.

But the government has refused to confirm or deny the documents' existence, saying that to do so would jeopardize national security by revealing C.I.A. methods and activities. Last September, Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of Federal District Court upheld that position, and yesterday's hearing was part of the A.C.L.U.'s appeal of his ruling.

The three-judge appeals panel seemed divided on the issue, with Judge John Gleeson asking the most forceful questions of the government lawyer, Peter Skinner. Judge Gleeson seemed to be trying to determine whether the A.C.L.U. was right in contending that the agency was acting to avoid political embarrassment, rather than out of national security interest.

The judge asked Mr. Skinner whether the C.I.A.'s position had "shifted a little bit" during the litigation. Initially, Judge Gleeson said, the government seemed to be refusing to disclose even whether the C.I.A. had an "interest" in the questioning of detainees abroad.

Now, he said, the C.I.A. seemed to be admitting it had an interest in helping other agencies question detainees. The government was arguing, he said, that the C.I.A. wanted to safeguard information about whether it had been granted any independent authority to set up detention centers and interrogate prisoners.

"Independent engagement as opposed to helping out other agencies," Judge Gleeson said.

Mr. Skinner denied that the government had shifted its argument, though he suggested that it had clarified it. The C.I.A., he said, acknowledged all along that it had helped other agencies in interrogations and that when it did so, it was governed by Justice Department rules.

But, Mr. Skinner said, the agency "never acknowledged an interest or ability to go beyond those legal limitations" and was not going to do so now.

Megan Lewis, the lawyer for the A.C.L.U., argued that any information that would be revealed by merely acknowledging the existence of the documents would be so general that it would not jeopardize national security or betray specific intelligence-gathering methods. To argue otherwise, Ms. Lewis said, is "tantamount to the C.I.A. attempting to deny its interest in spying."

Outside court later, she said the documents, if they existed — "and I believe they do" — might be revealing, but "that's another fight for another day."

The A.C.L.U. seeks disclosure of two documents. One is said to be a Justice Department memorandum "specifying interrogation methods that the C.I.A. may use against top Al Qaeda members." The second is the directive said to be signed by Mr. Bush authorizing the agency to set up detention facilities outside the United States "and/or outlining interrogation methods that may be used against detainees."

Although oral arguments in the appeals court are often delivered in legal shorthand, yesterday's seemed even more opaque than usual. Almost apologetically, Mr. Skinner told the judges he was "somewhat constrained" in his ability to explain his argument and "connect the dots" because some of the C.I.A.'s reasoning in the case was classified.

The agency has submitted papers to the court that even the plaintiffs have not been allowed to see.

As the hearing came to a close, Judge Joseph M. McLaughlin made a joke about the obscurity, quoting a Jesuit logician, Father John Gerard, who in 1597 told a British interrogator: "I do not know where he is. But if I did, I could not and would not tell you."

The Jesuit doctrine of equivocation, Judge McLaughlin said, "lives on."

END

Detroit News

June 13, 2006

White House: Defending spy case could imperil U.S. Revealing program's details in court would be dangerous, officials say

By Gregg Krupa
The Detroit News

Detroit - The Bush administration argued in U.S. District Court on Monday that it cannot defend itself against accusations that a domestic spying program is illegal and unconstitutional because details of the program would be revealed, rendering it ineffective and jeopardizing national security.

"The president has decided that the program is necessary to protect and defend the United States of America against a terrorist attack by the al-Qaeda network, which has already killed thousands of Americans," Anthony Coppolino, a lawyer for the Department of Justice, said in the nation's first court hearing on the spying program.

"Without evidence that goes to the heart of the matter, the president's claims cannot be addressed."

The domestic surveillance program - in which the National Security Agency taps calls between the U.S. and other countries - is being challenged by a host of lawyers, academicians, journalists and advocates for civil liberties. They all asked U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor to order a halt to the spying.

The case is one of a few - and the first in which the government has made an argument - that could determine how much power the president has to conduct domestic spying without obtaining prior approval.

Diggs Taylor heard arguments for and against so-called summary judgment Monday without issuing a decision or saying when she might. Another hearing in the case is scheduled for July 10. That hearing will concern the government's motion to dismiss the case based on its privilege against revealing military or state secrets if doing so threatens national security.

A lawyer for the plaintiffs argued that the Bush administration's position about state secrets is of little relevance to the suit.

"The issue in this case is simply whether the National Security Administration is violating the law and the Constitution in eavesdropping on the telephone calls of Americans without a warrant," said Ann Beeson, a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union. "... And the government has admitted that the NSA is eavesdropping and not obtaining a warrant."

The statute the Bush administration admits violating, Beeson said, offers all the power the government needs to spy on terrorists, or others, in the U.S. The Federal Intelligence Surveillance Act provides the mechanism for domestic spying with a warrant authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Diggs Taylor asked Beeson only one question, related to whether the plaintiffs have "standing" to bring the suit. To sue, plaintiffs must show that they are both affected and harmed by the activity at issue.

END

Reuters

June 13, 2006

US court tosses lawsuit over "In God We Trust"

SAN FRANCISCO (Reuters) - A U.S. district court judge on Monday dismissed a lawsuit brought by a California atheist against the U.S. government for its use of the phrase "In God We Trust" on its coins and currency.

Michael Newdow, the Sacramento, California lawyer and doctor who had previously launched a court challenge on behalf of his daughter over the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance said in schools, had argued that "In God We Trust" on monetary instruments violates his rights.

Newdow claimed that by using coins and currency bearing the phrase, he is forced to carry religious dogma, proselytize and evangelize for monotheism.

Judge Frank Damrell of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of California held in his opinion that "In God We Trust" is secular in nature and use, and its appearance on coins and currency does not show government coercion on behalf of monotheism.

Newdow told Reuters he would appeal to the San Francisco-based U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled in his favor in his "under God" lawsuit, a decision later overruled by the U.S. Supreme Court, which found Newdow could sue not on behalf of his daughter because he lacked custody.

"The case is really straightforward. The history is overwhelmingly on my side," Newdow said.

END

ASSOCIATED PRESS

June 13, 2006

Atheist's currency suit tossed

By Steve Lawrence

SACRAMENTO - A federal judge on Monday rejected a lawsuit from an atheist who said having the phrase "In God We Trust" on U.S. coins and dollar bills violated his First Amendment rights.

U.S. District Judge Frank Damrell Jr. said the minted words amounted to a secular national slogan that did not trample on Michael Newdow's avowed religious views.

"There is no proper allegation that the government compelled plaintiff to affirm a repugnant belief in monotheism," Damrell said in dismissing the suit.

Newdow, a Sacramento doctor and lawyer, also is engaged in an ongoing effort to have the Pledge of Allegiance banned from public schools because it contains the words "under God."

Two years ago, the pledge fight reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which said Newdow lacked standing to bring the case because he did not have custody of the daughter on whose behalf he brought the case.

But a Sacramento federal judge sided with Newdow in September after he filed an identical lawsuit on behalf of parents with children in three Sacramento-area school districts. The case is pending before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Informed of the "In God We Trust" decision on Monday, Newdow said he was not disappointed because it would give him an edge in an appeal.

Newdow sued Congress and several federal officials, claiming that by making money with "In God We Trust" on it the government was establishing a religion in violation of the First Amendment clause requiring separation of church and state. The phrase "excludes people who don't believe in God," he argued.

"The placement of 'In God We Trust' on the coins and currency was clearly done for religious purposes and to have religious effects," Newdow wrote in the 162-page suit, which was filed in November.

Damrell disagreed, citing a 9th Circuit decision from 1970 that concluded the four words were a national motto that had "nothing whatsoever to do with the establishment of religion." Newdow had argued the appeals court decision was "wrongly decided."

"'Wrongly decided' or not, this court must and does ... follow 9th Circuit precedent," Damrell said. Congress first authorized a reference to God on a two-cent piece in 1864. In 1955, the year after lawmakers had the words "under God" put into the Pledge of Allegiance, Congress passed a law requiring all U.S. currency to carry the motto "In God We Trust."

END

Aberdeen American News (SD)

June 13, 2006

Indian plaintiffs ask judge to hold official in contempt

On the job less than a month, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne is already being pulled into a 10-year-old class\l "l"-action\l "l" lawsuit filed by American Indians that has dogged the Interior Department through the Clinton and Bush administrations.

In a motion filed Friday, plaintiffs asked a federal judge to make Kempthorne the third successive Interior secretary held in contempt in the lawsuit. They charge the Interior Department has continued to conceal computer security problems in violation of a 2005 court ruling requiring it to report weaknesses that could put Indian records at risk.

The Indians accuse the government of mismanaging more than $100 billion in royalties from their lands since 1887.

U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth has found Kempthorne's predecessors, Bruce Babbitt and Gale Norton, in contempt and has more than once ordered the department's computers disconnected from the Internet to protect Indians' records. Norton's contempt charge was vacated on appeal.

END

AP

June 13, 2006

Court orders state to pay federal government

DENVER_A federal appeals court says the state of Oklahoma must pay (m) millions of dollars to the federal government for Sardis Lake and its water supply.

The debt has been estimated at 60 (m) million dollars.

The government built the lake near Clayton in southeast Oklahoma in 1974 under a contract in which the state agreed to repay construction costs over 50 years and to pay for future operating costs.

But when no cities or industries could be found to buy the water the state stopped making payments in 1997 and the federal government sued.

State officials admit the contract is valid, but say it's not enforceable until the Legislature appropriates money to pay it.

The federal court says the fact legislators haven't appropriated the money makes no difference and says the state is required to perform its obligations under the contract.

END

TheError! Hyperlink reference not valid.Portland Business Journal

June 10, 2006

Law firms sue VA for loss of files

A Portland law firm joined two others on Friday to file a class-action lawsuit on behalf of all individuals whose private personal information, including Social Security numbers, was disclosed by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs in May.

The suit, Daniel Kennedy, et al. v. United States Department of Veterans Affairs, et al., was filed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia by the Mason Law Firm PC, the law offices of Peter N. Wasylyk and the law office of Andrew S. Kierstead.

Mason has offices in Washington, D.C., and New York City. Wasylyk is in Prividence, R.I. and Kierstead is in Portland.

Early in May, a low-ranking data analyst and long-time Veterans Affairs employee removed from VA facilities VA files containing the private personal information (including names, dates of birth, Social Security numbers, disability ratings, and certain medical information) of 26.5 million persons comprised of veterans discharged since 1975 and as many as 1.1 million active-duty military personnel, 430,000 National Guard members and 645,000 reserve members and had taken the files to his home.

The VA employee then copied the files onto his computer and/or external disks for an unspecified purpose. The employee's computer and/or disks -- which are not believed to be encrypted or password protected -- were then allegedly stolen during a burglary of the employee's home and have not been recovered.

The law firms claim VA officials knew about the theft within hours of the crime but did not inform Secretary of Veterans Affairs R. James Nicholson until 13 days later. The firms said upon learning of the disclosures, Nicholson and VA Deputy Secretary Gordon G. Mansfield unreasonably delayed reporting the disclosures to law enforcement agencies despite knowledge of the imminent and substantial risk of serious harm to the personal security of the affected veterans.

The firms did not say how much they are asking the government to pay or the loss of the files.

END

M2 PRESSWIRE

June 13, 2006

Press Release: Government moves for seizure and forfeiture of 2.7 million dollars of unapproved medical devices

New York - United States Attorney Terrance P. Flynn announced today the filing, in U.S. District Court for the Western District of New York, of a Complaint seeking the seizure and ultimate forfeiture of numerous medical devices and their component parts. The Complaint alleges that the medical devices and their component parts are in violation of a series of Food and Drug Administration (FDA) statues in that the devices are both adulterated and misbranded. Chief Judge of the Western District of New York, Richard

J. Arcara, has scheduled an initial court conference on the litigation for August 25, 2006 at 9:00 a.m.

The Complaint alleges that between August of 2005 and January of 2006, Universal Academy, Inc., shipped into the United States from Canada over 200,000 units and component parts to a fulfillment business in the Buffalo area. The owner of the property is allegedly a Canadian company called University Academy located in Markham, Ontario, and is associated with a Dr. Ho from China. Dr. Ho sold these devices touting miracle cures using his various products. The medical devices, called Dr-Ho's Double Massage and Dr-Ho's Muscle Massage were marketed in the United States. FDA officials have put the retail value of the medical devices in excess of 2.7 million dollars. The complaint seeks the forfeiture and ultimate destruction of the devices.

The devices, components, and accessories, are adulterated under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (Act) because they are unapproved class lll medical devices and they do not meet mandatory performance standards. In addition, the devices are labeled for use to treat serious medical conditions, including diabetic neuropathy, fibromyalgia, arthritis, migraine headaches, and multiple sclerosis. Since these devices have not been approved by FDA, the safety parameters associated with their use and the efficacy of the devices for use to treat disease have not been determined. These devices are misbranded because their labeling lacks adequate directions for intended use, they are not labeled prescription use only, and they are not being used by consumers by an order of a licensed manufacturer. They are further misbranded because they were manufactured at an unregistered facility.

After the units were assembled in the Buffalo area, they were transferred to another warehouse in Connecticut where they were then shipped to consumers throughout the United States.

Flynn also noted that the United States Attorney's Office in New Haven, Connecticut, has also filed a civil complaint against approximately $450,000 worth of Dr-Ho medical devices found there.

The case is being investigated by the Food and Drug Administration, under the direction of Compliance Officer James Kewley and Investigator Michael Charles, both with the FDA's New York District-Buffalo Office. U.S. Attorney Flynn noted that the fulfillment house, GRE Fulfillment, has cooperated fully with the investigation. The case is being prosecuted by Assistant United\l "l" States\l "l" Attorney\l "l" Richard D.

Kaufman, who is Chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office Asset Forfeiture Unit, and Jennifer Caruso, a trial attorney from the Office of Chief Counsel for FDA.

END

Bloomberg

June 13, 2006

Drugmaker to pay $8.5 million to settle Texas Medicaid lawsuit

Baxter International Inc., the world's biggest maker of blood-disease treatments, has agreed to pay $8.5 million to settle a suit alleging it falsely reported the prices of drugs to the Texas Medicaid system.

The Texas attorney general sued Deerfield-based Baxter, North Chicago-based Abbott Laboratories and B. Braun Medical Inc. in 2004, claiming the companies misreported prices of intravenous fluids and injectable medications, leading Texas Medicaid to reimburse pharmacies at above-market rates.

"We are pleased the company chose to cooperate instead of fighting the state, but regardless, those who ignore the law in the pursuit of illegal profits must pay for the error of their ways," Atty. Gen. Greg Abbott said Monday. The suits against Abbott Labs and B. Braun are still pending.

The settlement brings to $64 million the amount Texas has collected from Medicaid billing disputes since bringing its first case in 2000, including a $27 million settlement with Schering-Plough Corp. in May 2004.

The state credits a 1997 Medicaid fraud law that provides whistleblowers with a percentage of damages for helping bring alleged pricing abuses to light.

"For a period of time we did not provide information in as timely a manner or in the format required by Texas regulation," said Baxter spokeswoman Deborah Spak. "We have cooperated fully with their investigation, and we have taken appropriate steps to make sure their unique reporting requirements have been met."

END

Fortune

June 26, 2006

MARIO GABELLI'S BROKEN LEGACY

MARCIA VICKERS

His returns ebbing, the feisty billionaire investor is seeing his image sullied by scandal.

Mario Gabelli is doing what he does best: talking. The billionaire money manager is chatting amiably over the phone about the wave of criticism that's been directed at him lately as a result of a pair of scandals. A legal dispute with his original financial backers has focused attention on both the governance of his publicly traded mutual fund company and his exorbitant pay package--$55 million of disclosed income in 2005 alone. And a civil suit involving the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" and the Federal Communications Commission that alleges he fraudulently manipulated FCC auctions for cellphone licenses intended for minorities and small-business owners has, at best, raised questions about his business ethics.

But Gabelli is having none of it. He has long fashioned himself a telecom expert, indeed, a pioneer of sorts. And as he holds forth on the FCC matter, he enthusiastically recalls long-ago meetings with wireless executives and brags about his bona fides on the topic of cellphone auctions. "I was the very first guy on Wall Street to author a research report on wireless auctions, way back in 1982," he says triumphantly. Yet minutes later, when asked more specifically about the FCC suit, he seems to remember the details of his legal position and offers an absurd reversal. "Me? I have no wireless expertise," he says. "I don't even use a cellphone."

In an earlier stage of his career, such bumbling might have come off as endearing. Just Mario being Mario. ("Mario talks faster than he thinks," one of his friends says.) The fertile mind, the hiccup-quick wit, the supreme confidence--all that plus his ardent pursuit of media attention have made him a favorite of the business press for a generation. His high profile, in turn, has helped make him perhaps the most famous mutual fund manager working today. Sure, he's always had an ego--and a controlling, hypercompetitive streak. But it all went into the persona of "Super Mario," as he is often called on TV and in print, who is always ready with a cute quip or a stock tip.

In the context of recent events, however, self-contradiction can't help but seem a little tragic. Suddenly, at a time in his life when the 63-year-old should be reveling in his tremendous professional success, he is embroiled in scandals of his own making that threaten to undo everything he's built. In May, Gabelli, who oversees around $27 billion in assets at his publicly traded Gamco Investors, reluctantly settled--at a cost of some $100 million--the lawsuit with his original investors. The same month a proxy advisory group representing some of Gamco's big investors protested Gabelli's lofty pay. Then, in the first week in June, Gabelli and his fellow defendants agreed to a settlement in the FCC case--which is expected to cost him another $100 million or more. For Gabelli, the majority shareholder of Gamco, it has been an expensive few months indeed. Still, if any of it has gotten to him, he's not admitting it. "Look, lawsuits come and go," he says. "What I care about is making money for my investors."

That hasn't happened much lately. Under the cloud of these legal disputes, Gamco's stock--which had significantly outperformed the broad market since the company went public in 1999--fell 27% from its 2006 high in January, erasing $380 million in market value. Investors in his mutual funds have not been faring well either. Over five years through the end of May, on average all Gabelli and Gamco funds tracked by Morningstar have trailed 57% of their peers. Gabelli's biggest fund, the $2.3 billion Gabelli Asset, posted a 7% annual return during that period, lagging 63% of its peers (though several smaller funds have done well). Since 1999, mutual fund tracker Morningstar has graded Gabelli's funds a lousy "D" when it comes to stewardship, citing Gabelli's high pay, tight control, and high fees. Meanwhile Gamco's total assets under management have slipped, falling $2 billion in 2005, to $26.8 billion.

For now, Gamco remains highly profitable, and Gabelli himself remains defiant. "When they think back 100 years from now, Ted Williams will still be a great ballplayer," he says, adding he has 20 more years to prove "we are a great investor."

But all the turmoil can't be helping the Gabelli legacy. He's worked tirelessly for years to promote and control his image as an elite value investor, philanthropist, and crusader for shareholder rights. The danger is that his legal problems may create the impression of someone quite different: that of a tawdry wheeler-dealer who uses byzantine corporate structures to obfuscate his own greed.

THE SCANDALS

Gabelli is in top form over lunch at Asiate, a tony restaurant on the 35th floor of the Time Warner Center in Manhattan with sweeping views of Central Park. He couldn't be more charming: Would his guest like the seat with the good view? How old are her children? Where do they go to school? He's immensely likable. "Mario has the ability to be charming or he wouldn't have gotten where is," says Rick Walton, who once ran Gabelli's investment-management business. "He pulls that face out when he has to."

The other face of Mario--the battler who hates to give an inch, ever--was described in the 2003 lawsuit filed by his original investors, Frederick Mancheski and David Perlmutter, which became public last fall. The two claimed that their original investment of $75,000 in Gabelli's business back in 1977 should have been worth well over $100 million. But Gabelli didn't issue shares to his backers when he spun off his fund company Gamco (known until January as Gabelli Asset Management Co.) in 1999. And Mancheski and Perlmutter charge that Gabelli would only allow them to sell their shares in his holding company, GGCP Inc., to him--at his own low-ball price. The two investors, both of whom declined to comment to FORTUNE, accused him of "looting the assets" of GGCP by paying himself 20% of the company's pretax profits on top of what they described as exorbitant fees for running Gamco--the main business of GGCP. Gabelli denies receiving or taking any improper compensation.

While the accusations by Mancheski and Perlmutter suggest a lack of generosity on Gabelli's part, the details of the FCC auction dispute are even more problematic. Gabelli and one of his firms, Lynch Interactive, were accused of misleading the FCC to score wireless, or cellphone, licenses reserved for minorities and small-business people without expertise or high-powered financial backing. Gabelli allegedly put friends and family members in charge of more than a dozen shell companies that Lynch backed in order to win licenses at a 25% government discount. His plan was allegedly to flip the licenses and make a killing, which he and his affiliates did: $206 million, according to court documents. Though Gabelli and his lawyers filed documents with the FCC showing Lynch was 49.9% owner of the special entities supposedly run by his friends, he is accused of controlling the companies. He allegedly set up elaborate payout schemes with the alleged shells. When one communications entity was sold for $99 million, Lynch collected $73 million. Gabelli denies he was in "de facto" control of the companies. His attorney Lanny Breuer, a White House counsel in the Clinton administration, has said that Gabelli complied "in every way with FCC auction rules during every step of the process."

Among Gabelli's friends and acquaintances who bid in the auctions were Trent Tucker, an African-American former pro basketball player and a Gabelli client; Nara Cadorin, an 82-year-old former Gabelli secretary; and Jennifer Caiati, who worked in her family's furniture business and, when giving a deposition in the case, said she didn't know what "FCC" stood for. (None could be reached for comment.)

A particularly unlikely candidate for the auction was Victoria "Tory" Kane. Tory and her husband, Theodore Gibbs "Gibb" Kane, have long been good friends of Gabelli's. Gibb is a founding partner of Sound Shore Management, a money manager in Greenwich, Conn., with about $7 billion in assets. A seasoned yachtsman who owns a Baltic 43 sailboat called Mutiny that resides at the prestigious American Yacht Club in Rye, N.Y., Gibb was listed as an officer in several of the alleged shells. Gabelli says that in the early '90s, Tory, a former aerobic-dance instructor, told him she wanted to get into the wireless business. "I thought, 'She's perfect,' " says Gabelli now. " 'I don't need someone who knows about wireless. She'd be a very good marketer.' " (In 2003 Cingular purchased three of the licenses awarded to Tory Kane.)

Gabelli is no doubt regretting his decision to partner with his country club friend. Sources say that in March his lawyers were close to negotiating a settlement well under $100 million. But the Kanes, who long ago hired their own lawyer, tried to extricate themselves from the case, which derailed the deal, according to sources close to the litigation. (The Kanes did not return phone calls.) The Kanes and other defendants are now bickering about how much they as opposed to Gabelli should pay in legal fees. The settlement includes all the defendants.

THE BOY FROM THE BRONX

Central to the legend of Super Mario is that he's a self-made man who grew up in the hardscrabble Bronx, a fact that he never tires of pointing out. "One of the things Mario constantly brags about is his street smarts," says former employee Walton. Gabelli's parents were Italian immigrants who settled in New York. His father worked as a cook at Luchow's, a celebrated Manhattan restaurant, and his mother was a homemaker. In high school Gabelli hitched rides to Westchester County, where he worked as a golf caddy at top country clubs like Winged Foot and Sunningdale--and met successful men who talked about investing in stocks. In college at Fordham University, where he graduated summa cum laude, the then-redheaded Gabelli stood out as a brash entrepreneur who always seemed to have a new get-rich-quick scheme, like hawking flashlights out of his car's trunk during a brownout.

Gabelli got hooked on value investing at Columbia University's Graduate School of Business in the mid-1960s, where he studied under a disciple of Benjamin Graham and David Dodd, authors of the seminal book Security Analysis. Among his carpool buddies from the Bronx were fellow students Leon Cooperman, who today runs hedge fund Omega Advisors, and Art Samberg, now president of Pequot Capital Management. Gabelli's first job was covering autos and farm equipment with the now defunct brokerage firm Loeb Rhodes, taking over from Michael Steinhardt, who would become a successful hedge-fund manager. "I replaced Steinhardt's thin research files with my thick ones," Gabelli jokes with typical bravado.

He opened his own money-management firm in 1977, and nine years later, at the encouragement of one of his avowed idols, Fidelity's Peter Lynch (who, like Gabelli, got hooked on the markets while caddying), introduced his first mutual fund. His timing was spot on. Not only did Gabelli ride the bull market, he caught the financial-media wave just as it was taking off. He realized early that his charismatic, quirky personality made for good TV and set out to aggressively boost his image, thereby promoting his funds. Mario knows name recognition: After Bill Gates, through his private investment firm, Cascade, bought a $100 million convertible note from Gabelli's company in 2001, Gabelli made him a fixture in his slide-show talks to investors.

Gabelli earned much of his reputation as a stock picker during the merger mania of the '80s, showing a keen aptitude for identifying takeover candidates, particularly media companies. (Gushing about his 55 appearances as a Squawk Box co-host on CNBC, he says, "They call me Dr. Love, because I'm the guy who just loves it when companies court one another.") He scored big with companies like LIN Broadcasting, which was sold to McCaw Cellular Communications in 1990, and Chris Craft, the boat company that bought up television stations and was purchased by News Corp. in 2001. He labeled his method PMV, which stands for Private Market Value. The idea built on Graham and Dodd's basic principle of finding stocks trading below their intrinsic value, and borrowed a concept from Warren Buffett: adding a premium for valuing them as a whole. To sum up his contribution, he concocted a slogan: "Graham & Dodd + Buffett = Gabelli." He also claims to have coined the term "catalyst" relating to value investing and even trademarked the slogan "PMV with a Catalyst."

Gabelli's penchant for associating himself with value-investing heroes continues to this day. For the past two years he has had Gamco sponsor an award named after his favorite Columbia Business School professors--the Graham & Dodd, Murray, Greenwald Prize for Value Investing--though everyone knows it, naturally, as the Gabelli Prize. In May, Gabelli messengered to FORTUNE's offices some documents, including a photocopied page from Berkshire Hathaway's annual report. It listed the return of Warren Buffett's Geico Equities vs. the S&P 500 from 1980 through 2004. In a separate column, returns for a selection of Gamco accounts were clumsily scribbled in for each year, showing an average annual gain over the period of 19.8%, vs. 20.3% for Geico. Was this meant to imply that he was on the same level as the master? "Warren is unique, a Six Sigma event," says Gabelli. "He is one of the greatest value investors. We don't compare ourselves to him." But then he does it anyway: "What we are in the public markets, he is in the private market."

THE TANGLED WEB

Gabelli's management firm is based in Rye, N.Y., but he lives across the state line in Greenwich, one of the wealthiest zip codes in the country. In Greenwich the old-money families often reside in stately houses with impeccably landscaped lawns near Long Island Sound. Those who made their fortunes more recently, typically hedge fund types, often live in the leafy, rolling backcountry hills in huge hidden estates. Gabelli has made his home in both areas, but today he lives Sound-side with his second wife, Regina Pitaro, 51, who has worked at Gamco for 22 years and now runs the institutional client business. (Gabelli and his first wife, Elaine, the mother of his four children, divorced over a decade ago.) He also has a house in Moose, Wyo., where he likes to go fly-fishing. Several years ago he bought a 500-year-old farm near Reggio Emilia in Italy that previously had been in his family for generations.

On a Monday in early May, the Greenwich public library played host to Gamco's annual meeting. At 8:25 A.M., as startled attendees continued to trickle in, checking their watches, Gabelli abruptly started the meeting some five minutes early. Dressed as usual in a gray tailored suit with a crisp, white, no-nonsense shirt and conservative tie, he moved through the agenda at a rapid pace. Despite the bad news hanging in the air that day--aside from the two lawsuits, a proxy advisory firm had recommended just days earlier that the board vote down Gabelli's reelection because of his pay--Gabelli didn't utter a word about these troubles. He narrated a playful slide-show presentation for the crowd of 40 or so. And he spent several minutes trumpeting what he called an "independent academic study by the University of Miami" that described Gabelli Value Separate Accounts (GVSAs) as a better performer than any domestic equity mutual fund on a risk-adjusted basis from January 1978 to June 2005. Then suddenly the whole event was over after just 45 minutes.

In some ways it was a vintage Gabelli performance: glib, smooth, in control. But there was also a sense of tension--a rush, it seemed, to get off the stage before any tough questions were asked. And yet the masterful Mario still found a way to put his foot in his mouth. That "independent academic study," it turns out, was actually paid for by Gamco and published by a firm called Biscayne Consulting. In a letter to Gamco, Biscayne states that the report was done "in cooperation" with University of Miami faculty members; Gabelli happens to be a contributor to the University of Miami's business school, endowing a scholarship program in his name. As for the performance comparison itself, GVSA is not a mutual fund--rather it is an unaudited composite of 46 Gamco accounts, which make up about 13% of the company's asset pool. According to filings, Gamco has another $8.8 billion of separate accounts; no performance data is given for them.

Gabelli's full business is a complex labyrinth of entities. The money management arm, including mutual funds, resides at Gamco. But Gamco is 80% controlled by a private company called GGCP, where Gabelli is chairman, CEO, and chief investment officer of value portfolios. He also controls an independent broker-dealer, Gabelli & Company. And he is chairman of Lynch Interactive, the multimedia company at the heart of the FCC case. (See "Connecting the Dots," page 122.)

And somehow, despite all these responsibilities, Gabelli remains his firms' key stock picker, running all the Gabelli value funds and the Gamco separate accounts. As Morningstar analyst Kerry O'Boyle wonders, "How can Mario be in so many places at the same time?" Gabelli says it's simple: "We are long-term investors. I couldn't do all this if we were commodities traders or hedge fund operators, in and out of the market every day." He says his funds typically hold a position for five to seven years.

"At Gamco, it was always about Mario--and Mario was always 100% right," says a former portfolio manager there. Gabelli brags he likes to hire Ph.D.s--in his words, "poor, hungry, and driven." Many who have worked for Gabelli say the discipline they were taught lasts through their careers. Yet many of his most talented portfolio managers exit because "they never really get to manage money," says an analyst who recently departed the firm. Tales of his temper also abound. One infamous story has Gabelli going ballistic when an office worker dropped a cup of coffee on the floor and Gabelli made him clean it up. Mario's response? "It's true! It was the second day in a row this guy had done it, and he'd refused to clean it up!"

MARIO AND HIS MONEY

In the spring of 1999, Gabelli published an article on shareholders' rights in Hermes, the Columbia Business School magazine. "We take what we describe as a Gandhian approach to corporate governance," he wrote in the piece, which is available on his company's website. "This is a form of forceful yet passive resistance that includes such methods as getting the press involved." He then invoked his "Magna Carta of Shareholder Rights," which states that his mutual fund company is in favor of "one share, one vote" and will vote against "supermajority voting." The article appeared just weeks after his own company had gone public--with supermajority voting shares that gave him dominant control. "We knew the structure wasn't optimal," he says today, "but we took the asset management subsidiary public because everyone wanted a pure play." This structure came back to haunt him, of course, in the first of his $100 million settlements this year: It was Gabelli's stranglehold over his companies' shares that prompted his original backers, Frederick Mancheski and David Perlmutter, to sue.

But there are other troubling aspects of Gamco's initial IPO. Goldman Sachs, his longtime advisor, pulled out as the underwriter. The reason, according to sources familiar with the negotiations at the time: Gabelli refused to relinquish what Goldman considered excessive pay. Merrill Lynch and Salomon Smith Barney stepped up to the plate, but not before Gabelli agreed to shrink his personal take-home to 10% of Gamco's pretax profits (from 20%) in exchange for a deferred lump sum of $59 million, including interest.

Gabelli doesn't back down on the issue of his compensation. When it's suggested to him that he may be the highest paid mutual fund manager alive, he responds, "That is just preposterous." He's not disavowing the publicly available $55 million figure for 2005. Instead he argues that Bill Miller of Legg Mason and Bill Gross of Pimco likely make comparable amounts; their companies just don't disclose it. "I voluntarily make my pay public," he says. He also complains that he is "unfairly" compared to Wall Street CEOs like Merrill Lynch's Stanley O'Neal, who made $32 million last year. "I take all the risk," he says. "When I started my company back in 1977, I had a very simple pay formula--I would get 20% of the pretax profits every year. No pension. No options. That's it."

But that explanation leaves out a significant piece of his comp puzzle: His company's original offering in 1976 stated he was entitled to portfolio management and account executive fees--which can total millions. Other undisclosed pay comes from his other entities. That means that the $55 million figure isn't all of what he gets.

Gabelli says he's not entirely motivated by money. "I think when I was starting out that was a big driver," he says. "But when you get to be like me, that changes." What really fuels him now, he says, is the ability to give that money away. His buddy Cooperman says that Gabelli "is the most generous person you'll ever know. He gives millions to charity." The charities he gives to are diverse, but his passion, Gabelli says, is education. Of course, a lot of the giving comes with the Gabelli name attached. There's the Gabelli School of Business at Roger Williams University in Rhode Island and a Gabelli Hall at Boston College.

The day after we first talked about his compensation, Gabelli sent FORTUNE a yellow sheet of paper with retyped figures from Institutional Investor's Alpha, ranking the top 25 "Highest Paid Hedge Fund Managers" in 2003. There's George Soros and his $750 million at the top of the list. Toward the bottom is Cerberus Capital's Stephen Feinberg, who made $75 million that year. And then "Mario J. Gabelli, Gabelli Asset Management, $41 million" added neatly at the bottom. A few days later he brings up the new hot-off-the-press list from Alpha: "Jim Simons [who runs Renaissance Capital] made $1.5 billion last year and runs less money than I," he says. "Plus, his returns were lower!" (While it's true that Simons runs a mere $5 billion, he's hardly a laggard. From 1990 to 2004, his flagship Medallion fund returned 33% annually net of fees, far more than either Gamco's stock or any of Gabelli's mutual funds.)

Two days after the FCC settlement is announced, Gabelli is on the phone again. It's another friendly chat that proceeds without incident until the very end, when the subject of his 38-year-old son Marc comes up. Marc has been instrumental in the family business for years, running the famously named "Gabelli Global Interactive Couch Potato Fund" back in the late '90s. He could end up running Gamco one day. But Gabelli doesn't see questions about his offspring as relevant, and suddenly, without warning, he blows his stack. "That question is out of bounds! It has nothing to do with [Gamco]!" he barks. "I know where you're going with this … you're going to ask about my other children too." He was wrong about that. But perhaps the stress of this year's difficulties was finally getting to him.

Clearly, Gabelli wants to be remembered as much more than just a guy who made a ton of money running mutual funds. He wants to join the pantheon of great investors he's sought to emulate all his life. The problem is Gabelli keeps getting in his own way. Maybe that's just Mario being Mario.

END

Truth About Trade & Technology

June 13, 2006

FDA sued for lax regulation of GM foods

A lawsuit filed against the US government aims to establish strict safety laws for all genetically engineered foods, and require these to be labeled once they are approved.

The suit against the US Food and Drug Administration (FDA) was filed by consumer and environmental advocacy group Center for Food Safety (CFS), which claims the move comes after an “unreasonable delay” by the FDA in responding to a petition filed in 2000.

The CFS now calls for rigorous testing on genetically engineered (GE) foods before they are marketed in order to ensure that these do not carry certain risks as a result of their different breeding techniques. These risks could include triggering unexpected food allergies, creating toxins in food, or hastening the spread of antibiotic-resistant disease.

In March 2000, the CFS joined forces with over 50 consumer and environmental groups, including the Union of Concerned Scientists, Physicians for Social Responsibility and the Natural Resources Defense Council, to outline a “comprehensive approach” that the FDA should take to assess the health and safety issues from new GE foods.

But the FDA did not respond to the petition, said the CFS.

“Currently, there are no binding FDA regulations to protect the public from the risks of the genetically engineered foods that are found in thousands of products on supermarket shelves,” it said

“FDA first adopted a hands-off policy on GE foods in 1992, and despite mounting evidence of health and environmental threats from GE crops, has never significantly changed its deregulatory stance.”

In its Federal Register of May 1992, the FDA recommended that developers consult with the FDA about bioengineered foods under development. In June 1996, the agency provided additional guidance to industry on procedures for these consultations. These require that a developer who intends to commercialize a bioengineered food meets with the agency to identify and discuss relevant safety, nutritional, or other regulatory issues regarding the bioengineered food and then submits a summary of its scientific and regulatory assessment of the food. The FDA then evaluates the submission.

But the CFS says the FDA’s policy “assumes that gene altered foods are safe based solely on scant information that biotechnology companies voluntarily submit in consultations with FDA. Since these consultations are voluntary, industry determines what information they submit and in what form.”

"For too long, the FDA has let biotech companies set the table for deregulation of GE food," said Joseph Mendelson, legal director for the CFS.

According to the advocacy group, strict pre-market testing is required in order to address any unexpected changes in food that the genetic engineering process can create. An example occurred last year, when Australian scientists found that genes from a bean engineered into pea plants created a potentially dangerous allergen in the GE peas.

CFS said the tests that exposed this potential hazard have not been conducted on any of the GE foods currently marketed in the US, even though these GE foods contain genes from non-food organisms that have never been in the human diet and have never been adequately assessed for allergencity.

Indeed, pre-market approval regulations and labeling systems for genetically modified (GM) foods are much more stringent in a number of other countries, including China, Japan, Russia and Brazil.

And in Europe, general opposition to GM crops led to a World Trade Organisation (WTO) ruling in February this year that the EU and six member states had broken free trade rules by imposing a moratorium on GM imports between June 1999 and August 2003.

The decision, in theory, opened up the EU market to GM food.

The issue, however, remains contentious and strong public opinion against GM food in Europe has forced major food companies and retailers to issue non-GM guarantees to customers in recent years.

According to the CFS’ lawsuit, filed in district court in Washington DC, the US has a lot to learn from policies adopted in other countries.

"While the rest of the world is rejecting these risky, untested foods, FDA's unscientific approach is making American consumers the world's guinea pigs in this genetic food experiment," said Mendelson.

"Americans deserve the right to know what's in their food. FDA must stop playing politics and start developing a science-based policy to protect Americans from these risky foods."

The FDA was unavailable for immediate comment.

END

Modern Healthcare

June 12, 2006

Atlanta system to pay $3 million in False Claims suit

by Mark Taylor

Piedmont Healthcare, Atlanta, agreed to pay $3 million to settle civil False Claims Act allegations that some of its physicians billed Medicare for interpreting vascular exams that actually were read by vascular technologists. Piedmont also signed a certificate of compliance agreement with HHS' inspector general's office. The three-hospital system reached the settlement with the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta after two years of negotiations. The violations allegedly occurred from 1999 until 2004. The suit, in U.S. District Court, Atlanta, also accused Piedmont of paying physicians to interpret the exams in an alleged violation of physician self-referral law. After reporting the alleged behavior to supervisors, the whistleblower, a former vascular technologist, used a hidden camera in her purse to videotape a physician who signed off on technologists' reports without independently interpreting them, according to her attorney, Marc Raspanti, of Miller Alfano & Raspanti, Philadelphia. Piedmont General Counsel Jay Mitchell said the system settled without admitting liability or wrongdoing. Mitchell also said Piedmont was unaware of any poor patient outcomes or medical malpractice claims because of the alleged behavior.

END

Boston Globe

June 13, 2006

Ex-FBI agent tells of '81 probe

By Shelley Murphy

A retired FBI official who has been critical of the agency's handling of gangsters James ``Whitey" Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi testified yesterday that the FBI coined a phrase for agents who got too cozy with their informants: ``Going native."

Robert Fitzpatrick , who taught a course for FBI agents on the psychology of informants, said ``going native" is when an agent becomes friends with an informant, loses objectivity, and ``might be sharing information they shouldn't."

In fact, Fitzpatrick said, when he arrived as second-in-command of the FBI's Boston office in 1981, there was a high-level, internal investigation underway into whether Bulger's FBI handlers had leaked him information that compromised a State Police investigation of Bulger and other underworld leaders. Fitzpatrick wasn't asked whether there were concerns in the FBI in the 1980s that Bulger's handlers were ``going native."

Fitzpatrick was called to testify yesterday in US District Court in Boston in a $50 million wrongful death suit that the family of Quincy fisherman John McIntyre has filed against the government. He's expected to resume testifying today. McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, assert the government was negligent because of the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Flemmi.

Last week, Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, because their handler, former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them. McIntyre had been involved in an unsuccessful plot by Bulger and his associates to ship seven tons of weapons to the outlawed Irish Republican Army and began cooperating with the US Customs Service and the FBI about six weeks before his slaying.

Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence for his 2002 racketeering conviction. He was found guilty of warning Bulger to flee just before the gangster's 1995 indictment on racketeering and extortion charges. Bulger remains a fugitive.

Fitzpatrick, who served as special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, said the FBI's priority at the time was targeting members of La Cosa Nostra, commonly known as the Mafia. Cultivating organized crime informants was critical to that mission, he said.

Fitzpatrick testified that he was advised in 1981 by the top agent in the FBI's Boston office ``that he was handling an internal investigation that was sensitive, confidential, and handled at the highest level," involving a dispute between the State Police and the FBI over Bulger.

The State Police had been bugging a garage on Lancaster Street, near the old Boston Garden, where Bulger did business with drug dealers, bookmakers, and local Mafia leaders. But, when Bulger abruptly stopped talking inside the building, the State Police, who suspected Bulger was an FBI informant, accused the FBI of tipping off the gangster.

``The accusation was that Bulger was getting and giving information against their investigation," Fitzpatrick said.

In his testimony last week, Flemmi said the tip had actually come from retired Massachusetts State Police lieutenant Richard Schneiderhan , who was convicted in 2003 of obstruction of justice. Schneiderhan was found guilty of warning a Bulger associate in 1999 that the FBI was monitoring the telephones of Bulger's brothers, William and John, in a bid to capture the fugitive gangster.

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for killing McIntyre and nine other people. He began cooperating with the government three years ago.

Though Bulger has been touted as a valuable informant, Fitzpatrick said, Bulger ``wasn't giving us information he could have been giving us."

McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)

From:	McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)
Sent:	Tuesday, June 13, 2006 12:08 PM
To:	Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Bahr, Dorothy (CIV); Baxter, Felix (CIV); Bordeaux, JoAnn (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fishback, David (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Fowler, Liane (SMO); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Goldberg, Arthur (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gray, Towanda (CIV); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hudson, Lewis (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennings, Geraldine (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keener, Donald (CIV); Kent, Alexander (CIV); Kohl, Christine (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Liner, Linda (CIV); Lloyd, Shirley (CIV); Lucas, Regina E. (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Shannen Coffin; Shaw, Aloma A; Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Williams, Angela (CIV); Williams, Toni (CIV); Willis, Kerry (CIV); Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject:	6/13 CIV Weekly Report to the AG
Attachments:	CivDivWkly0613.wpd

U.S. Department of Justice

Civil Division

Assistant Attorney General Washington, D.C. 20530

June 13, 2006

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Civil Division Weekly Report to the Attorney General

A. NEXT WEEK

- No items to report.

B. THIS WEEK

- District Court Rejects First Amendment Challenge to National Motto on Currency
Newdow v. Congress of the United States of America (Eastern District of California). On June 12, the district court dismissed this lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the national motto, "In God We Trust," and its inscription on United States coins and currency, under the Establishment Clause, the Free Exercise Clause, and various other theories. Plaintiff is known for having previously challenged the constitutionality of the Pledge of Allegiance in Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 124 S. Ct. 2301 (2004), which the Supreme Court dismissed for lack of prudential standing. In this case, plaintiff seeks various forms of declaratory and injunctive relief, including a declaration that Congress, in enacting the statutes establishing the national motto and providing for its inscription on coins and currency, violated the First Amendment, and an injunction barring the government from continuing to mint coins and print currency bearing the motto. Our motion sought dismissal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and because the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. In particular, we argued, plaintiff's lacked standing and that his claims are directly barred by binding Ninth Circuit precedent upholding the constitutionality of the national motto, as well as by repeated statements by the Supreme Court to the same effect. The Court, while rejecting several aspects of plaintiff's standing theories, ultimately found that plaintiff had citizen standing to pursue his claims for declaratory relief. However, the Court accepted our arguments that on the merits plaintiff's claims were barred by the Ninth Circuit's prior decision upholding the national motto in Aronow v. United States and failed for other reasons as well. The Court also held that the Legislative Branch defendants were immune from plaintiff's claims. As a result of the Court's decision, an oral argument that had been set for June 16 has been cancelled.

C. LAST WEEK

- First Circuit Affirms Board's Determination that Remand of Alien's Case to Immigration Court Did not "Retroactively Nullify" Her Previous Violation of Voluntary Departure Order
  DaCosta v. Gonzales [1st Cir.]. On May 24, the First Circuit upheld the Board's order sustaining Department of Homeland Security's (DHS's) appeal. After dismissing the alien's original appeal, the Board granted her motion to reopen to apply for adjustment of status based on her post-order marriage to a United States citizen, and remanded the case to immigration court. Upon remand, the Immigration Judge granted adjustment of status, reasoning that the remand extinguished the legal consequences of the alien's failure to voluntarily depart, and the Board reversed. The Court held that once a voluntary departure period has expired, the mandatory penalties apply, regardless of whether the case has been reopened and remanded, and that the DHS did not waive the right to challenge the adjustment grant by not opposing the alien's motion to reopen before the Board.

- Second Circuit Rules It Lacks Jurisdiction to Review the Board's Decision to Affirm Without Opinion Rather Than Referring to a Three Member Panel
  Kambolli v. Gonzales [2d Cir.]. On May 26, the Second Circuit affirmed the denial of the alien's asylum and withholding claims. The Court determined that the alien did not suffer past persecution, and did not have a well-founded fear of future persecution, given his single run-in with authorities and his successful ability to relocate in Albania. The Court also held it lacked jurisdiction to review a single Board member's decision to dispose of a case unilaterally and without opinion, rather than refer it to a three-member Board panel.

- Trial Victory in Toxic Tort Case
  Insurance Company of Beaver Crossing v. United States, et al. [District of Nebraska] (Judge Lyle Strom). On June 1, the court dismissed plaintiff's Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) suit alleging damages resulting from activities of the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC), an agency within the Department of Agriculture. Plaintiff claimed that the use of carbon tetrachloride for insect and rodent control at a CCC grain storage facility near Milford, Nebraska, from 1950 to 1974, contaminated the soil and ground water underneath plaintiff's farmland. The United States did not contest the existence of contamination or that one source of the contamination was the grain storage facility. After a four-day trial, the court concluded that there was no evidence that the facility was operated in a negligent manner, given the level of relevant scientific and industrial knowledge during the period in question. The court also concluded that the use of carbon tetrachloride for insect and rodent control at CCC grain storage facilities is protected by the discretionary function exception to the FTCA. This case is significant because until 1975, carbon tetrachloride was used for insect and rodent control nationwide at many of the 4,500 CCC grain storage facilities.

- Patent Infringement Action Involving Remote-Controlled Weapon Systems Settled at No Expense to the Government
  Kollmorgen Corporation v. United States, No. 04-1661 (Damich, C.J.) [Fed. Cl.]. On June 1, the Court of Federal Claims dismissed all of plaintiff's claims arising from the government's alleged infringement of a Kollmorgen patent, relating to remote-controlled weapon systems, pursuant to a stipulation by all parties. In the case, Kollmorgen had alleged infringement under 28 U.S.C. § 1498(a) based on a $21.2 million procurement by the Naval Surface Warfare Center (Crane Division) for "Mini-Typhoon" weapon systems supplied by GR Dynamics, LLC (GRD). A settlement agreement between Kollmorgen, GRD, and GRD-affiliated companies resolved all issues in the case. The government contributed no money towards settlement.

- Federal Circuit Holds that Local Rent Control Laws Limit the Compensation that Landlords may Recover for a Regulatory Taking of their Mortgage Prepayment Rights
  Independence Park Apartments v. United States [Federal Circuit]. On June 6, the Federal Circuit (Michel, Newman, Bryson) reversed the damages award entered by the Court of Federal Claims in this takings case, which involves four model plaintiffs in the long-running Cienega Gardens litigation. The Federal Circuit had previously held that the plaintiffs, who are owners of low-income housing projects in Los Angeles, suffered a regulatory taking when Congress abrogated their right to prepay their federally subsidized mortgages and exit the low-income housing program. In this appeal from the subsequent damages trial, the Federal Circuit accepted our argument that the Los Angeles city rent control ordinance would have limited plaintiffs' rental income in a hypothetical world absent the taking, and thus ought to limit the damages to which plaintiffs are entitled, rejecting plaintiffs' argument that the rent control ordinance would have been preempted by federal law. At the same time, the court accepted aspects of plaintiffs' cross-appeal concerning the length of the takings period. On balance, this decision should reduce the government's overall liability in this and other pending regulatory takings cases.

- Court Dismisses "Right to Travel" Challenge to Airline Passenger Watch List
  McDonald v. Department of Homeland Security [District of Nevada]. On June 6, Judge Kent Dawson granted the government's motion to dismiss an action by a frequent airline passenger claiming that he often suffers humiliation and inconvenience associated with receiving a more intensive security screening before boarding commercial flights than other passengers. The plaintiff sought relief on the theory that his right to travel has been violated. Judge Dawson rejected this claim, concluding that plaintiff has no standing, because he does not face any injury that is concrete, traceable to the actions of the government, and redressible by relief that the court could award. He also held that on its merits plaintiff's claim fails, because, at most, plaintiff's ability to travel by one particular mode of transportation has been impaired, which is not enough to support a "right to travel" claim. The court also rejected a Privacy Act claim, noting that even though the government's response to plaintiff's request for records was late, the government ultimately responded to the request, meaning that the plaintiff has no right to relief.

- First Circuit Holds that Discrimination Claim Was Properly Dismissed Because Plaintiff Had Previously Elected to Pursue a Remedy Before the Merit Systems Protection Board
  Stoll v. Principi [First Circuit]. On June 7, the First Circuit (Selya, Lipez, and Howard) affirmed a district court decision dismissing discrimination claims. The Court held that a federal employee who believes that she has been dismissed for discriminatory reasons may either appeal to the Merit Systems Protection Board or lodge an Equal Employment Opportunity complaint with her agency; however, once she elects to pursue a case before the Merit Systems Protection Board she must follow that route to the exclusion of any other remedy that originally might have been available.

- Eleventh Circuit Upholds the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' Revocation of Explosives Manufacturing Licenses
  Luna Tech, Incorporated v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives [Eleventh Circuit]. On June 7, the Eleventh Circuit (Marcus, Wilson, Pryor) in an unpublished per curiam decision, denied a petition for review of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' revocation and non-renewal of plaintiff's license to manufacture explosives, after a fire and explosion at plaintiff's facilities. The Court agreed with the government that substantial evidence supported the finding that plaintiff willfully violated federal explosive regulations, that the government was not obligated to give the plaintiff an opportunity to demonstrate compliance before taking action, and that plaintiff's statute of limitations argument was meritless.

- Parties Settle Establishment Clause Challenge to Lease of Historic Site to Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints
  Western Land Exchange Project v. Norton [District of Wyoming]. On June 7, the parties in this case filed a joint stipulation to dismiss plaintiffs' Establishment Clause claims challenging legislation that required the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) to lease a section of public land, known as Martin's Cove, to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints for a period of 25 years. Pursuant to an agreement reached between the parties, plaintiffs agreed to dismiss their lawsuit without prejudice in exchange for very modest actions to be taken by BLM and the Church regarding: (1) the management of the Cove, and (2) signs posted there offering an historical "interpretation" of events taking place at Martin's Cove during the westward migration of Church members in the nineteenth century. These actions include the removal from Martins' Cove of arguably sectarian "interpretive panels" that told of the history of the area; the addition of other panels to provide a secular interpretation of the history of Martin's Cove; and the addition of signs to more clearly inform members of the general public of when they are on privately owned Church property abutting Martin's Cove where they might see private religious displays.

- AT&T Settles General Services Administration Fraud Case for $2.945 million
  United States ex rel. JA Russo Associates, Inc. v. AT&T Corporation, Civil Action No. 04-1142-DOC [C.D. Cal.](Rea, J.)(under seal). On June 7, AT&T Communications-East, Inc. agreed to pay $2,946,000 in compromise of False Claims Act allegations. The complaint alleged that AT&T defrauded the General Services Administration by inflating the Presubscribed Interexchange Carrier Charges that AT&T passed through to the government under the FTS 2000 Bridge contract.

- Suit by Serviceman Dismissed
Sean Baker v. United States of America, et al., No. 5:05-221-JMH [Eastern District of Kentucky] (C.J. Hood). On June 8, the district court dismissed a suit seeking damages arising from injuries plaintiff received during a volunteer training exercise in which he played the role of an uncooperative detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where plaintiff was on active military duty. Plaintiff also sought reinstatement and back pay allegedly owed to him by the Department of the Army. The court granted the United States' motion to dismiss for the following reasons: first, plaintiff's action is barred by the Feres doctrine because it is premised on injuries he incurred incident to his military service; second, the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for constitutional torts against the United States, its agencies, or its officials acting in their official capacity, thereby precluding suit; and third, plaintiff's claim for reinstatement and back pay is precluded because review of military decisions is not justiciable. Plaintiff also made claims under the Privacy Act which were likewise dismissed.

- Ninth Circuit Rejects Challenge to United States Department of Agriculture Rule Allowing Imports of Spanish Clementines
Cactus Corner v. United States Department of Agriculture [Ninth Circuit]. On June 8, the Ninth Circuit (Rymer, Fletcher, W., and Clifton) sustained a Department of Agriculture rule allowing imports of Spanish Clementines under specified conditions that are aimed at preventing the introduction of medflies in to the United States. The court held that the agency was under no statutory duty to quantify a permissible level of risk that medflies would be introduced. And the court determined that the agency's analysis of the particular measures taken in this case to prevent medfly introduction was reasonable and entitled to deference.

- D.C. Circuit Rejects Challenges to Federal Communications Commission's Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act Electronic Surveillance Order
American Council on Education v. Federal Communications Commission [District of Columbia Circuit]. On June 9, the District of Columbia Circuit (Sentelle & Brown; Edwards dissenting) rejected challenges to a Federal Communications Commission (FCC) order that requires broadband Internet access providers and Internet telephony providers to assist the performance of authorized electronic surveillance. The Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act requires telecommunications carriers to ensure that their equipment and services are capable of carrying out authorized electronic surveillance. The law permits the FCC to extend the Act's coverage to some types of firms that do not come within the statute's core definition of "telecommunications carrier," but excludes firms insofar as they are providing "information services." Various petitioners challenged the FCC order, principally on the theory that broadband Internet access and Internet telephony constitute information services and therefore are categorically outside the scope of the Act. The District of Columbia Circuit has now rejected those challenges and sustained the order.

- D.C. Circuit Grants Government's Mandamus Petition Regarding Disqualification of Court-Appointed Special Master in Cobell Indian Trust Fund Case

In Re: Dirk Kempthorne, Secretary of the Interior [District of Columbia Circuit]. On June 9, a unanimous panel of the District of Columbia Circuit (Judges Ginsburg, Randolph & Henderson) granted the government's mandamus petition regarding the disqualification of Special Master Alan Balaran in this ongoing Indian trust fund litigation. The government had argued that the Special Master engaged in conduct requiring his disqualification when he secretly hired a complaining witness to help analyze and evaluate the evidence of the witness' own allegations of government wrongdoing, and that the Special Master's resignation on the eve of the District of Columbia Circuit's scheduled oral argument did not render moot the disqualification issue. The panel has now agreed, holding that the Master's conduct was indefensible and required his disqualification, and that, as a result, three disputed reports issued by the Master after the conduct in question would be suppressed and stricken from the record of the case.

- D.C. Circuit Holds that Suit Against the United States and Dr. Henry Kissinger, Regarding Support for the Pinochet Regime, Raises Nonjusticiable Political Questions
  Gonzalez-Vera v. Kissinger [District of Columbia Circuit]. On June 9, the District of Columbia Circuit (Ginsburg, Rogers and Brown, JJ.) affirmed dismissal of claims asserted against the United States and former Secretary of State and National Security Advisor, Dr. Henry A. Kissinger, seeking damages for actions allegedly taken in support of the Pinochet regime in Chile 30 years ago. The district court held the plaintiffs'claims justiciable, but dismissed the suit on the grounds that the United States had not waived its sovereign immunity and plaintiffs had failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted against Dr. Kissinger. The District of Columbia Circuit has now affirmed the judgment of dismissal, but did so on the ground that the plaintiffs' claims, even those asserted under the Torture Victim Protection Act, present nonjusticiable political questions "inextricably intertwined with the underlying" foreign policy decisions constitutionally committed to the political branches.

- Ninth Circuit Reverses Order Denying Intervention of Organizations Seeking to Defend Federal Funding Restriction
  California v. United States [Ninth Circuit]. On June 9, the Ninth Circuit (B. Fletcher, Kozinski, Fisher) reversed a district court order denying intervention to four pro-life medical organizations that sought to intervene in this suit challenging the constitutionality of the Weldon Amendment, a law that bars federal funding to entities that discriminate on the basis that a health care provider does not provide or refer for abortion services. While intervenors sought to defend the federal law, the United States opposed intervention, arguing that the Amendment, as a funding restriction, did not create legally protectable interests and that in any event the United States adequately represents the intervenors' interest. The court of appeals disagreed, holding that the practical impact of a funding limitation was sufficient for intervention purposes and that the United States might narrowly interpret the law to preserve its constitutionality and in doing so would not adequately represent the interests of intervenors.

- State Court Dismisses Retired Police Officer's Action Under Federal Law for Right to Carry a Concealed Weapon
  Zarrelli v. Harvey [Superior Court of New Jersey]. On June 9, Judge Alexander Lehrer dismissed the plaintiff's complaint. This is the first case in state court to come to our attention that involves an issue that will likely recur as States implement, or choose not to implement, the Law Enforcement Officers Safety Act of 2004. The Act preempts state law by providing that a retired law enforcement officer may carry a concealed weapon if either the officer's former agency or State of residence certifies that the officer has passed the test required for active law enforcement officers to carry concealed weapons. The plaintiff, a retired officer, petitioned the State of New Jersey, arguing that the Act compelled the State to grant him such a certification upon request. The State moved to dismiss, arguing that construing the Act to impose such a mandate would violate the Tenth Amendment. We filed a Statement of Interest concurring with the State's position, and also noting that the Attorney General has construed the Act as discretionary with respect to law enforcement agencies within the Justice Department. In dismissing the case, Judge Lehrer determined that the Act would violate the Tenth Amendment if it were construed to commandeer States into implementing federal regulation.

- Challenge to Medicare Geographic Reclassification Regulations Dismissed
  Indian Path Medical Center v. Leavitt [D.D.C.]. On June 9, Judge Henry H. Kennedy, Jr., granted the government's motion to dismiss. As part of the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, Congress directed the Secretary to establish a "one-time" procedure for hospitals to request geographic reclassification, which determines the wage index that is used to calculate the hospitals' Medicare payments. The Act established a cap on the amount of funds that could be committed through the use of this procedure. The Secretary promulgated a regulation describing eight categories of hospitals that were eligible for reclassification. Five hospitals submitted applications, which were denied because they did not satisfy the requirements of any of the categories. They then brought suit in the district court, claiming that the regulation was arbitrary and capricious. After the filing of the suit, all of the funds appropriated by Congress for reclassification were obligated to other successful applicants. The district court held that the plaintiffs lacked standing, and dismissed the complaint, because it was not likely that a favorable decision would redress the plaintiffs' injuries given that the only relief the court could order would be a remand to the Secretary to reconsider their applications, and because no funds remained available for the plaintiffs, even if the Secretary were inclined to revise his regulation in the manner that the plaintiffs desired.

- Motion to Enjoin Guantanamo Military Commission Proceedings Filed
  Al-Quhtani v. Bush [District of Columbia] (Judge Collyer). On June 9, a motion was filed, seeking to enjoin military commission proceedings with respect to a Guantanamo Bay detainee, Jobran Saad Al-Quhtani, pending a decision of the Supreme Court in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. Proceedings before the commission are scheduled for June 19, to consider and possibly decide certain discovery motions and a motion filed by petitioner seeking dismissal of charges or other relief associated with petitioner's periodic refusal to meet with military defense counsel. The motion to enjoin the commission proceedings was filed by counsel purporting to represent Al-Quhtani in a separate habeas action brought through a family next friend. The government's response is currently due June 19, though the court may expedite the schedule.

- Environmental Groups File Complaints in Court of International Trade Seeking Imposition of Embargoes Upon Imports of Certain Endangered Species
  Salmon Spawning and Recovery Alliance v. United States; Native Federation of the Mare Dios River and its Tributaries v. United States

On June 9, in these two cases, public interest groups are requesting that the court direct enforcement actions pursuant to the Endangered Species Act and impose embargoes upon Canadian salmon and Peruvian broadleaf mahogany. In the salmon case, which was transferred to the Court of International Trade from the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, an association of recreational fishing and hydro power interests seeks to compel an Endangered Species Act enforcement action and the imposition of an embargo upon salmon that spawned in United States rivers and were harvested in Canadian waters. The Peruvian mahogany case was initiated by an environmental group and a group that purports to represent indigenous people in Peru. In that case, plaintiffs also seek to compel an Endangered Species Act enforcement action and the imposition of an embargo upon Peruvian broadleaf mahogany lumber. Likewise, plaintiffs seek an order of the court to enjoin the importation of mahogany by certain private defendants.

Contact: August Flentje, Counsel, 514.3309

Todd, Gordon (SMO)

From: Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Sent: Tuesday, June 13, 2006 5:59 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Scolinos, Tasia; Jezierski, Crystal; Elston, Michael (ODAG)
Cc: McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Speech Tomorrow
Attachments: GDT 6-14-06 Kentucky Bar Keynote.doc

My apologies for the lateness of this circulation. I am pinch-hitting for Robert tomorrow, delivering an hour-long lunchtime keynote to the Kentucky Bar Annual Conference. My proposed remarks are attached - I will likely edit them down some this evening. They are drawn largely from AG speeches. However, please let me know if you have any concerns.

****

Gordon D. Todd, Esq.
Deputy Associate Attorney General
United States Department of Justice
202-514-9500 (w)
202-305-7716 (f)

Remarks of
Deputy Associate Attorney General Gordon D. Todd
Delivered to the Kentucky Bar Association
June 14, 2006
Covington, Kentucky

Thank you for that introduction, and for the invitation to join you here in Kentucky today. It is a pleasure to be with you this afternoon.

At the outset, let me apologize on behalf of my boss, Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum. Robert very much wanted to be with you here today. However, as you may know, the President has asked him to serve as US Ambassador to Australia. Unfortunately, the demands of the nomination process precluded Robert's appearance here today.

In Robert's stead, however, I appreciate the opportunity to discuss with you various issues that are of particular importance to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and which are priorities at the Department of Justice.

The Attorney General's priorities should not come as a surprise: first and foremost, we are engaged heavily in the global war on terror. We are also focused on reducing crime, with particular emphasis on gun crimes, cyber crime including the internet exploitation of children, and drug trafficking, especially the new scourge of methamphetamine. We are also committed to expanded enforcement of civil rights, with a focus on human trafficking and fair housing. Finally, we are working to restore and maintain confidence in the integrity of both our public and private institutions through the prosecution of private and public corruption and fraud.

Terrorism

Let me start with the War on Terror, for nothing is more important to President Bush and Attorney General Gonzales than the continued safety of the American people.

The attacks of September 11th were not the opening shots of this war. Rather, over the preceding decade, Al Quaeda operatives and their ilk attacked us repeatedly: the 1993 World Trade Center bombing; the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers barracks in Saudi Arabia; the 1998 bombings of US Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania; and the 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen.

What the September 11th attacks did occasion was the shifting of the United States from defense to offense. Through a combined military, criminal, and civil response, we have begun hunting down the terrorists and rolling up the financial networks that support them. The Department of Justice plays a leading role in this effort.

Since September 11, 2001, we have secured 253 convictions in 45 different judicial districts across the country of individuals charged in terrorism or terrorism-related criminal cases with an international connection. Many more defendants are still awaiting trial.

In the past year alone, we have obtained 40 convictions or guilty pleas in terrorism-related cases. These included Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, who was sentenced to 30 years for providing support to al Qaeda, conspiring to assassinate President Bush, and conspiring to hijack and destroy commercial airplanes in an attack similar to the attacks of September 11th. He joins in prison Zacarious Moussaoui; the "American Taliban" John Walker Lindh; and members of the Virginia Jihad Network. Also, last September, British arms dealer Hemant Lakhani was sentenced to 47 years in prison for attempting to arrange the sale of shoulder-fired missiles in New Jersey.

Some have observed that these 253 convictions included individuals indicted on money laundering, visa fraud, and other less glamorous charges. The implication is that these are not really terror-related prosecutions. Nothing could be further from the truth. Prosecutors had good cause to link each of these individuals to international terror related activity. It is true that not all were charged and prosecuted for front-line terror activities. Such charges are difficult to bring, and often require revealing sources and methods the government would rather not disclose in court. In this we have followed a philosophy used effectively by Rudi Gulliani in fighting the New York crime syndicates – when you know someone is bad, charge them with what you can and get them off the streets. By charging and prosecuting second-tier offenses we incapacitate individuals and prevent them from continuing their first-line terror activities.

This approach, I would note, has good historical pedigree – after all, Al Capone died in jail after being convicted for tax evasion. And in the war on terror, it has paid dividends. We have broken up terrorist cells in Portland, Oregon, Brooklyn and Buffalo, New York and recently charged three men in Toledo, Ohio with conspiring to provide material support to terrorists and conspiring to commit acts of terrorism against individuals overseas – including U.S. military personnel serving in Iraq.

To remain vigilant, we continue to deploy new resources to strengthen our ability to spot and prevent attacks before they occur. To this end, the Justice Department will soon be standing up a National Security Division. This will bring under one umbrella the Department's primary national security elements, including the Counterterrorism and Counterespionage Sections of the Criminal Division, and the Office of Intelligence Policy and Review who specialize in the Foreign Surveillance Intelligence Act. This will fulfill a key recommendation of the Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission, and will significantly improve cooperation and communication between our intelligence and law enforcement teams.

Make no mistake, Al Qaeda remains a deadly and determined enemy, motivated not by America's actions in the world today, but by its own twisted and murderous ideology. Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, recently emerged from hiding to describe new threats, promising further attacks. In his words, we all face a future – and I quote – "colored by blood, the smoke of explosions, and the shadows of terror." Recent bombings in London, Bali, Spain, Jordan, as well as the recent Canadian bombing plot, show that the danger of terrorism is very much a continuing one.

Patriot Act

The fight against al Qaeda is, in military terms, "asymmetric" – it lacks the front lines and fixed positions of a more traditional war. The "battlefield," so to speak, is wherever the terrorists manage to make it.

The most important weapon in such a war is information. Our foremost goal is to prevent another attack. We want to interfere with terrorist cells before they get organized. We want to stop terrorists in their planning stages, not moments before, or after, a bomb goes off. As the bipartisan 9/11 and WMD Commissions urged, we must understand who the enemy is and what he is doing. Before we can "connect the dots," we must first collect the dots.

An invaluable key to that effort is the recently reauthorized USA Patriot Act. The tools of the Patriot Act are crucial in this regard, from roving surveillance to delayed notification search warrants. These tools are straightforward, appropriate under the Constitution, and vital in our fight against terror. We are dealing with an enemy that is relentless in its desire to harm us and has promised to strike again. We must make the most of our abilities to defend ourselves, and the Patriot Act allows us to do just that.

The Patriot Act has been the target of much criticism – to the point that it is invoked as the universal Rasputin behind objected-to policies, regardless of whether they even fall within the Act. Indeed, my wife and I are big fans of the shows "24" and "Alias." But, every time a government agent does something less-than-civilized, we cringe awaiting the obligatory cite to the Patriot Act as the source of authority. Let me address a few of the more popular canards about the Act.

First, it is often represented that the Act authorizes government "thought police" to target private citizens based on their library habits and the books they read, through the infamous "library records" provision. Of course this is untrue. The Act contains no "library records" provision. In fact, the Patriot Act explicitly prohibits the government from conducting an investigation solely based on protected First Amendment activity. Further, as the Attorney General has made clear, terrorism investigators have no interest in the library habits of ordinary Americans.

What the Act does actually do is allow prosecutors to get a court order to obtain business records. This is something prosecutors have always been able to do through grand jury subpoenas. While characterizing this provision as being just about "library records" was perhaps an effective PR move, it threatened to undermine a necessary and legitimate law enforcement tool, as business records can be invaluable in solving crimes.

Terrorists seeking to make a bomb may create records at chemical companies or hardware stores. Terrorist financing may pass through a legitimate or semi-legitimate business.

For example, in a recent domestic terrorism case, a grand jury served a subpoena on a bookseller to obtain records showing that a suspect had purchased a book giving instructions on how to build a particularly unusual detonator that had been used in several bombings. This was important evidence identifying the suspect as the bomber.

Nor should libraries be exempted from the reach of this authority. Library records have often featured in prominent prosecutions. For example, a federal grand jury was able to subpoena library records to identify the individual who checked out the specific books published in the Unabomber's manifesto. Library records also assisted law enforcement in solving the 1997 murder of fashion designer Gianni Versace, and in tracking down New York's "Zodiac Killer," through his citations to an obscure poet.

Terrorists and other foreign also have a track record of using libraries for illicit purposes. Last year, a member of a terrorist group closely affiliated with al Qaeda used Internet service provided by a public library to communicate with his confederates. Spies have used public library computers to do research to further their espionage and to communicate with their co-conspirators. For example, Brian Regan, a former TRW employee who was convicted of espionage, used computers at five public libraries in Northern Virginia and Maryland to locate addresses for the embassies of certain foreign governments.

To carve out a special exception for libraries would make them safe havens for terrorist and clandestine activities. If terrorists or spies knew that library activities could never be investigated, they would use libraries to plan and carry out activities that threaten our national security. Terrorists have proven themselves adept at adapting to our methods and abilities. They would easily adapt and adopt such a blanket shelter.

It is also important to note that prosecutors cannot write their own ticket, so to speak. Rather, requests for certain business records in a national security case must be reviewed by a federal court. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court can issue such orders only after the government demonstrates the records concerned are sought for an authorized investigation to obtain foreign intelligence information not concerning a U.S. person or to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities.

Moreover, under the Act, the Attorney General must "fully inform" Congress on how it has been implemented every six months. This review ensures that these activities are examined by all three branches of the federal government.

Another misconception about the Patriot Act is the claim that it dramatically expands traditional law enforcement methods. One oft-cited example is the provision permitting delayed notification search warrants. Long before the enactment of the Patriot Act, Courts authorized and upheld such warrants as a legitimate and necessary tool for fighting organized crime, drug cases, and child pornography. The Patriot Act simply codified this authority.

Delayed notification warrants are vital to our strategy of prevention – detecting and incapacitating terrorists before they are able to strike. They allow law enforcement to enter premises, search and confirm illegal activity, and then leave without alerting the targets to the search.

In some cases if criminals are tipped off too early to an investigation, they might flee, destroy evidence, intimidate or kill witnesses, cut off contact with associates, or take other action to evade arrest. For example, if a shipment of drugs or guns will pass through several stops on its way to its destination, delayed notice warrants allow officers to build a case against each link in the chain without tipping off the participants either to the investigation, or to possible informants working on the inside.

Recognizing the reasonableness of this approach, federal courts have long allowed law enforcement to delay for a limited time when the subject is told that a judicially-approved search warrant has been executed. This tool can be used only with a court order, in extremely narrow circumstances when immediate notification may result in death or physical harm to an individual, flight from prosecution, evidence tampering, witness intimidation, or serious jeopardy to an investigation. The reasonable delay gives law enforcement time to identify the criminal's associates, eliminate immediate threats to our communities, and coordinate the arrests of multiple individuals without tipping them off beforehand. In all cases, law enforcement must give notice that property has been searched or seized.

The Supreme Court has held the Fourth Amendment does not require law enforcement to give immediate notice of the execution of a search warrant. The Supreme Court emphasized "that covert entries are constitutional in some circumstances, at least if they are made pursuant to a warrant." The Patriot Act simply codified this useful tool.

Some have also claimed that the authority to conduct "roving surveillance" represents an unjustified expansion of investigatory power. In fact, we have long been able to use "roving wiretaps" - in which a wiretap authorization attaches to a particular suspect, rather than a particular telephone or other communications device - to investigate ordinary crimes, including drug offenses and racketeering. The authority to use roving wiretaps in drug cases has existed since 1986. A number of federal courts – including the Second, Fifth, and Ninth Circuits – have squarely ruled that roving wiretaps are perfectly consistent with the Fourth Amendment.

The Patriot Act merely authorizes the same techniques in national-security investigations. This enhances the government's authority to monitor sophisticated international terrorists and intelligence officers who are trained to thwart surveillance by changing cell phones just before important meetings or communications.

Again, the authority is limited and regulated. A wiretap under section 206 can be ordered only after the FISA court makes a finding that the actions of the target of the application may have the effect of thwarting the surveillance.

The tools of the Patriot Act are reasonable, moderate, and enormously valuable to us in our work to protect the country from another attack.

TSP

The terrorist surveillance program is also a critical part of our defense in the battlefield of the 21st century. It allows us to collect more information regarding al Qaeda's plans, to locate al Qaeda operatives, especially those already in the United States and poised to attack.

The Department of Justice has thoroughly examined this program and concluded that the President is acting within his power in authorizing it. And the Department of Justice is not alone in concluding that the program is lawful. Career lawyers at NSA and its Inspector General office have been intimately involved in the oversight of the program.

The terrorist surveillance program is firmly grounded in the President's constitutional authority. The Constitution charges the President with the primary responsibility for protecting the safety of all Americans, and the Constitution gives the President the authority necessary to fulfill this solemn duty. It has long been recognized that the President's constitutional powers include the authority to conduct warrantless surveillance aimed at detecting and preventing armed attacks on the United States. Presidents have repeatedly relied on their inherent power to gather foreign intelligence for reasons both diplomatic and military, and the federal courts have consistently upheld this longstanding practice.

If this authority is available in ordinary times, it is even more vital in the present circumstances of our armed conflict with al Qaeda. The President authorized the terrorist surveillance program in response to the deadliest foreign attack on American soil, and it is designed solely to prevent the next al Qaeda attack. As I noted, this conflict is asymmetric, and its front lines may be in our subways, our factories, and our streets. The goal of our enemy is to blend in with our civilian population in order to plan and carry out future attacks within America.

The President's authority to take military action—including the use of communications intelligence targeted at the enemy—does not come merely from his constitutional powers. It comes directly from Congress as well. Just a few days after the attacks of September 11th, Congress enacted a joint resolution to authorize the use of military force – or the AUMF – in response to the attacks on American soil. In the AUMF, Congress did two important things. First, it expressly recognized the President's –quote – "authority under the Constitution to take action to deter and prevent acts of international terrorism against the United States." Second, it supplemented that authority by authorizing the President to – and again, I quote – "use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks" in order to prevent further attacks on the United States.

Under the three-part framework of Justice Jackson's concurring opinion in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, the President's authority is at its zenith as he is acting "pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress." In this context, the President's authority "includes all that he possesses in his own right [under the Constitution] plus all that Congress can" confer on him.

In 2004, the Supreme Court considered the scope of the AUMF in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld. There, the question was whether the President had the authority to detain an American citizen as an enemy combatant for the duration of the hostilities. The Supreme Court confirmed that the expansive language of the AUMF—"all necessary and appropriate force"—ensures that the congressional authorization extends to traditional incidents of waging war. And, just like the detention of enemy combatants approved in Hamdi, the use of communications intelligence to prevent enemy attacks is a fundamental and accepted incident of military force.

This fact is amply borne out by history. This Nation has a long tradition of wartime enemy surveillance—a tradition that can be traced to George Washington, who made frequent and effective use of secret intelligence. One source of Washington's intelligence was intercepted British mail. In fact, Washington himself proposed that one of his Generals "contrive a means of opening [British letters] without breaking the seals, take copies of the contents, and then let them go on."

For as long as electronic communications have existed, the United States has intercepted those communications during wartime, and done so, not surprisingly, without judicial warrants. In the Civil War, for example, telegraph wiretapping was common and provided important intelligence for both sides. In World War I, President Wilson authorized the military to intercept all telegraph, telephone, and cable communications into and out of the United States; he inferred the authority to do so from the Constitution and from a general congressional authorization to use military force that did not mention anything about such surveillance.

So too in World War II; the day after the attack on Pearl Harbor, President Roosevelt authorized the interception of all communications traffic into and out of the United States. The terrorist surveillance program, of course, is far more focused, since it involves the interception only of international communications that are linked to al Qaeda.

Some have suggested that the AUMF did not authorize intelligence collection inside the United States. That contention cannot be squared with the reality of the September 11th attacks on our soil, launched from within the country, and carried out by agents hiding among us. Congress's authorization to the President to fight this threat necessarily contemplates the nature of the threat, and manifestly must included authorizing the President to use force and such other means as were necessary to repel any future unfolding attack within the United States. Congress also must be understood to have authorized the traditional means by which the military detects and responds to such attacks. Nor can this contention be squared with the language of the AUMF itself, which calls on the President to protect Americans both "at home and abroad," to take action to prevent further terrorist attacks "against the United States," and directs him to determine who was responsible for the attacks. Such a contention is also contrary to the long history of wartime surveillance, which has often involved the interception of enemy communications into and out of the United States.

Some contend that even if the President has constitutional authority to engage in the surveillance of our enemy during an armed conflict, that authority was constrained by Congress through the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act – or "FISA". Generally, FISA requires the Government to obtain an order from the special FISA court before conducting "electronic surveillance." But, even assuming the terrorist surveillance program qualifies as "electronic surveillance" under the Act, FISA also expressly allows Congress to respond to new threats through separate legislation. For the reasons I have already discussed, the AUMF provides the relevant statutory authorization for the terrorist surveillance program.

Some ask why the President elected not to use FISA's procedures for securing court orders for the terrorist surveillance program. We have to remember that what is at issue is a wartime intelligence program designed to protect our Nation from another attack in the middle of an armed conflict. It is an "early warning system" with only one purpose: to detect and prevent the next attack on the United States from foreign agents hiding in our midst. It is imperative for national security that we can detect reliably, immediately, and without delay whenever communications associated with al Qaeda enter or leave the United States. That may be the only way to alert us to the presence of an al Qaeda agent in our country and to the existence of an unfolding plot.

The speed and agility necessary to this military intelligence program are best captured by leaving intercept decisions to the judgment of professional intelligence officers, based on the best available intelligence information. These officers are best situated to make decisions quickly and accurately. Were those officers required to navigate the intricacies of the FISA process for each intercept, the resulting delay would create critical holes in our early warning system.

A typical FISA application involves a substantial process in its own right: The work of several lawyers; the preparation of an application and related legal papers; the approval of a designated Cabinet-level officer; a certification from a designated Senate-confirmed officer; and, finally, of course, the approval of an Article III judge who sits on the FISA Court. Needless to say, even under the very best of circumstances, this process consumes valuable resources and results in significant delay.

We all agree that there should be appropriate checks and balances on the Branches of our Government. The FISA process makes perfect sense in almost all cases of foreign intelligence monitoring in the United States, especially where the monitoring has a purpose beyond early-warning. Although technology has changed dramatically since FISA was enacted, FISA remains a vital tool in the War on Terror, and one that we are using to its fullest and will continue to use and adapt for our efforts against al Qaeda and other foreign threats. But as the President has explained, the terrorist surveillance program operated by the NSA requires the maximum in speed and agility, since even a very short delay may make the difference between success and failure in preventing the next attack. And we cannot afford to fail.

No one takes lightly the concerns that have been raised about the interception of domestic communications inside the United States. But this Administration has chosen to act now to prevent the next attack with every lawful tool at its disposal, rather than wait until it is too late. It is hard to imagine a President who would not elect to use these tools in defense of the American people—in fact, it would be irresponsible to do otherwise. The terrorist surveillance program is both necessary and lawful. Accordingly, as the President has explained, he intends to continue to exercise this authority as long as al Qaeda poses such a grave threat to the national security. If we conduct this reasonable surveillance—while taking special care to preserve civil liberties as we have—we can all continue to enjoy our rights and freedoms for generations to come.

Crime

Safety on our streets is a high priority for the Justice Department. Despite our many recent successes in this area, combating violent crime, and particularly gun crime, must be reduced even further. Almost a half million people are victims of gun-related crime each year. In 2003, nearly 10,000 of the nation's 14,000 murder victims were killed by a gun. In that same year, murder victims ages 13 to 24 were more than four times more likely to be killed with a gun than all other weapons combined.

The President's Project Safe Neighborhoods Initiative (PSN) is a comprehensive, strategic approach to reducing gun crime in America. It links together federal, state, and local law enforcement, prosecutors, and community leaders. The Administration has devoted more than $1.5 billion to PSN so far. The funds are used to hire prosecutors, provide training, conduct research, reach out to communities, and prevent future crimes.

The U.S. Attorneys in each of the 94 federal judicial districts, working side by side with local law enforcement and other officials, filed more than 10,000 federal firearms cases in 2005—a 73% increase since PSN began. Gun criminals are spending more time in prison, as well. Last year, more than 90% of convicted gun offenders received prison terms, and more than 2/3 were sentenced to three or more years in jail.

While keeping guns off our streets is crucial, new threats exist in our communities as well, particularly involving our children. When our children use the computer and go onto the Internet, they can encounter risks of exploitation that did not exist until recent years. The Attorney General recently announced a major new initiative, Project Safe Childhood to protect our children from these threats.

Our United States Attorneys around the country will work with local Internet Crimes Against Children Task Forces and community leaders to investigate and prosecute sexual predators and child pornographers. We will seek the harshest sentences appropriate under the law.

Recently, the Attorney General announced the indictments of 27 people for allegedly participating in a pornographic chat room called "Kiddypics and Kiddyvids." The indictments charge that defendants used minors to produce images of child pornography and then made those images – including a live show of an adult sexually molesting an infant – available to other members through the Internet.

The Project Safe Childhood initiative will help us root out this awful abuse before it can reach our children.

Attorney General Gonzalez recently announced another component of this effort, designed to make website providers more accountable for their products. Currently, commercial sex websites are often designed with innocuous terms hidden in their code. Thus, a sex website with the term "Barbie" or "barney" embedded in its code would show up in a search for those terms. This greatly increases the chance that children will unintentionally be exposed to such content. The Attorney General has proposed groundbreaking legislation that would require providers of such content to embed each such page with specific marks and notices to reduce this possibility and to empower parents.

Drug abuse is another vital problem in our country. Fortunately, there is some good news along this front. Drug use is continuing to decline among our youth. We have had considerable success in our drug prosecutions. Last year, we arrested two Afghan drug lords connected with the Taliban, and as well as two founders of the Cali drug cartel. We also dismantled six high-priority drug networks and disrupted the operations of another six.

Just last month, the Attorney General announced the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment in our history. Fifty members of the Colombian narco-terrorist group FARC were indicted for allegedly importing more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries. The FARC oversees the production of more than half of the cocaine coming into the United States.

More and more, we are hearing about the problems methamphetamine is causing in our communities. Meth is a horribly destructive drug. Its addictive properties rival or surpass those of other hard core illegal drugs; it ages its victims by decades; it causes paranoia and psychosis; and it is lethal. Moreover, the face of meth is changing. Whereas once, meth was primarily the product of small, domestic home-labs, today 80 percent of the meth in circulation in the United States is produced and shipped across the Southern Border by increasingly sophisticated and extremely violent Mexican drug syndicates.

We have been concentrating our efforts on eliminating this extraordinarily harmful drug. Last year we dismantled more than 50 meth labs and arrested more than 400 people through Operation Wildfire. This year, we are expanding our searches to locate Super Labs in Mexico and other foreign countries.

The President recently signed the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act, which provides us with additional tools to disrupt the production and trafficking of meth. The Act places reasonable restrictions on the sale of products containing pseudoephedrine, one of the chemicals needed to make meth. The products will be kept behind the counter or in locked cabinets, and purchases will be logged. These measures will help deter meth cooks, who try to buy large quantities of pseudoephedrine without being detected. Similar laws passed in states have led to dramatic drops in meth labs.

The Combat Meth Act also includes provisions to help protect children. It supports programs to treat children who have been endangered by living in a home where meth is produced or distributed. The law also includes increased penalties – of up to 20 additional years of prison time – when a child is present in the place where the crime occurs.

Civil Rights

Another priority for the Justice Department is the fight for civil rights and true equality for all Americans. I am pleased to report that the Department prosecuted a record number of criminal civil rights cases in the last two-year period. One priority in our enforcement has been human trafficking – modern-day slavery. Human trafficking includes the trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation, as well as the exploitation of agricultural workers, sweat shop workers, and domestic servants. It has been estimated that as many as 800,000 people are trafficked internationally each year, including 17,500 victims trafficked into the United States.

We have focused considerable resources on this problem. From 2001 through 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed more than four times as many trafficking cases as had been filed from 1996 through 2000. Almost 1,000 trafficking victims have been assisted by the Justice Department and other organizations under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Since 2004, we have awarded grants of more than $30 million to create 32 human trafficking task forces and 21 victim service providers around the country.

Another civil rights priority for us is fair housing. The Department of Justice currently operates a testing program to uncover housing discrimination. Under the program, pairs of individuals—one acting as the "control group" (e.g., white male) and the other as the "test group" (e.g., black male) —pose as prospective buyers or renters of real estate. If control group testers are treated more favorably than minority testers, this provides evidence of discrimination.

Over the next two years, Operation Home Sweet Home will increase the number of paired tests to an all time high. We will be concentrating testing in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina and in areas where Katrina victims have been relocated, as the hurricane displaced many minority residents who are now seeking new housing. We will also concentrate testing in areas that have experienced bias-related crimes such as cross burnings or assaults on minorities.

We have created a new website, located at www.usdoj.gov/fairhousing, devoted to fair housing enforcement. It includes an online form for citizens to submit tips and complaints. We have also established a toll-free housing discrimination tip line to report any incidents of housing discrimination, at 1-800-896-7743.

Corporate and Public Integrity

American citizens deserve to have confidence in the integrity and ethics of our public institutions and corporations, and we seek to preserve this confidence through the prosecution of corruption and fraud at all levels. In the wake of corporate scandals like Enron and WorldCom and the recent convictions of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, as well as public corruption scandals like the recent guilty plea of Congressman Randall "Duke" Cunningham, President Bush made clear that the nation cannot tolerate fraud and corruption which damages the confidence of our citizens and the world community in the fairness, honesty, and reliability of our public and private institutions. Cases like these – as time consuming and difficult as they often are – are essential to ensuring that our institutions operate freely, transparently, and lawfully. We have done much to restore consumer confidence in our public markets since the tech bubble collapse of 2000-2001, and we are seeking to bring the same zeal to our public institutions.

One recent unsung success in the corporate fraud field is Operation Global Con, which the Attorney General announced several weeks ago. For more than a year, United States and foreign law enforcement agencies have been targeting international fraudulent mass marketing schemes in the largest enforcement operation of its kind. This work has led to 565 arrests both here and abroad.

The investigation focused on telemarketing, the Internet, and mass mailings that cheat unsuspecting people through bogus investments, fake lotteries, sweepstakes schemes, phony credit cards, and tax frauds. For example, a scheme in Miami, Florida involving two defendants and the Discovery Capital Company allegedly defrauded investors of more than $3 million. Defendants occasionally used funds received from new investors to send out purported interest and dividends, thus persuading investors that the company was real. They allegedly spent the rest of the money on expensive cars and million-dollar homes.

Close to three million victims have been defrauded of more than $1 billion. We have worked closely with international allies including Canada, Costa Rica, the Netherlands, Spain, the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and Nigeria to arrest even more criminals abroad.

Corporate Cooperation & Waiver of Privilege

One issue with regard to the Department's enforcement of appropriate corporate conduct that has drawn significant comment and provoked much discussion has been the Department's consideration of a corporation's cooperation in making criminal charging decisions and sentencing recommendations - and more specifically waivers by corporations of applicable privileges as part of that cooperation. I should note at the outset that a number of our important recent convictions were greatly assisted by information we obtained through these waivers.

In a memorandum dated January 20, 2003, then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson set out the elements prosecutors should consider in determining whether to charge a corporation with a crime. Among these was cooperation and voluntary disclosure.

As was set out in the memo, a prosecutor may consider -- quote -- "the corporation's willingness to identify the culprits within the corporation, including senior executives; to make witnesses available; to disclose the complete results of its internal investigation; and to waive attorney-client and work product protection."

This last point has raised concern in the private bar and in the business community, and we at DOJ have been actively engaged in a dialogue with the bar and representatives of business. For instance, last year at this time, we invited people from outside the government to come to a national conference of US Attorneys, not only to explain their perspective but also to listen to the views of the US Attorneys. There are definitely two important interests that all sides in this dialogue recognize and embrace: on the one hand, the societal benefits from the preservation of certain confidential communications under various legal privileges and, on the other hand, the societal benefits from the vigorous enforcement of the criminal laws establishing norms and standards for corporate and public conduct. Neither is absolute, and the real issue is determining the right balance when those important goals are or perhaps seem to be in conflict one with the other.

We have heard the claim that federal prosecutors abuse their prosecutorial discretion described in the Thompson memo by routinely demanding inappropriate waivers of privilege at the very outset of an investigation. Others have argued that, even if waivers are not routinely sought, the mere risk that a waiver might be sought will discourage corporate employees from seeking legal advice from their corporate counsel and from being truly candid with counsel about the factual circumstances surrounding their need or desire for the legal advice. It has been asserted that corporate counsel will be deterred from undertaking internal investigations or putting advice in writing based upon the mere perception, even if inaccurate, that waivers of privilege could possibly be sought. Let me take these in turn.

First is the concern of the overzealous prosecutor. The Thompson memorandum itself makes clear several factors to be considered regarding a charging decision, one of which is the corporation's cooperation with the investigation, and the waiver of privileges is not an absolute requirement in establishing a corporation's cooperation. Rather, the Thompson memo states that prosecutors should consider waivers "where necessary to provide timely and complete information" and then only as "one factor in evaluating the corporation's cooperation."

Second, the memo makes clear that a cooperative "disclosure" (note that I am not calling it a "waiver") may, under many circumstances, be limited and precisely defined so as not to constitute a technical waiver of some established legal privilege. The purpose of any waiver or disclosure is to provide the government with timely access to complete and accurate information necessary to its inquiry. This standard may be satisfied by factual information, the identification of witnesses, and the production of non-privileged documents. Other investigations may require more, including possibly redacted notes of witness interviews or even contemporaneous advice given to the corporation concerning the conduct at issue. Each investigation is unique, and each has aspects to it that are inherently dependent on the discretion of the prosecutor. I often describe this process with the peeling an onion analogy; prosecutors generally start with the least intrusive disclosures that don't involve any waiver of legal privileges and go further in a layered approach only as and when necessary, Indeed, absent appropriate circumstances, the Thompson memo suggests: "prosecutors should not seek a waiver with respect to communications and work product related to advice concerning the government's criminal investigation."

Thus, the Thompson memo is itself quite balanced and deferential to legal privileges, subject to the timely, accurate, and complete information needs of the prosecutor. We at the Department continue to embrace the Thompson memo as appropriate guidance to federal prosecutors, and we do not believe that it has been or is being misapplied through "routine" requests for privilege waivers.

While we at DOJ remain committed to the standards set forth in the Thompson memo, we did want to be responsive to what I will call the "perception concern" I mentioned: that is the claim that even if waivers are not being inappropriately sought, there is a risk that they might be and so attorney client communication is "chilled." In October 2005, during a time when I was serving as Acting Deputy Attorney General, I issued additional guidance which I intended to address this issue in part. That guidance required each United States Attorney's Office, and each DOJ component, to develop written review procedures when waivers of privilege were necessary to obtain timely, complete, and accurate information from business organizations. While the review process may vary from office to office in order to accommodate local needs, a necessary element is that a prosecutor must have the approval of the United States Attorney or a supervisory-level AUSA before seeking a waiver of the attorney-client or work product privilege. This process ensures that waiver requests are based upon a deliberate and considered evaluation of all of the circumstances affecting the exercise of the prosecutor's discretion in that case.

The real concerns regarding these waiver and disclosure issues revolve around whether there can be a limited waiver or disclosure to regulators or prosecutors that does not necessarily result in the protected information becoming available to civil litigants in claims against the corporation. That is an issue on which we need to have much more discussion since there is no defined DOJ position on that concept at this time. The waiver rule generally has been that waiver of a privileged communication to one party waives the privilege as to all other parties. However, at least one court of appeals, the Eighth Circuit, has taken the contrary view with regard to disclosures to the government. Of course, other courts have disagreed with the Eighth Circuit. A number of proposals have been floated to address the problem. Bills have been introduced into Congress that would create a federal rule of privilege under which waiver to the government would not constitute a waiver in subsequent private civil litigation, and a Federal Rules Advisory Committee of the Judicial Conference has also discussed a proposal that would amend the Federal Rules of Evidence to achieve this same goal.

Let me assure you that the Department is actively engaged in this issue. We understand the importance of legal privileges in ensuring the free flow of candid communications between corporate counsel and their clients, and we understand that such appropriate communications can contribute to sound corporate governance. At the same time, we take very seriously our duty to enforce the criminal law as prosecutors, and we will use all of the appropriate prosecutorial tools to do so. Both factors benefit our society and our economy. The devil is, of course, always in the details, and so we at DOJ are interested in continuing this discussion on the civil litigation issue with all interested parties, including but not limited to representatives of the ABA and the business community.

Conclusion

Again, let me thank you very much for the invitation to join you this afternoon. Judge Gonzales very much values the Department's relationship with groups like yours, and he is committed to developing and maintaining those relationships in order to allow for candid communication and the open exchange of ideas on issue of common interest, whether we agree on every point or not.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, June 14, 2006 8:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, June 14, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060614.pdf; agnb060614.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Pentagon Will Not Hide Interrogation Tactics 4
Opening Arguments Made At Terrorism Trial In Arkansas 4
Family Of Guantanamo Detainee Doubts He Committed Suicide 4
Cleric Linked To 2002 Bali Bombings Released From Prison 5
Muslim Man Shot In London Raid Says Police Fired Without Warning 5

Homeland Response:

Counter Terrorism Officials Tell Senators Of Disrupted Homegrown Sleeper Cells 5
9th Circuit Hears Arguments On Proposed California Biodefense Lab 6
DHS To Review Proposals For Missile Defense Systems On Commercial Planes 6
US Navy Building Ship To Honor New York 6
NYTimes Urges Senate Not To Pass Chemical Plant Security Bill 6
GAO Finds FEMA Lost At Least $1 Billion To Hurricane Relief Fraud, Waste 6
Alberto Causes Little Damage In Florida 7

War News:

Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Baghdad 8
Iraqi, US Forces To Launch Offensive Against Insurgents 11
Rumsfeld, Rice, Brief Lawmakers On Iraq 11
Defense Phase Of Saddam Trial Ends 11
US To Probe Video Of Marine Making Light Of Killing Iraqi Family 11
Gore Says Rumsfeld Should Resign 12
Injured ABC Anchor Visits Newsroom 12
CBS Soundman Killed In Iraq Buried In London 12
Iraqis Continue "Exodus" To Syria, Jordan 12
US-Led Coalition To Launch Offensive Against Taliban 12
Administration Announces Nominee For Marine Commandant 12

Corporate Scandals:

SEC To Crack Down On Backdating Of Stock Options 12
Enron Broadband Jurors Say They Were Pressured To Convict 14
White House Increases Pressure On Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac 14
SEC Opens Mutual Fund Rules For Comment 15
SEC Nears Naming Of Accounting Oversight Board Head 15
Cooperative Accounting Regulation Urged 16

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Won't Charge Rove In CIA Leak Investigation 16
DOJ Challenges House Leaders On Searches 18
Judge Postpones Safavian Jury Deliberations Due To Misconduct Allegation 18
Convicted "Mafia Cops" Seek Reversals For Inadequate Representation 19
Former Chicago City Clerk Sentenced To 2 Years In Prison 19
Mississippi County Official Pleads Not Guilty To Katrina Kickback Charges 19
California Man Pleads Guilty To Racketeering In Israel Cartel Case 20
Duke Basketball Star Charged With Drunk Driving 20
Antigua Challenges US Online Gaming Laws 20
Patrick Kennedy Pleads Guilty To Driving While Impaired 21
FBI Web Site Seeks Public Corruption Tips 21
Box Blown Up Near Miami Federal Courthouse May Have Contained Criminal Evidence 21

Civil Rights:

DOJ Cites Deaths, Violence In Probe Of DC Mental Facility 22
DOJ Investigating Deaths By Police Taser Use 22

Minneapolis Weighing Excessive Force Charges Against Two Police Officers 22
Maryland Alien Smuggling Suspects Face New Charges 23
EEOC Said To Be Falling Behind On Cases 23
Some Fear Public Accommodations Will Spark Backlash Against Muslim Women 23
Hentoff Criticizes ACLU Efforts To Quiet Dissenters 23

Antitrust:

Blockbuster Accuses Netflix Of Antitrust Violations In Patent Dispute 23
Fight Over Net Neutrality Moves Back To Senate 24
Apple Can Learn Lessons From EU's Treatment Of Microsoft 24
EU Moves Up Deadline For Suez-GDF Ruling 24
Mittal Issues Growth Projection To Help Arcelor Bid 25
Intellectual Ventures Sparks Concerns About Patent Stockpiling 25

Environment:

Judge Dismisses Part Of Criminal Charge Against WR Grace 25
DOJ Enters Colorado Land-Use Dispute 25
Senate Republicans Scrap Vote On Bush Mine Safety Nominee 26
Friedman Says GM Should Focus On Making Fuel-Efficient Vehicles 26
WPost Says Supreme Court Should Hear EPA Case 26

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In "Major Rebuke" To Seattle SAC, FBI Reassigns US Attorney Murder Probe 26
Federal Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 6 In Drug-Trafficking Case 27
Appeals Court Upholds 2 Murder Convictions In Louisiana 27
WADA Chairman Says National Hockey League Drug Testing Is Flawed 27
Search Of Grimsley's Home In Baseball Steroid Investigation Called Surprising 27
Afghanistan Poppy Harvest Expected To Reach Record Levels 27
New Marshals Service Head Profiled 27
Captured Fugitive Gunman Faces Weapons Charges In Wisconsin 27

Immigration:

Judge Sets $350,000 Bail For Border Patrol Agent 28
Hastert Considers Holding Hearings On Senate Immigration Bill 28

Tax:

Former Atlanta Mayor Sentenced For Tax Evasion 28

Congress-Administration:

House Approves Emergency Spending Bill 29
Rehnquist Legacy Being Reassessed 29
New Agriculture Department General Counsel Profiled 30
Leavitt Touts Welfare Reform Adjustments 30
Medicare Overhaul Legislation Seen As Taking Shape 30
House Appropriations Panel Votes To Increase Minimum Wage 31
House Accepts Pay Raise 31
Murtha Suspending Bid For Majority Leader 31
McConnell Seen As Preparing For Senate Majority Leader 31
Mollohan Amends Financial Disclosures, Maintains Innocence 31
Clients Boosted Payments Of Lewis Aides' Former Firm 32
Democratic Leaders To Unveil Domestic Agenda 32
Report Alleges Misconduct By NIH Alzheimer's Researcher 33
Filner Curses VA "Spin Doctor" Over Data Theft Response 33
Bill Would Restrict Consumer Ability To Freeze Credit Reports 33
Author Says Executive Privilege Not An Absolute Right 33
NYTimes Calls Obama's Proposed Deal With Automakers "Worthy New Idea." 33

Other News:

Sluggish Retail Sales May Indicate Slowing Economy 34
Former Reagan Navy Secretary Wins Virginia Democratic Senate Primary 35
Liberal Jeers For Clinton Over Iraq Stance Seen As Revealing Deep Democratic Split 36
Clinton Tries To Refocus Debate On Abortion 36
Rove Seeks To Draw Clear Distinctions Between GOP, Democrats 36
Laura Bush Campaigns With Kean In New Jersey 37
DeLay Recorded Phone Message For VA8 Primary Candidate 37
Giuliani Outlines Energy Strategy 37
Gore Says He Has No Plans To Run Again 38
Hayworth Invitation Calls Quayle 44th US President 38
States Said To Have Financial Incentive To Encourage Adoption 38
States Consider Privatizing Parts Of Interstate Highway System 38

DOJ_NMG_0033554

Israel Kills Terrorists, Civilians In Gaza Strike 38
Four Chinese Companies Sanctioned For Aiding Iran 39
Pew Poll Shows US Global Image Weakening..... 39
US Seen As "Quietly Beginning To Accept" ICC..... 39
US Military Violated Irish Law By Transporting Convicted Marine Through Airport..... 39
GAO Report Says US Is Unprepared For Venezuelan Oil Ban40
Bush To Take Koizumi On Tour Of Graceland..... 40
Somali Militias Seek To Reassure Western Leaders 41
Before US Visit, Uribe Orders Investigations Into Police Scandal 41
Senate Measure Would Establish Permanent Trade Relations With Vietnam 41
UN Preparing For New Peacekeeping Mission In East Timor41
Agencies Paying Millions In AIDS Incentives 41
NYTimes Researcher's Trial In China To Begin This Week. 42
Power Restored To US Mission In Cuba 42
Russian Law Enforcement Agencies Said To Be Acting To Enrich Corrupt Officials..... 42
Humanitarian Funding For Darfur Running Low 42
ElBaradei Lauds US-India Deal, Touts Disarmament..... 42
Italian Foreign Minister Says He'll Work To Strengthen Euro-Atlantic Ties..... 43

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 43

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 44

DOJ_NMG_0033555

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Will Not Hide Interrogation Tactics. The AP (6/13, Baldor) reports, "The Pentagon has dropped plans to keep some interrogation techniques secret by putting them in a classified section of a military manual." It had come under pressure from human rights advocates and members of Congress. The article notes that Secretary Rumsfeld "said for the first time last month that officials were at odds over whether the manual should endorse different interrogation techniques for enemy insurgents than are allowed for regular prisoners of war."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/14, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports the Defense Department is also "expected to drop a plan to have one set of interrogation methods for detainees that the military considers 'unlawful combatants,' like detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and another set for traditional prisoners of war captured on the battlefield." It lists numerous critics of the planned classification of interrogation policy: GOP Sens. John McCain, John Warner, and Lindsey Graham; Gens. John Abizard and Peter Schoonmaker; and Elisa Massimino of Human Rights Watch.

Opening Arguments Made At Terrorism Trial In Arkansas. The Springdale (AR) Morning News (6/14, Wood) reports that in opening arguments at the trial of former University of Arkansas graduate student Arwah Jaber, accused of providing material support to Palestinian Islamic Jihad and lying to immigration officials, Jaber's lawyers "told jurors Tuesday morning the government's whole case is based on a series of misunderstandings." The attorneys "said he was frustrated by a professor who was not allowing him to graduate with his doctorate degree. They admit he made statements he shouldn't have made but he had no intention of violating the law." However, "Federal prosecutors said…that making false statements, using multiple names and someone else's social security number was an indication that Jaber intended to become a martyr for the Palestinian cause against Israel. They say he also made small amounts of an explosive, had Palestinian propaganda and he told numerous people he intended to go fight the Israelis and might not return."

Professors Split On Former Jaber's Aims. The AP (6/14) reports, "Charles Wilkins, a professor of chemistry and Jaber's adviser, testified Tuesday that he told FBI agents he didn't see any inclination toward terrorism in the graduate student. Jaber had recently been denied his doctoral degree in chemistry when he said he was going to Palestine with his wife." However, "David Paul, an associate professor of chemistry who was on Jaber's doctoral dissertation committee, said he noticed Jaber stopped making progress toward his degree after speaking with a friend in Palestine. … 'He needed to go home and make the Israelis sorry,' Paul said."

Family Of Guantanamo Detainee Doubts He Committed Suicide. The Washington Post (6/14, Ambah, 744K) reports the doubts of late Saudi detainee Yassar Talal al-Zharani's family that he killed himself. The family "described a man who was optimistic, stubborn and too devout to have taken his own life." His father "said he believes his son was either hanged by guards or beaten to death by them. The body has not been returned; the father has asked the Saudi government to demand an independent autopsy and investigation." The article quotes a former inmate who says Zharani was a former "Taliban foot soldier" and another who remembers that Zharani was "pushed hard" by interrogators.

Guantanamo Prison Criticized. In the Washington Post (6/14, 744K), columnist David Ignatius says that initial remarks by American officials on the Guantanamo suicides showed him "it's time to close that camp -- not just because of what it's doing to the prisoners but because of how it is dehumanizing the American captors." Ignatius writes of the inmates, "They are human beings and, as such, they have basic human rights."

In the New York Times (6/14, 1.19M), former detainee Mourad Benchellali writes of his two and a half years in the prison, "I cannot describe in just a few lines the suffering and the torture; but the worst aspect of being at the camp was the despair, the feeling that whatever you say, it will never make a difference." Benchellali writes, "I believe that a small number of the detainees at Guantánamo are guilty of criminal acts, but as analysis of the military's documents on the prisoners has shown, there is no evidence that most of the 465 or so men there have committed hostile acts against the United States or its allies."

DOJ_NMG_0033556

Cleric Linked To 2002 Bali Bombings Released From Prison. The Financial Times (6/14, Donnan) reports, "Indonesia on Wednesday released radical cleric Abu Bakar Bashir from prison where he finished serving a 30-month sentence for giving his blessing to plans for the 2002 Bali bombings. Supporters have said that the 68-year-old cleric would be returning home to central Java on Wednesday where he is expected to meet with reporters and distribute aid to survivors of last month's earthquake in the area."

The Washington Times/AP (6/14, Hakim) notes "the Bush administration criticized the release," which also "sparked disapproval by Australia." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "said the United States was 'deeply disappointed by what we consider a light sentence handed out to this individual.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, McCawley, 61K) says "analysts are downplaying fears that Bashir, accused of being the 'emir' or leader of the militant group Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), will begin ordering bombings." Rather, Bashir "is more likely to use his celebrity to preach fire and brimstone and bolster the cause of hard-line Islam." The New York Times (6/14, Bonner, 1.19M) reports Bashir "has steadfastly denied any involvement in terrorist activities, but has been equally firm in his admiration for Mr. bin Laden, and in his loathing of Jews and the United States. Until Mr. Bashir made common cause with Al Qaeda sometime in the 1990's, the primary goal of Jemaah Islamiyah was the establishment of an Islamic state in Indonesia. Mr. Bashir is expected to return to proselytizing for that cause." The Times adds, "Jemaah Islamiyah has been severely weakened by the Indonesian police and intelligence services, terrorism experts here say. Sidney Jones, an authority on Jemaah Islamiyah and the director of the Jakarta office of the International Crisis Group, an organization that studies violent conflicts, said that releasing Mr. Bashir was not likely to increase the threat of terrorism."

Muslim Man Shot In London Raid Says Police Fired Without Warning. The Washington Post (6/14, A17, Jordan, 744K) reports, "A 23-year-old Muslim man who was shot during a massive police raid on his house earlier this month, then released without charge, said Tuesday that an officer fired at him without warning. In his first public statements since the raid early this month, Mohammed Abdul Kahar described himself as a law-abiding man who loved London, his birthplace. His emotional words, delivered at a news conference here, added to the embarrassment that the anti-terrorism raid has caused Scotland Yard."

The New York Times (6/14, Cowell, 1.19M) notes that during the news conference, Kahar "denied being a supporter of violence or terrorism, describing himself as a postal van driver and part-time supermarket worker who 'just wanted to work to please my family, to support my mum and dad.'" The Times adds, "His account could add to sentiment among some of Britain's 1.6 million Muslims that, in the words of Massoud Shajareh of the Islamic Human Rights Commission last weekend, 'they were shot because they were Muslim or perceived to be Muslim.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Counter Terrorism Officials Tell Senators Of Disrupted Homegrown Sleeper Cells. The AP (6/14, Shrader) reports, "U.S. counterterrorism officials say they are uncovering homegrown Islamic radicals inside the United States who lack formal ties to al-Qaeda and operate independently." NCTC Director Vice Adm. John Scott Redd told a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing yesterday that "those independent qualities – combined with the radicals' ability to organize and plot on the Internet – make them particularly difficult to disrupt." Redd cited the Atlanta, Torrance and Lodi arrests as "three potential homegrown organizations that have been disrupted in the U.S. in just over a year." The AP adds, "Showing how the government's mission has changed, Redd said that before 9/11 the FBI wrote 25 intelligence-information reports a year, but now the bureau produces more than 1,000 annually. Still, Delaware Sen. Joe Biden…called it 'on the verge of criminal' that the government is not fully funding the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission, estimated at $42 billion over five years."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/14, Gertz, 90K) reports Redd and State Department counter-terrorism coordinator Henry Crumpton also told the Senators, "Al Qaeda remains a major threat despite the death last week of…Abu Musab Zarqawi." Redd "also said other Sunni extremist groups inspired by al Qaeda are expanding from regional organizations into a global network that may target U.S. interests." The Times adds, "Asked by Committee Chairman Sen. Richard G. Lugar…about a recent terrorist attempt to bomb Saudi Arabian oil fields, Mr. Crumpton said terrorists are trying to attack such economic targets to 'disrupt the oil supplies.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033557

9th Circuit Hears Arguments On Proposed California Biodefense Lab. The AP (6/14, Lindlaw) reports, "A federal appeals court judge said Tuesday she found it 'troublesome' that the Bush administration wants to open a lab for testing lethal agents including HIV, plague and anthrax in the densely populated San Francisco Bay Area. … But a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer told the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the administration had thoroughly researched its plans for a biodefense lab at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and concluded there was little risk of a disaster." The AP continues, "If pathogens were to seep from the proposed lab and reach the public, they would have dispersed into such low concentrations they would be unlikely to injure anyone, Justice Department attorney Todd Aagaard said. … A lawyer for the lab's opponents sharply disagreed, saying even a small release could kill thousands." The AP adds, "The government also failed to consider the possibility that a plane or truck could be deliberately crashed into the site 50 miles east of San Francisco, said Stephan Volker, the lab opponents' lead attorney. … Instead, the administration used 'a one-size-fits-all scenario, borrowed from another agency' when it studied the possible risks, he told the judges. … The Bush adminstration has been preparing the biodefense lab for years, and said this week it plans to open the facility by August. But local residents have been fighting it in the courts. A lower federal court said in September 2004 that it could proceed, and the opponents appealed. The appeals court did not rule on Tuesday."

DHS To Review Proposals For Missile Defense Systems On Commercial Planes. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Keeton, 2.11M) reports DHS will review proposals from Raytheon Co. and Northrop Grumman Corp. this month for systems to protect "commercial aircraft from shoulder-fired missiles." Though a Rand Corp. study "estimated that the initial cost for putting laser jammers on 6,800 commercial planes in the US would be about $11 billion, ballooning to $40 billion over a 10-year period," the defense contractors "say the cost of any of the programs would be substantially less."

US Navy Building Ship To Honor New York. NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 10, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A year from now, the US fleet will have a special new member. A ship bearing the proud name of New York will hit the seas with an already proud and very dynamic story behind it." NBC (Savidge) added, "Just outside New Orleans, the USS New York has twice been touched by tragedy. The Navy amphibious assault ship has seven and a half tons of steel from tower two of the World Trade Center in its bow, and while under construction, Katrina struck." Katrina "gave hundreds of shipyard workers good reason to leave and start over somewhere else. But only half finished, the ship gave them an even better reason to stay." Many "now call the shipyard home, bunking down within sight of the New York, separated from their displaced families."

NYTimes Urges Senate Not To Pass Chemical Plant Security Bill. The New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) editorializes that a chemical plant bill up for debate in the Senate today "could actually make the country less safe. If senators are afraid to stand up to the chemical industry and pass a good bill, they should at least have the courage to do nothing." The bill, drawn up by Sens. Susan Collins and Joseph Lieberman, "needs tough language added requiring chemical plants to replace dangerous chemicals with safer alternatives. The chemical industry is resisting. An even bigger disgrace is that the industry is pushing hard to get 'pre-emption' language added to the bill."

GAO Finds FEMA Lost At Least $1 Billion To Hurricane Relief Fraud, Waste. USA Today (6/14, Hall, 2.31M) reports a GAO report to be released today concludes that FEMA paid "at least $1 billion in questionable disaster-relief claims in the six months after last year's devastating Gulf Coast hurricanes." Relief funds went "to thousands of people who registered with FEMA using information belonging to prison inmates or who provided only a post office box as the address of their damaged home." The GAO said FEMA "needs to immediately put 'adequate safeguards' in place to 'build the American taxpayers' confidence that federal disaster assistance only goes to those in need.'"

ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 7, 2:00, Cochran, 8.78M) reported, "Millions of dollars went to people who registered several times for aid, using the names and Social Security numbers of prison inmates. FEMA also gave out debit cards and cannot verify that cards worth $1.5 million actually went to Katrina victims. … Congress is hopping mad." Investigators "estimate Katrina-related fraud is between $600 million and $1.4 billion. But they say the actual figure is much, much higher because they did not investigate insurance fraud and other bogus claims."

DOJ_NMG_0033558

The Washington Post/AP (6/14, A3, Margasak) reports, "To dramatize the problem, the GAO provided lawmakers with a copy of a $2,358 US Treasury check for rental assistance that an undercover agent got using a bogus address. The money was paid even after FEMA learned from its inspector that the undercover applicant did not live at the address." Though FEMA "said it has identified $16.8 million in improperly awarded disaster relief money and has started efforts to collect the money," congressional investigators said they were "95 percent confident that improper and potentially fraudulent payments were much higher: between $600 million and $1.4 billion." The AP article appeared on at least 140 news websites.

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 6, 2:25, Reid, 9.87M) quoted Sen. Susan Collins: "The examples are so egregious that what they tell us is that FEMA didn't perform even basic checks to safeguard taxpayer's money." Reid: "The report says FEMA didn't even try to verify the identities of people who applied for aid by phone, and it says FEMA's fraud controls are weak or nonexistent. More than two thousand people applied for aid from prison and received about $12 million."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 5, 2:20, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News has learned that congressional investigators this week turned over 7,000 cases for possible prosecution." Rep. Michael McCaul, Texas: "I think there was a rush to get the money out without any proper controls put in place by FEMA."

The New York Times (6/14, Lipton, 1.19M) reports McCaul said the "scale of abuse that...far exceeded even his worst fears, despite months of accumulating evidence that the fraud-prevention system at the Federal Emergency Management Agency was woefully inadequate." The GAO found that "aid was used to pay for football tickets, the bill at a Hooters in San Antonio, a $200 bottle of Dom Perignon, 'Girls Gone Wild' videos, even an all-inclusive weeklong Caribbean vacation, the report says." FEMA spokesman Aaron T. Walker "said the agency was moving to correct management weaknesses that might have contributed to the fraud, including establishing a system that will block multiple registrations for aid filed under a single Social Security number."

Tens Of Thousands Along Gulf Coast Still In FEMA Trailers. The New York Times (6/14, Barry, 1.19M) reports from Hancock County, Mississippi, where there are more than 9,000 FEMA trailers, each containing "lives in claustrophobic suspension." The Times continues that the phrase "FEMA trailer" "has nearly lost meaning, so embedded is it in the national memory of last year's crushing hurricanes, Katrina and Rita." However, "tens of thousands of people continue to live crammed in FEMA trailers, greeting this year's hurricane season the same way they said goodbye to the last one: in light-metal boxes that even a tropical storm could flip like playing cards and which seem so vulnerable alongside the brush fires crackling through some stretches of the Gulf Coast."

Alberto Causes Little Damage In Florida. USA Today (6/14, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports Tropical Storm Alberto landed in Florida "Tuesday with a whimper, but it ratcheted up tension for residents after two years of record storms. … Some low-lying coastal areas and city streets flooded, but the rain was a welcome soaking for Florida's parched pastures, farms and groves in the center of the state. While damage from Alberto appeared minor, residents remain wary."

The New York Times (6/14, Aguayo, 1.19M) reports the storm hit "with heavy rain and high winds, but it did not pose the threat that forecasters had initially feared." Gov. Jeb Bush said the storm was "a good lesson…in preparedness," adding, "I can assure you that if a stronger storm comes our way, we have a great team locally and at the state level."

While the CBS Evening News and ABC World News Tonight ran brief reports noting that Alberto hit Florida as a weaker storm than had previously been expected, a longer report on NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 5, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) seemed to focus on what negative impact the storm did have, reporting that it "is making for an awfully wet and nasty and dangerous Tuesday for parts of Florida's Gulf Coast and points north." NBC (Sanders) added, "One emergency official called Alberto a good rehearsal." Damage is "mostly along the coast. The tide, in some spots, surged more than seven feet. In Citrus County, jail inmates were ordered to help fight back by sandbagging low-lying areas.

DOJ_NMG_0033559

Power was temporarily knocked out to 21,000 homes and businesses."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/13) reported, "Worries outpace reality: So far, Tropical Storm Alberto has not been as rough as expected. It did threaten Florida, but only managed to menace the state with heavy rain." Fox News' Fox Report (6/13, Smith) reported, "Hurricane, not even close. But Alberto dropped plenty of rain in Florida along the peninsula as the first tropical storm of '06 made landfall."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (6/13, Cooper) reported, "Alberto is more midget than monster, falling short of hurricane. Right now it's cruising toward South Carolina with 40 mph winds, after soaking Florida, sparing it however major damage. In what is expected to be a very busy hurricane season, it could have been so much worse." CNN (Zarrella) added, "For folks in Crystal River on Florida's Gulf Coast, the 'A' in Alberto stood for annoying."

Many Said To Have Defied Evacuation Orders. The Washington Post (6/14, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports from Horseshoe Beach, where despite a hurricane warning that "echoed ceaselessly from televisions," a "City Hall meeting to encourage people to leave" and a mandatory evacuation, "many and maybe most" residents decided to stay. "Scott Garner, chief of emergency management for the county, estimated that only 30 percent of residents in Dixie's coastal communities, which include Horseshoe Beach, complied with the evacuation order. About 50 people went to shelters." Many residents "along the nation's hurricane-threatened coasts, prefer to make the evacuation decision based on personal storm experience and meteorological insight."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Baghdad. President Bush's made a surprise visit to Iraq yesterday. The AP (6/13, Hunt) reports Bush "spent over 5 1/2 hours in Baghdad in his second visit of the three-year war, both kept secret until he had safely arrived. … In a mission designed to both showcase US support for the new unity government and to ease war concerns at home, the president told the Iraqi prime minister the United States would stand by the new government as it works to achieve stability."

The story is receiving extensive media coverage: it led the network newscasts last night, drawing a total of about 16 minutes of coverage, and is being prominently carried by the wire services and major dailies. The tenor of the stories is generally positive -- as were the reactions to the trip from usual Bush critics such as Sen. Joe Biden and former Vice President Gore. Typical of the coverage is the Wall Street Journal (6/14, McKinnon, Dreazen, 2.11M) runs a story headlined "Bush's Visit To Baghdad Signifies Upturn In His Political Fortunes," in which it says that the President, "caught for months in a losing battle for public approval, suddenly is scoring gains on several fronts, raising a far-reaching question: Is he setting the stage for a political recovery? Mr. Bush Tuesday sought to capitalize on progress on the most vital front of all, Iraq, making an unannounced visit to Baghdad to hail the formation of a new government there. … Along with other recent good news, the developments hold at least the prospect that Mr. Bush's political slide has hit bottom."

Like the Journal, a number of stories put the trip in the context of a recent "spate of positive developments," as the Washington Post (6/14, A1, Baker, 744K) puts it, that may suggest the President's fortunes are on the upswing after months of bad news and sagging poll numbers. The Post, however, also cautions that "the question is whether this latest updraft in Bush's fortunes will last much longer than the president's surprise trip yesterday to Iraq."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, Feldmann, 61K) runs a similarly positive assessment under the headline "A Lift In Iraq And A Bump Back Home," in which it says "the pictures out of Baghdad Tuesday morning spoke volumes." Bush "is beaming, the new Iraqi leader at his side, after pulling off a secret flight to the country that is the make-or-break project of his presidency. … Not only has Bush been edging steadily upward in overall job performance, after hitting bottom in early May at 31 percent, by Gallup's measure, his approval ratings on individual issues -- from Iraq and energy to the economy and immigration -- have bumped up as well."

Knight Ridder (6/14, Hutcheson, Douglas) says yesterday was "another good day for the president, who finally has a few reasons to celebrate after a long string of setbacks that battered his popularity." It "added to the optimism that swept through the White House after last week's slaying of terrorist chief Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq and the completion of a new Iraqi government. … 'All of a sudden the clouds broke and the sun started to shine,' said Ed Gillespie, a former Republican Party chairman. 'After six months of thunderstorms and rain it feels pretty good.'"

The Chicago Tribune (6/14, Silva, 643K) reports the trip "was intended to catch two waves of success: formation of a tough new government in Iraq and the killing of a reviled insurgent leader. For the moment, at least, Bush appeared to be riding those waves with a gradual improvement in the public's opinion of the president's performance in the past month and an additional slight uptick since last week's killing of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq." The Tribune adds, "After unremitting bad news from Iraq that dragged Bush's approval ratings to an all-time low this spring, the president has caught a few breaks that could offer his administration hope."

DOJ_NMG_0033560

The New York Times (6/14, Stolberg, 1.19M), in another positive assessment of Bush's trip, says it was "powerful political theater, choreographed by an experienced team that played up the drama and secrecy of the moment." The trip, "including a stealthy nighttime helicopter departure from Camp David, unfolded with the precision of a campaign event, complete with the image of the commander in chief addressing cheering American troops."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 2, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Photo ops by this White House don't get more elaborate than this. A daring presidential trip into a war zone designed to create new hope for Iraq." The "timing of the trip, aides insist, was driven by the completion of Iraq's unity government last week, not by the death of terrorist Zarqawi, but that provided an extra boost. The emerging White House strategy stressed the importance of Iraqi leaders leading the country's turnaround." Some Democrats "today dismissed this trip as a face-saving attempt by the president and again pushed him, Brian, to set a deadline for the withdrawal of US troops."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, lead story, 3:25, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "The White House said the President wanted to get to know Iraq's prime minister personally." Bush: "I've come to not only look you in the eye. I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it will keep its word." Palmer: "With the cabinet watching from Camp David by satellite link, Prime Minister Maliki replied that Iraqis were determined to succeed. 'And when the suffering is over,' he said, 'the soldiers will return to their countries with our gratitude.' Tonight, those soldiers were stunned to get a visit from their Commander in Chief, who congratulated them on a recent victory."

On ABC World News Tonight (6/13, lead story, 4:25, Raddatz, 8.78M), Bush was shown saying to the Iraqi Prime Minister, "I have expressed our country's desire to work with you. But I appreciate you recognize the fact that the future of your country is in your hands." That Bush quote appears in most print media reports this morning. USA Today (6/14, Soriano, Nichols, 2.31M), in fact, headlines its story "Bush Tells Iraq: Your Future 'Is In Your Hands.'"

The Washington Times (6/14, Curl, 90K) notes al-Maliki "expressed his country's appreciation for US efforts in Iraq, where about 2,500 troops have died in the war. 'I present our gratitude for those that have sacrificed themselves for the Iraqi people,' he said." The New York Times (6/14, Burns, Filkins, 1.19M) says "Maliki's remarks…seemed aimed at echoing Mr. Bush's themes without adding any of his own."

Biden "Encouraged" By Bush Trip. Sen. Joe Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/13) that he sees a "great opportunity" in Iraq, noting, "I think that the setting- up of their government, coupled with the fact that Zarqawi has been killed, presents an opportunity for the President to change course, set out a plan, just like he changed course in Iran. I think it's good." Biden added that he is "encouraged" by Bush's trip to Baghdad.

Biden was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/13) if Bush's trip is "propaganda." Biden said, "It could be but I hope not. I hope when he went over, he went over and talked with Maliki about what the plan is, that is that they got. Look, everyone agrees on three things. One, in order for them to be able to provide security, they have to get rid of the thugs in the military and they have to get rid of the sectarian violence and so if he went over and said look, are you on the same page with us, we're going to in fact deal with the militias and you're going to deal with us, stick with us, then that's good. The second thing everybody knows, you have to get the Sunnis to buy in, give them a piece of the action. … And the third thing is you have to keep the neighbors out and that's I hope he said look, you'd better support us when we call for a regional conference whereby the major powers sit down and say stay out. If he did those three things, then he is turning lemons into some lemonade."

Gore Says Bush Trip Was "Good Thing." Former Vice President Al Gore said on CNN's Larry King Live (6/13), "I think for security reasons it's wise for him to have done it in the way he did and I think it's valuable for him to have a chance to meet personally with this new head of the government there. Of course, the whole situation is so tragic and how we got there is not the point now. We are there and there are no real good options. But whatever options there are will be enhanced by a good working relationship between President Bush and this new leader and so I think it's a good thing."

DOJ_NMG_0033561

Lott Says Bush Trip Will Affect Dynamics In Iraq, US. Sen. Trent Lott said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/13), "I think he needed to go over there to affect the dynamics here and over there, and the fact that he went over there and met with him I think will help instill a lot of confidence in them that we're watching them, that we're going to continue to be supportive. They've got a lot more to do but there's been some good news for the last couple of weeks, and we want to build on that, we want to keep it moving."

"Deception" Surrounding Trip Preparations Noted. The "deception" and secrecy surrounding preparations for the trip are being widely noted by the media. ABC World News Tonight (6/13, lead story, 4:25, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "This trip was not only surrounded in secrecy, there was a bit of deception, as well." Bush's "CIA Director didn't know. His Attorney General, not even the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff knew where the President was headed. Only the Vice President and the Secretaries of State and Defense knew the plan." While the President "was flying, the White House press office was giving the Washington press corps a fake schedule." ABC producer John Garcia: "They were still giving out details and information about a supposed White House Rose Garden event with the President." Raddatz: "Not until he landed in Iraq did Washington know the truth." Even Iraqi Prime Minister Nourli al Malaki "had been kept in the dark until five minutes before the President arrived to meet him."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We had expected to come on the air tonight reporting on what the President had to say at his news conference at 2:30 this afternoon in the Rose Garden. It turns out, however, that was a ruse, one of many, all part of an elaborate and highly deceptive plan that resulted in the President's secret overnight trip to Baghdad."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 2, 1:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) also reported, "This trip was so secret, not even the head of the CIA knew it was happening, and he was supposed to have breakfast with the President this morning. As one former Administration official put it, this is a White House that's very good at keeping secrets."

The Washington Times (6/14, Curl, 90K) runs a similar report under the headline "Trip To Iraq Was Shrouded In Secrecy," while USA Today (6/14, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) says "Bush, known for going to bed early, retired especially early Monday night. After a long day of Iraq meetings at Camp David, Bush told Cabinet members and other aides around 7:45 p.m. that he was 'losing altitude' and headed off for a little reading before bedtime." Instead, "he ducked out of the presidential retreat in the Catoctin Mountains and boarded a helicopter for the roughly 60-mile trip to Andrews Air Force Base in suburban Maryland. By 9:07 p.m., Bush was aboard Air Force One, and the jet was airborne, bound for Iraq."

The Washington Post (6/14, A1, Finer, Abramowitz, 744K) reports, "White House counselor Dan Bartlett told reporters on the 11-hour flight to Baghdad from Andrews Air Force Base that Bush had planned the trip for months with a 'very, very close circle' of about six White House staff members."

WPost Praises Bush For Backing Iraq's Government "Correctly And Courageously." The Washington Post (6/14, A22, 744K) writes in an editorial "If Democratic leaders such as Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) had their way, almost all U.S. troops would be out of Iraq by the end of 2006 -- a blow that Mr. Maliki's government almost certainly could not survive. Mr. Bush's willingness -- at least for now -- to resist such politically expedient demands may not rescue Iraq's fledgling political system; it may be that nothing can at this point. But he is -- correctly and courageously -- using what remains of his personal political capital to give Iraqi democracy a chance."

NYTimes Says Bush Visit Aimed At Midterm Election Boost. Under the headline "Too Soon To Cheer In Baghdad," the New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) editorializes, "By now, Americans surely know the difference between a presidential publicity stunt and a true turning point in this ever-lengthening war. If they had any question about which one this was, Karl Rove provided some guidance in New Hampshire, where he delivered the campaign talking points to the Republican faithful: the Democrats could never have summoned the will to kill Mr. Zarqawi. For an administration that is supposed to be rallying a nation at war, it was a revealingly nasty, partisan and divisive moment. … After too many photo-ops aimed at giving Mr. Bush and his fellow Republicans a short-term lift in the domestic opinion polls at election time, Americans hunger more than ever for a realistic game plan for Iraq and some real progress."

More Commentary. USA Today (6/14, 2.31M) editorializes, "Bush's visit was part of a public relations offensive designed to shore up both the fledgling Iraq government and sagging support at home for the Iraqi mission." If Bush's trip "helps build support for the mission and the Iraqi government, it's time well spent."

DOJ_NMG_0033562

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) says "Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad yesterday was long overdue and, at five hours duration, too short. But it was still a trip worth making, if only to show both Americans and Iraqis that the US remains committed to seeing this war through to victory."

Iraqi, US Forces To Launch Offensive Against Insurgents. Iraqi and US forces are preparing for a new, large scale offensive in Baghdad called "Operation Forward Together." ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 2, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the new plan "involves making the capital safer by flooding the streets with mostly Iraqi troops and extending the city's curfew." ABC (Marquez) added, "Its goal, to put an to end the ever-increasing violence in the Iraqi capital, a full one-fifth of the country's population lives there. It calls for 75,000 troops, two Iraqi army divisions, two Iraqi police divisions, plus US forces. Their jobs, secure roads in and out of Baghdad. Set up checkpoints and raid insurgent hideouts. The plan will also extend by three hours, Baghdad's curfew from 9:00 PM to 6:00 AM, and ban weapons carried by civilians."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, lead story, 3:25, Palmer, 7.66M) reported the operation's aim "is to make Baghdad safe again by taking control of areas riddled with violent crime and sectarian killings and neighborhoods like this one, where the police no longer dare to go."

The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Roug, 958K), USA Today (6/14, Soriano, 2.31M), Washington Post (6/14, A18, Partlow, Shammari, 744K) and Washington Times (6/14, Behn, 90K) also report on the planned offensive.

Government Also Pondering Conditional Amnesty Offer. Meanwhile, the Financial Times (6/14, Khalaf) reports the Iraqi government is also "preparing a national reconciliation initiative that could include a conditional amnesty offer and negotiations with some armed insurgent groups to be implemented alongside a tougher security plan. … It will be combined with massive new security operations."

Insurgents Target Kirkuk Officials. The New York Times (6/14, Oppel, Al-Ansary, 1.19M) reports, "Insurgents unleashed a volley of bombings across the northern oil city of Kirkuk on Tuesday, killing more than two dozen Iraqis in morning rush hour attacks that were aimed at top police officials and security patrols, authorities there said." The attacks "came after what the local authorities described as the capture and elimination several days ago of a major terrorist cell. While Kirkuk has been the scene of a number of assassinations and other violence, the six bombings on Tuesday represented an attack of unusual coordination that local security officials suggested might have been retaliation for the arrest of the cell's members or intended as a signal that the insurgency in the city remained strong."

Rumsfeld, Rice, Brief Lawmakers On Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Bash) reported that after meetings with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "Republican senators and Democrats came out with very different views on what they heard." Republicans "say they heard signs of progress from members of the administration talking to them. But Democrats say that they simply didn't hear anything new."

The Financial Times (6/14, Dinmore) also reports "Democrats appeared unimpressed. Senator Jack Reed said he had heard 'nothing remarkably new' in the classified briefing." And Sen. Joseph Biden "said he hoped Mr Bush's trip to Baghdad would lead to a 'fundamental change in policy' but that he feared the president would rely on more of the same."

Defense Phase Of Saddam Trial Ends. The APP (6/13) reports, "The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's trial declared an end to the defense phase of the proceedings on Tuesday, shrugging off protests from the former Iraqi leader's lawyers that they have not had a fair chance to present their case and want to put more witnesses on the stand." The trial, "which has lasted nearly eight months, moves into closing arguments, with the prosecution starting on Monday, followed by the defense on July 10"

US To Probe Video Of Marine Making Light Of Killing Iraqi Family. The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Spiegel, 958K) reports, "The US Marine Corps is trying to find out who is behind a video posted on the Internet that appears to show a Marine performing a song that makes light of killing an Iraqi family. The four-minute video, posted anonymously on the Web site YouTube, shows the singer playing a song he calls 'Hadji Girl' in which he tells of falling in love with an Iraqi, only to be fired upon by her father and brother with automatic weapons." The Times adds, "As an unseen audience laughs and cheers, the performer -- dressed in a green T-shirt and what appears to be camouflage pants -- singing about using 'her little sister' as a shield against his attackers."

DOJ_NMG_0033563

Gore Says Rumsfeld Should Resign. During an interview dealing with many topics on CNN's Larry King Live (6/13, 9:32 p.m.), host King asked Al Gore, "Should Rumsfeld resign?" Gore replied, "Oh, sure. Well, I say it as a throwaway line. Yes, he should. I publicly called for his resignation after the Abu Ghraib tragedy. And I think that when we were talking earlier about the difficult options we have to get our troops home quickly and to deal with whatever slim chances -- and I hope they're not slim -- but whatever chances there are for them to actually make it in this transition."

Injured ABC Anchor Visits Newsroom. ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 11, 1:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And finally, tonight, many of you who watch this broadcast, and even many who don't, have been kind enough in recent weeks to inquire about the welfare of Bob Woodruff. Bob, you'll recall, was seriously injured when he was reporting for this broadcast. Doing what he knew and loved. And for the first time since his injuries, he came back to the newsroom today, back to this studio." Woodruff: "Missed you all. Missed you all." Gibson: "As you might expect, he attracted a crowd." ABC News President David Westin: "So the plan was not to mob you, right? This is beautifully executed."

CBS Soundman Killed In Iraq Buried In London. The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 10, 1:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Yesterday, we said goodbye to CBS News cameraman Paul Douglas. Today in London, friends and family said goodbye to sound man James Brolan. Douglas and Brolan died two weeks ago in the car bomb blast that also left our correspondent, Kimberly Dozier, critically wounded. A standing room only crowd of 500 joined Brolan's wife, son, and daughter for a service filled with tears and laughter and music."

Iraqis Continue "Exodus" To Syria, Jordan. The New York Times (6/14, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports, "In one of the first comprehensive tallies of Iraqis fleeing Iraq since the American-led invasion, an American refugee advocacy group has counted 644,500 Iraqi refugees in Syria and Jordan in 2005." The figure, provided by the United States Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, "a nongovernmental group based in Washington, is equal to about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population, and substantiates the overwhelming evidence of an exodus that has been accumulating in Iraqi passport offices and airline waiting rooms in recent months." The committee "has counted Iraqi refugees in the past, but the most recent figure is by far the largest to date — more than triple the 213,000 recorded in 2004 — and the first big surge since the American invasion. At first, Iraqis living abroad began returning home. But as the war became increasingly deadly, more Iraqis chose to leave."

US-Led Coalition To Launch Offensive Against Taliban. USA Today (6/14, 2.31M) reports, "The US-led coalition in Afghanistan plans to unleash more than 11,000 troops Thursday in the biggest offensive since the fall of the Taliban in 2001." Maj. Gen. Benjamin "Freakley, US operational commander, said Operation Mountain Thrust is a push by US, British, Canadian and Afghan troops against Taliban fighters in four volatile provinces: Kandahar, Helmand, Zabul and Uruzgan."

Administration Announces Nominee For Marine Commandant. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, A2, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration announced the nomination of Lt. Gen. James Conway to take over the Marine Corps at a time when the Corps is dealing with the alleged killing of civilians by American soldiers in Haditha, Iraq." Gen. Conway, who "served as the top Marine commander in Iraq in 2003 and 2004, has worked closely with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld over the past two years. He hasn't shied away from publicly criticizing aspects of how the war has been handled."

The New York Times (6/14, Shanker, 1.19M) reports, "Pentagon and Marine Corps officials said the timing of the announcement on Tuesday was unrelated to investigations that marines might have killed 24 civilians without provocation in Haditha, in restive Anbar Province."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC To Crack Down On Backdating Of Stock Options. The Washington Post (6/14, D1, Day) reports, "Federal regulators plan to crack down on an increasingly popular corporate practice that boosts executive compensation by guaranteeing profits on stock option awards." The Post continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is to issue a statement, possibly as early as next month, clarifying the agency's view of when current law allows backdating of stock options -- picking a date when the stock was at a low point to be the date of the award, thereby immediately guaranteeing a profit. Companies need the permission of directors, consistent with company policy, and full disclosure to investors, including properly counting the added costs against earnings. … The action stems from a widening federal probe by the SEC and the Justice Department into whether several dozen companies backdated stock options illegally, making them more valuable by changing the date on which they were said to have been issued without telling shareholders and without recording the additional compensation cost as an expense against the bottom line."

DOJ_NMG_0033564

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Scannell) reports, "SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in an interview that the executive-compensation rule 'will almost certainly address options backdating explicitly.' He added: 'It is altogether possible ... that there will be additional disclosure requirements.'" The Journal adds, "In conjunction with the rule, Mr. Cox said the SEC would issue guidance 'saying when it is appropriate or not appropriate for a company to grant options while in possession of material nonpublic information when it comes to "spring loading,"' a practice that involves granting options ahead of good news. … 'I don't want to rule anything out in terms of the final rule and guidance, because they're not finished yet,' he said, adding that he expects the process to be completed before the end of the summer."

Grassley Urges DOJ Action On Backdating. Bloomberg (6/14) reports, "Executives guilty of manipulating their stock option grants should be prosecuted to the fullest extent possible, Senator Charles E. Grassley, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said yesterday. … 'I hope the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are taking a hard look at this practice,' Mr. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said in a statement yesterday. … 'I've asked the Justice Department to let me know whether the tax laws on the books are adequate to rein in and prosecute stock option backdating. If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up.'" Bloomberg adds, "At a Senate hearing on corporate tax issues, Mr. Grassley asked Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general of the Justice Department's tax division, to outline actions federal prosecutors are taking against companies accused of manipulating stock option grants to benefit executives."

The Financial Times (6/14, Grant) reports, "The Department of Justice on Tuesday said it considered allegations that dozens of US companies might have improperly backdated stock options 'very serious', as another company said it was under investigation. … More than 40 companies, mostly in the technology sector, are the subject of probes by the US attorneys or the Securities and Exchange Commission – or both – after it emerged that stock options were retroactively awarded to executives to dates that immediately preceded a rise in the company's share price." The Times adds, "Investigations are understood to be focused on whether the backdating of stock options was done without proper disclosure to shareholders, and whether or not they were properly 'expensed' for tax purposes. … 'The department considers allegations of this nature to be very serious,' Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney-general at the department's tax division, told a Senate finance committee hearing. … Ms O'Connor said criminal penalties applicable included 25 years in jail and a $250,000 fine for securities fraud."

MarketWatch (6/14, Watts) reports that O'Connor "said that the department is investigating allegations in 'several districts around the country' that some option grants were backdated to provide executives lower exercise prices. O'Connor didn't discuss any individual investigations. … Authorities also are looking into whether other potentially illegal practices were used to price the options at a low-dollar amount, such as awarding options based on 'inside' information about a pending event that would subsequently send the stock price higher, she added. … 'Such conduct would be a fraud on the market; it would boost executives' compensation at the expense of other investors,' O'Connor told the committee." MarketWatch adds, "If the probes reveal criminal behavior, prosecutors could bring charges including securities fraud, mail fraud, wire fraud and various tax-related charges against individuals and corporations, she said. Such charges carry the potential for prison time and hefty fines."

Pension Funds Suing Companies Amid Stock Options Probe. USA Today (6/14) reports, "Pension funds in the USA, Europe and Australia have begun suing dozens of companies under investigation in the widening scandal over illegally backdated stock options." USA continues, "Darren Robbins, an attorney at the Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins law firm in San Diego, told the Associated Press that the pension funds are 'completely beside themselves and outraged over the self-dealing that has gone on.'" USA adds, "In one lawsuit, security software maker McAfee was sued by the Heavy & General Laborers' Pension and Annuity Funds, and technology firm Juniper Networks was sued by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds, according to the Financial Times. … The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are looking at about 40 U.S. companies for suspected illegal backdating of stock options, according to the companies' SEC filings and media reports."

DOJ_NMG_0033565

Enron Broadband Jurors Say They Were Pressured To Convict. The AP (6/14, Lozano) reports, "Lawyers for a former Enron Corp. broadband executive found guilty last month on fraud and conspiracy charges have asked for a new trial after several jurors said they felt pressured to convict." The AP continues, "Affidavits by two jurors and two alternate jurors were part of a 90-page motion by attorneys for former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, who was convicted on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. The same jury acquitted former in-house accountant Michael Krautz of the same charges." The AP adds, "In their affidavits, the jurors said they felt that they had been instructed by U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore and pressured by other jurors to reach a unanimous verdict and avoid a hung jury, even though they believed that Howard was innocent. … A trial last year against Howard, Krautz and three other broadband executives ended with a hung jury. Howard and Krautz were the first to be retried. … 'There was just so much pressure to change my vote that I felt like we had to compromise and give in to the majority because I felt like there was no other choice,' juror Anne Marie Campbell said in her affidavit."

Two Utilities To Pay $50 Million In Enron Settlement. The New York Times (6/14, Johnston) reports, "Two small utilities are set to pay more than $50 million to Enron for electricity that they agreed to buy but that Enron will never deliver, under terms of a settlement that raises larger issues." The Times continues, "As part of the settlement, which may be approved as early as today, the staff of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission will not investigate fraud claims against Enron for manipulating electricity prices, critics say. They added that the settlement might allow the destruction of evidence crucial to proving that Enron cheated customers and would prevent others from resolving their fraud claims." The Times adds, "Brian Lee, a commission spokesman, said the criticisms were ill-informed and baseless. He said the settlement did not prevent the handful of utilities and customers who had to yet to resolve their fraud claims to continue pursuing their complaints before the commission. … Enron, which is in bankruptcy proceedings, made $1.6 billion in profits from what the commission's staff has testified was 'unjust and unreasonable' pricing. The commission ruled earlier that Enron could be forced to give up all its profits since 1997 because of its manipulations. … Enron said that under terms of its contracts with the two utilities, it was owed more than $170 million whether or not the power was delivered. The utilities said that they did not owe anything but decided to pay the smaller amount to remove a big financial risk from their books."

White House Increases Pressure On Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Solomon, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports the Bush Administration, "seeking to ratchet up pressure on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and propel legislation stalled on Capitol Hill, threatened to tighten control over the mortgage giants on its own and to ponder using its authority to limit their growth." In a "move seen as a warning that the administration may act on its own if Congress doesn't, the Treasury said it will review the process it uses to approve requests by the mortgage companies to issue debt. The administration is pressing Congress to alter the law to limit the size of the portfolios of mortgages and mortgage-backed securities that the two stockholder-owned, government-chartered companies hold." Meanwhile, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Alphonso Jackson "said that until Congress tightens regulation of the companies, he intends to use existing powers to 'increase the transparency' of the companies to make sure their investments are in line with their mission of supporting the housing market."

The Washington Post (6/14, D1, Shin, 744K) reports the Bush Administration announced "Cabinet-level studies of the companies' holdings and whether they can be reined in using existing law and regulatory powers." Legislation to "slow the companies' growth and narrow their activities began moving through Congress last year in response to multibillion-dollar accounting scandals, but it is stalled in the Senate." Treasury Undersecretary Randal K. Quarles "said his agency was examining whether it had the authority to limit Fannie and Freddie's ability to sell debt and, by extension, their ability to grow." Announcement "of the two studies follows Fannie's agreement to pay $400 million in fines to settle charges that its executives manipulated earnings to trigger higher bonus payments."

DOJ_NMG_0033566

The AP (6/14, Gordon) reports, "The administration has long been critical of the two companies, and officials have pointed to the accounting scandals to bolster their case that the massive mortgage portfolios are improperly managed and pose a risk to the financial system." The AP adds, "On Tuesday, two officials - Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson and Randal Quarles, Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance - disclosed the new reviews by their departments in separate appearances before groups in Washington. … Quarles said he had directed Treasury staff to review the department's process for approving the massive mortgage-related debt issued by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. … Some Treasury officials have taken the view in recent years that the department has the authority to limit that debt."

WSJournal Says Administration Should Press Senate To Pass Shelby Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) says in an editorial that the Treasury and HUD actions "ought to send a message to Congress, which has been acting as if it wants the entire subject to go away. In the Senate, the question is why the Republican leadership has not heeded the very damaging report on Fannie from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight to force a vote on Banking Chairman Richard Shelby's strong reform bill. Ofheo revealed that Fannie's top executives enriched themselves over a period of years through dubious accounting. Do Senators support reform of a corrupted and dangerous institution whose finances remain a black box even today, or are they for the status quo?"

SEC Opens Mutual Fund Rules For Comment. The New York Times/Bloomberg (6/14) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is inviting public comment on the cost of mutual fund governance rules set aside by a federal court in April, a move that leaves open the possibility of reviving or revising them." Bloomberg continues, "The agency will accept comment until Aug. 21 on the cost issue and on 'any issue related to the underlying purpose' of the rules, the S.E.C. said in a statement yesterday." Bloomberg adds, "The rules would require that the chairman and three-quarters of the directors of mutual funds be independent from management. They were adopted on a 3-2 vote under William H. Donaldson, the agency's former chairman. … The United States Chamber of Commerce successfully challenged the requirements in a lawsuit. On April 7, a federal appeals court said the S.E.C. had not followed its own procedures in adopting the rules. The court gave the agency 90 days to correct its process. … The five-member commission voted unanimously to solicit the new round of comment, the S.E.C. said in yesterday's statement. Commissioners are split on whether ultimately to kill the rule or keep it."

SEC Nears Naming Of Accounting Oversight Board Head. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Reilly) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is close to naming a new chairman for the body that regulates accounting firms and has settled on a shortlist of three candidates for that post, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The appointment of a new chairman for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, or PCAOB, would end a regulatory uncertainty that has hung over the accounting world since the agency's first chairman, William McDonough, stepped down late last year. It also would mark one of the most significant appointments to be made by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox since he took over last year as head of the securities-market regulator." The Journal adds, "The SEC appoints PCAOB members but does so in consultation with the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve, and the shortlist of candidates reflects this relationship, the people familiar with the matter said. … The candidates for the PCAOB post include William Gradison, 77 years old, who has served as acting chairman since last December. A former nine-term Republican congressman from Ohio, Mr. Gradison has indicated an interest in taking the post permanently, according to people familiar with the matter. If he doesn't get the nod, Mr. Gradison would continue serving as a board member. The chairman's position pays $615,000 a year, according to the PCAOB, while board members make $500,000. … Another contender is Jerome H. Powell, 53, a former Treasury Department official who served as assistant secretary for domestic finance and undersecretary for finance in the administration of the first President Bush. Until last year, Mr. Powell was also an executive with private-equity firm The Carlyle Group. … The third candidate is Mark W. Olson, 63, a Federal Reserve Board governor and former Ernst & Young LLP partner who has also served as staff director of a Senate subcommittee overseeing the SEC, accounting issues and the insurance industry."

DOJ_NMG_0033567

Cooperative Accounting Regulation Urged. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/14), Neil Lerner, global head of regulatory issues for KPMG LLP, writes, "The last few weeks have provided clear reminders, if any were needed, that prosecutors are keen to crack down on corporate fraud. We have seen Jeff Skilling and Ken Lay convicted of multiple charges related to the Enron collapse and likely to face long jail terms. We have also seen Daewoo motor company founder Kim Woo-Choong sentenced to 10 years in prison for embezzlement and accounting fraud. … Part of this scrutiny of business has landed on auditors. Clearly the work of auditors is a critical safeguard against corporate fraud. Consequently, the oversight and inspection of their work must be effective, too. However, getting effective, practical regulation in place has proved to be a tall order for government. And this problem is compounded by the fact that auditors -- and the companies they work with -- operate around the globe these days. The stakes are high, as we saw when Enron's outside auditing firm, Arthur Andersen, went out of business under the weight of prosecution." Lerner adds, "Legislators have been busy on this front, too. The U.K. government is proposing a new offense for auditors if they 'knowingly or recklessly' sign off misleading, false or deceptive information. … It would be a pity if the effectiveness of these efforts to improve corporate governance and the integrity of financial reporting was undermined by a spaghetti junction of overlapping regimes for monitoring the work of auditors. But that is what we are in danger of seeing when it comes to oversight of auditors working for the myriad companies that are listed in more than one jurisdiction." Lerner concludes, "The challenge is to produce a regulatory system that is rigorous and effective but which allows business to get on with its job and produce results. We have seen this challenge before with Sarbanes-Oxley and other regulation. And as the world's borders continue to blur and commerce becomes ever more global, we no doubt will see it again."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Won't Charge Rove In CIA Leak Investigation. The Washington Post (6/14, A1, Vandehei) reports, "White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove will not be indicted in the CIA leak investigation, his attorney announced yesterday, a decision that signals that a special prosecutor's probe is unlikely to threaten any other Bush administration officials." The Post continues, "Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald told Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, in a short letter delivered Monday afternoon that he 'does not anticipate seeking charges' against Rove in the case, Luskin said. Rove was told about 4 p.m. while aboard a Southwest Airlines flight en route to a campaign speech in New Hampshire, but he waited until early yesterday morning to publicly reveal the news." The Post adds, "The announcement ends months of speculation about Rove's legal future and frees the architect of President Bush's presidential victories to resume his central White House role without the threat of criminal charges hanging over him. Rove, who spent countless hours preparing for five grand jury appearances in the case and sharpening his defense, was 'delighted, obviously,' Luskin said. 'We've always said he did everything he could to cooperate' with the prosecutor, he added. … 'It's a chapter that has ended,' Bush told reporters during his trip back from Iraq. The president said he thinks Fitzgerald 'has conducted his investigation in a dignified way.'"

The New York Times (6/14, Johnston, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports the decision "not to bring charges against Karl Rove in the C.I.A. leak case followed months of intense behind-the-scenes maneuvering between the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Rove's lawyer, lawyers in the case said." The move "frees Mr. Rove in his role as Mr. Bush's top strategist during midterm elections this year." A spokesman "for Mr. Rove's legal team, Mark Corallo, said that Mr. Rove had made no deals to cooperate with the prosecution in any way, and that the decision was based purely on Mr. Fitzgerald's findings."

The AP (6/14, Locy) reports, "Aboard Air Force One Tuesday, President Bush praised Fitzgerald. 'It's a chapter that has ended,' Bush said. 'Fitzgerald is a very thorough person. I think he's conducted his investigation in a dignified way.'" Bush "said White House officials would remain mum about the leak and the results of the investigation."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 3, 1:05, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "It's very good news and very important news for the White House, Bob. Not only is Karl Rove a top presidential adviser, somebody who's known the President since the old Texas days, but he's also the White House point man on the upcoming 2006 midterm elections." The

DOJ_NMG_0033568

Washington Times (6/14, Seper, Dinan, 90K) notes that yesterday, Rove "emerged from the Eisenhower Executive Office Building several times yesterday in view of photographers staked out on the White House lawn, waving and smiling at them. 'Now Karl can be Karl,' said one senior administration official."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 4, 2:25, Myers, 9.87M) reported Rove was "described as elated and relieved. Rove's team said he got the good news last night just before a fiery political speech in New Hampshire hammering Democrats on the Iraq war." Karl Rove: "They are wrong and profoundly wrong in their approach." Myers: "The chairman of the Republican Party says Democrats owe Rove an apology." Ken Mehlman, Republican National Committee Chair: "People that prejudged his guilt were wrong to, were wrong to say that he ought to have his security clearance taken away, that he ought to lose his job." Mehlman, asked on Comedy Central's The Daily Show with Jon Stewart (6/13) why Rove was not indicted, said, "I think the prosecutor looked at it and decide add crime wasn't committed. … I think we ought to trust his judgment."

ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 5, 2:15, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "The investigation has already resulted in one indictment, former White House adviser Scooter Libby. And some Democrats and some in the media wrongly predicted Rove would be next." David Shuster, MSNBC, May 8: "I am convinced that Karl Rove will, in fact, be indicted." Tapper: "Today, Democrats said that while Rove may not have violated the letter of the law, he may have violated a sacred trust." Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean: "Karl Rove does not belong in the White House. He has done something that is counter to the interest of American national security. And I can't believe the President of the United States can't recognize that." Tapper: "Tonight, a senior adviser to the White House tells ABC News, with the death of Zarqawi and Rove exonerated, it's a welcome week of solid good news for the Administration."

Fox News' Special Report (6/13, Hume) reported, "There had long been doubt special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald could make a case against Rove who cooperated fully, testifying five times in the investigation. Until now Fitzgerald refused to fully rule out further action against Rove."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Blitzer) reported, "The Wilsons suggest some other kind of legal action may be taken against Rove. … Their lawyer issued a statement today saying this, 'The day still may come when Mr. Rove and others are called to account in a court of law for their attacks on the Wilsons.'" USA Today (6/14, Jackson, 2.31M) reports, "Rove may still have legal issues surrounding the case." Amb. Wilson "has said he may file a civil suit against Rove and other administration figures."

The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Neuman, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "The announcement seemed only to ignite partisan fires over corruption and secrecy. Saying the White House was pleased, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said, 'Karl is as he has been throughout the process -- fully focused on the task at hand: crafting and building support for the president's agenda.'" But Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean "was having none of it. 'His real sin…is leaking the name of an intelligence operative during a time of war,' Dean said on NBC's 'Today' program. 'He doesn't belong in the White House.'"

The Washington Post (6/14, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "Within hours of hearing yesterday morning that…Rove wouldn't be prosecuted in the CIA leak case, Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), the chief of the Democrats' campaign to retake the Senate, hurried to the press gallery to blunt the damage." But "however fervently Schumer wished away Bush's good news, Republicans sensed a shift in momentum."

Bloomberg (6/14, Keil) reports, "Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman said on CNN that Democrats engaged in a 'rush to judgment' in trying to tie Rove to the disclosure of the Central Intelligence Agency operative's identity. He said Dean and other Democratic leaders owe Rove an apology. … 'It's pretty clear that Karl Rove not only did nothing wrong, but he did everything right in terms of cooperating with this investigation,' Mehlman said."

Luskin, Statements To FBI Credited With Keeping Rove From Being Indicted. In an analysis piece titled "Nonindictment Of Rove Owes Much To Tactics," the Wall Street Journal (6/14, Squeo, 2.11M) reports "even some who wanted to see Karl Rove indicted credit the skillful lawyering by attorney Robert Luskin and his open-door strategy with the prosecution and the press alike with convincing the grand jury of his innocence. Indeed, Mr. Luskin had Mr. Rove appear before the grand jury in the case repeatedly to explain that what had appeared to be a misstatement was in fact a lapse of memory."

The AP (6/14, Yost) reports, "In 2003, while Rove allowed the White House to tell the news media that he had no role in leaking Valerie Plame's CIA identity, the presidential aide was secretly telling the FBI the truth. It's now known that Rove had discussed Plame's CIA employment with conservative columnist Robert Novak, who exposed her identity less than a week later, citing two unidentified senior administration officials." Rove's "truth-telling to the FBI saved him from indictment."

DOJ_NMG_0033569

Fitzgerald Probe Seen As Unlikely To Lead To Further Indictments. CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Arena) also said, "It seems the only question remaining is whether the original leaker will be charged with committing a crime. A source close to the investigation says that it's increasingly likely the answer is no."

The Washington Post (6/14, A1, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "A source briefed on the case said that the activities of Vice President Cheney and his aides were a key focus of the investigation, and that Cheney was not considered a target or primary subject of the investigation and is not likely to become one." There are "no other outstanding issues to be investigated, the source said, though new ones could emerge."

The Legal Times (6/14, Schwartz) reports, "Legal experts say the decision may signal an end to Fitzgerald's investigation into whether government officials intentionally leaked classified information -- the name of CIA operative Valerie Plame -- to the media." The Times adds, "Fitzgerald's decision raises questions over what, if any, role Rove may play in Libby's upcoming trial, now scheduled for early next year. Former federal prosecutor Peter Henning, now a professor at Wayne State University, says it is possible that Rove could be called as a witness, but 'it's not clear how helpful Rove will be for one side or the other.'"

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) editorializes, "So much for having Karl Rove 'frog-marched' out of the White House 'in handcuffs.' That's the fate Democratic partisan Joe Wilson once predicted for President Bush's political guru, and yesterday his hope and accusations vanished like fog on the Potomac. … The mystery is why Mr. Fitzgerald kept Mr. Rove twisting in the wind for so long." The Journal adds that "what we are left with is a three-year political spectacle that has kept the White House under siege during a war, weakened or pushed out of office some of its most important aides, and made liberal celebrities of Mr. Wilson and his wife. And to what public purpose? A prosecutor with more wisdom than Mr. Fitzgerald would have long ago understood he was injecting himself into a political brawl, closed his case and left the outcome to the voters."

DOJ Challenges House Leaders On Searches. The AP (6/14, Sherman) reports, "House leaders who called the late-night search of Rep. William Jefferson's office unconstitutional seek special treatment for lawmakers that would allow them to block criminal investigations, the Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Democratic and Republican leaders essentially are calling for a member of Congress to be given notice of a search and to be allowed to be present for it, rights 'that are not available to any other person' under constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures, government lawyers said in a 27-page court filing." The AP adds, "If the House leaders have their way, lawmakers also would be able to determine what documents do not have to be turned over to investigators or cannot be used in prosecution, the department said. In that circumstance, 'a member of Congress could easily thwart a criminal investigation by unilaterally declaring certain documents to be privileged,' the government said." The AP notes, "House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, Majority Leader John Boehner, Republican Whip Roy Blunt and Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer last week asked a federal judge to declare unconstitutional the search of Jefferson's office May 20-21. Such a move could undermine part of a lengthy bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat. … The leaders said the search was heavy-handed and threatened the balance of power in government. But they also acknowledged that the FBI has every right to investigate Jefferson. … Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who approved the warrant, has scheduled a hearing Friday."

Judge Postpones Safavian Jury Deliberations Due To Misconduct Allegation. The AP (6/14, Sniffen) reports, "A federal court jury in the first trial of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was sent home four hours after beginning deliberations Tuesday so the judge could consider whether to dismiss a juror for misconduct." The AP continues, "The jury of 10 women and two men had selected a foreperson but had not even received their written copies of jury instructions nor begun any substantive deliberations when the problem arose. … Prosecutors argued that a female juror should be dismissed because she disregarded the judge's instructions on several occasions and told other jurors Tuesday she had discussed the costs of a golf trip to Scotland with her father. Safavian's expenses for the August 2002 trip arranged by Abramoff have been an issue in trial testimony." The AP adds, "The defense opposed replacing the juror with an alternate and said U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman should just give jurors a stiff warning to stop all outside discussions. … U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman, who questioned the juror, decided he wanted to study similar cases before ruling on the government's dismissal motion. He said he would rule Wednesday morning, and asked the jury to return then. … He also denied the jury's request for a dictionary and told the jurors that if they needed definitions or had other questions to ask him by note."

DOJ_NMG_0033570

Convicted "Mafia Cops" Seek Reversals For Inadequate Representation. The AP (6/14, McShane) reports, "Wearing sharply tailored suits and sharing 'Godfather'-style kisses in the courtroom, attorneys Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes appeared a formidable defense team for two ex-New York Police Department detectives accused of moonlighting as hit men for the mob. … Now, two months after Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were convicted of eight slayings, the former cops are charging that their lawyers botched the case - and asking a federal judge to throw out the verdict." The AP continues, "Both Cutler and Hayes were disappointed by the allegations from their one-time clients, saying Eppolito and Caracappa were desperate men motivated by the life sentences awaiting them if their appeal fails. … 'I was just so personally offended,' Cutler said. 'One day you're begged to come in, and the next day you're knocked by the client, who to me is delusional in a certain respect. He's certainly ungrateful and shameless.'" The AP adds, "The defendants' new lawyers were unsparing in their assessment of their predecessors. … 'Hayes' indifference to Mr. Caracappa's defense, both in terms of preparation and understanding, was apparent throughout the case,' Daniel Nobel, who now represents Caracappa, said in court papers. … Joseph Bondy, the new attorney for Eppolito, said Cutler 'spent the majority of Mr. Eppolito's closing argument speaking about himself, including that he lost over 14 pounds during trial, loved Brooklyn as a borough of bridges and tunnels, and was an admirer of the great Indian Chief Crazy Horse.' … A hearing is set for June 23 on the defendants' allegations of ineffective counsel."

Former Chicago City Clerk Sentenced To 2 Years In Prison. The Chicago Tribune (6/14, Coen) reports, "James Laski at times dabbed tears from his eyes as a federal judge sentenced the former Chicago city clerk to 2 years in prison for taking nearly $50,000 in bribes to steer city business to trucking companies run by his friends. Laski is the highest-ranking official to be charged in the federal investigation of the scandal-ridden Hired Truck Program." Before his sentencing, Laski told the court, "After 26 years in government service, I have thrown everything away for the sum of $48,000," but "the comment brought a rebuke from U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle that Laski was oversimplifying the case. Norgle said Laski's conduct was the kind of breach of trust that saps the faith of ordinary citizens in their government." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/14, Korecki) adds, "Norgle could have given Laski up to 37 months but took into account Laski's family situation and his acceptance of responsibility for his crimes." The Sun-Times also notes that Laski "is the highest-ranking public official convicted in the Hired Truck scandal."

Top Daley Administration Lawyer Testifies At Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (6/14, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "The top lawyer in Mayor Richard Daley's administration told a federal jury Tuesday that she was unaware of any 'irregularities' in city hiring until after the FBI raided the mayor's office last year. Testifying against the mayor's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, Corporation Counsel Mara Georges also said she did not know before the April 2005 raid that officials in the mayor's office kept lists of politically connected job seekers." The Tribune notes, "Prosecutors charge that the office dictated who received city jobs that were supposed to be filled without regard to applicants' political ties. But when Georges discussed Intergovernmental Affairs' role in hiring with Sorich" and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy, "neither mentioned to her that they participated in filling positions covered by the Shakman decree, she said. … Georges also testified that she had discussions with McCarthy about a color-coded list of applicants for city truck driver jobs that FBI agents found in city offices," and she "said McCarthy told her the list helped Intergovernmental Affairs keep an eye on Sanchez, a leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization."

Mississippi County Official Pleads Not Guilty To Katrina Kickback Charges. The Bolivar Commercial (6/14, Robinette) reports, "Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown's voice was loud and clear as he pleaded not guilty to two felony charges" Tuesday. Brown "was arrested on June 6 for receiving and accepting kickbacks as well as witness tampering by FBI agents at his office. The kickbacks allegedly came from Federal Emergency Management Agency funds for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts in the county. His trial is set for July 17." Defense attorney Douglas Greene said, "He is a fall guy in a political power play and there's a lot more to be revealed later on." The AP (6/14) also notes that Brown "was arrested June 6 by FBI agents. He was later released on $20,000 bond. … On Monday, Brown was suspended without pay by the Bolivar County Board of Supervisors pending a determination by the state attorney general's office."

DOJ_NMG_0033571

California Man Pleads Guilty To Racketeering In Israel Cartel Case. The AP (6/14, Marquez) reports, "A reputed enforcer for a notorious Israeli cartel decided to take a plea deal Tuesday in the midst of his federal trial - after a top-ranking member of the group testified against him, officials said." The AP continues, "Hai Waknine - a 35 year-old Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, California, and describes himself as a businessman - pleaded guilty to a single racketeering charge, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Sleisenger. Under a deal with the government, he will be sentenced to nine years in prison, Sleisenger said." The AP adds, "Waknine had faced 46 counts of racketeering, extortion, conspiracy, and other charges stemming from an alleged scheme to hide money embezzled from an Israeli bank by loaning it out in Miami and Los Angeles. Waknine was accused of threatening violence to get debtors to pay up. … The turnabout came shortly after a morning of testimony from Gabi Benharosh, a powerful member of an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group. Authorities say the syndicate has enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe, California, Nevada and elsewhere in the U.S." The AP notes, "Benharosh told jurors Waknine had helped devise the scheme and collect the money, Sleisenger said. That conflicted with the defense's argument that Waknine acted under duress and was merely doing Benharosh's bidding."

Duke Basketball Star Charged With Drunk Driving. The Washington Post/AP (6/14, E2) reports, "Duke basketball star J.J. Redick was arrested early yesterday in Durham, N.C., on charges of drunken driving, another blow to a school shaken by a lacrosse scandal." The AP continues, "Redick, the Associated Press player of the year, also was charged with unlawful use of highways for making an illegal U-turn. … Redick, who has a Virginia driver's license, lost his driving privileges in North Carolina for 30 days, police spokeswoman Kammie Michael said." The AP adds, "Redick, 21, was released on $1,000 bond shortly after being taken before a Durham County magistrate. He is to appear in court July 17. The arresting officer wrote in his report that Redick had 'very glassy eyes, strong odor of alcohol coming from breath.' … Redick had a blood-alcohol level of 0.11 percent. The legal limit for drivers in North Carolina is 0.08."

Antigua Challenges US Online Gaming Laws. The Financial Times (6/14, Williams) reports, "The tiny Caribbean island state of Antigua and Barbuda has taken the first steps to haul the US back before the world trade court in a long-running dispute over internet gambling." The Times continues, "Antigua, which has a population of 68,000, says Washington has failed to comply with a World Trade Organisation ruling last year that US internet gambling laws discriminate against foreign suppliers. As a result, Antigua claims to have lost a large chunk of the rapidly growing offshore gaming business it has been building to diversify its economy away from tourism. US gamblers are estimated to account for about half the $12bn global internet gaming market." The Times adds, "This week, Antigua requested meetings with the US, a prelude to the establishment of a WTO panel to judge compliance. If, after any appeals, the WTO finds the US still in breach of fair trade rules Antigua can ask for permission to retaliate. 'Obviously, we are going to have to be a bit creative in order to come up with something to motivate the Americans,[Mark Mendel, a US lawyer advising Antigua, said after the April 3 2006 deadline set for US compliance expired. … Antigua is especially aggrieved because the US has taken no action to implement the WTO ruling, claiming - on the basis of an interpretive statement by the justice department - that its laws are already in compliance. … 'Antigua and Barbuda does not believe that a simple restatement of a legal position taken by a party to a dispute . . . can be considered a [compliance] measure,' Antigua says in its consultation request. … The US argues it does not discriminate against foreign suppliers of internet gambling services because domestic suppliers are equally restricted in offering services across state boundaries."

DOJ_NMG_0033572

Patrick Kennedy Pleads Guilty To Driving While Impaired. NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 7, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported Rep. Patrick Kennedy "pleaded guilty today to a charge of driving under the influence of prescription drugs back when he crashed his car on Capitol Hill last month in the middle of the night. A judge in Washington, DC, gave him a 10-day suspended jail sentence and one year of probation and suspended his driving license for six months." Kennedy "again said he takes full responsibility for his actions."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Blitzer) reported Kennedy "says he's suffering another consequence for his drug-induced car crash on Capitol Hill." Kennedy "says he's still running for re-election in Rhode Island despite his guilty plea and recent ordeal."

The Washington Post (6/14, A5, Cauvin) reports, "Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy, who lost control of his car near the Capitol last month in what he says was a drug-induced stupor, pleaded guilty yesterday to driving under the influence of prescription medication and could face 10 days in jail if he fails to comply with a long list of court-imposed conditions." The Post continues, "Placed on probation for a year, Kennedy (D-R.I.) must meet monthly with the psychiatrist overseeing his after-care treatment and attend weekly meetings of a recovery group and Alcoholics Anonymous. Kennedy also must submit to random drug screening and meet regularly with a psychiatrist to monitor his mood and anxiety and use of mental health medications. … 'I've always said that I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions,' Kennedy said in a brief statement outside the D.C. courthouse. 'Today in court, I did just that. I accepted the consequences of my actions.'" The Post notes, "The plea agreement, which was in the works when Kennedy returned from a month-long stay at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, was presented yesterday afternoon in D.C. Superior Court. Earlier in the day, Kennedy was charged with driving under the influence, reckless driving, and driving without a permit. The latter two charges were dropped in return for the guilty plea."

The New York Times (6/14, Stout) reports, "Judge Melendez said that Mr. Kennedy would serve 10 days in jail if he violated his probation and that he must continue drug treatment. The judge also fined the congressman $350, of which $250 will go to the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington and the remaining $100 to a crime victims' fund." The Times adds, "The congressman has said that he has no memory of driving his car into a security barrier around 3 a.m., and that he had not been drinking beforehand, even though the initial police report listed alcohol as a factor in the accident. Rather, Mr. Kennedy has said, he was under the influence of prescription anti-nausea and sleep medications, which he had taken at the 'prescribed amount.'"

The AP (6/14, Miga) reports, "Kennedy was joined in court by Rep. Jim Ramstad, R-Minn., who is his sponsor in Alcoholics Anonymous." Similar stories appear in many newspapers this morning, among them Roll Call (6/14, McArdle), The Hill (6/14, Kucinich), Los Angeles Times (6/14, Neuman, 958K) and Chicago Tribune (6/14, Neuman, 643K).

FBI Web Site Seeks Public Corruption Tips. Fox News (6/14) reports, "Even with stories about public corruption probes flooding the morning papers, Internet and cable news airwaves, the FBI's new Web site for individuals to report malfeasance and just plain bad behavior hasn't made splashy headlines. … But the site, reportcorruption.fbi.gov, is up and running and the G-Men are paying attention. … 'They don't want me to get into numbers, but, yes, we have had credible tips already,' said Steve Kodak, an FBI spokesman." Fox News continues, "It turns out that while tip lines have been in use by nearly every major and minor police department in the nation for years, the FBI's public corruption Web site, created last month, is somewhat of a new venture. … The idea is an offshoot of the Hurricane Katrina fraud tip line, which was created when law enforcement officers realized the outpouring of public support in rebuilding the Gulf Coast after last year's hurricanes wasn't benefiting just the people of Louisiana. A report out Tuesday by the Government Accountability Office reveals the government doled out an estimated $1.4 billion for fraudulent requests for assistance." Fox News adds, "Over the past five years, the FBI has increased the number of agents dedicated to anti-corruption efforts from 450 to about 620. Of late, they have been kept busy with a persistent drumbeat of corruption-related cases involving congressional and federal officials."

Box Blown Up Near Miami Federal Courthouse May Have Contained Criminal Evidence. The Miami Daily Business Review (6/14, Kay) reports, "When police blew up a suspicious box that caused the evacuation of two federal buildings in downtown Miami, they may have blown up a federal criminal case." The Review continues, "Authorities evacuated the courthouses Monday due to a bomb scare. The Miami Police bomb squad responded and destroyed the box, but it may have contained evidence from a just-decided case. … The James Lawrence King Federal Justice Building and the David W. Dyer Federal Building both were evacuated at about 2:30 p.m. for an hour or so on Monday. Hundreds of attorneys and courthouse staffers were ushered out of the buildings by federal marshals wearing yellow vests. They were directed to the street in front of the Federal Detention Center while the bomb squad did its work. Federal judges and magistrates were taken out of the building separately and taken to an undisclosed location. … 'A special robot went over to the box, and it went kaboom,' said Mark Schnapp, a partner at Greenberg Traurig in Miami who was at the U.S. Attorney's office when the building was evacuated. … But according to two lawyers who were present during the bomb scare and did not want to be named, it turned out that the box contained papers and evidence left on the sidewalk by a federal agent. The two lawyers said the evidence was from a criminal case in which a verdict had just been reached. That evidence included fake guns and wiretap equipment. … Alberto Hidalgo, a spokesman for the U.S. Marshals Service in Miami, confirmed that the box was blown up by the police bomb squad but said he had no information about what was in the box. … Matt Dates, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta, declined to comment on what the box contained. 'We don't talk about security matters,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0033573

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Cites Deaths, Violence In Probe Of DC Mental Facility. The Washington Post (6/14, B1, Weiss) reports, "The Justice Department is demanding that the D.C. government correct problems at St. Elizabeths Hospital, saying the city-run psychiatric facility is beset by lax supervision, patient-on-patient violence and substandard care." The Post continues, "Two patients died in 2004 after they were attacked by other patients, and three died last year after problems with their medical care, according to an investigative report. Dozens of others have been kicked or punched in altercations, been put in restraints longer than necessary or been neglected by medical staff, the report said. … The hospital 'fails to provide its patients with a reasonably safe living environment,' the Justice Department said. 'The facility too often subjects its patients to harm or risk of harm.'" The Post adds, "The Justice Department opened a civil rights investigation last year into conditions at the Southeast Washington hospital after a patient advocacy group flagged numerous problems. Justice officials sent their findings May 23 to Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), giving the city a list of steps that must be taken to avoid a civil rights lawsuit. There is no set deadline for the city to respond. … The report marked the second time in recent weeks that the Justice Department has said the District government is endangering some of its most vulnerable residents. Justice lawyers asked a federal judge last month to hold the city in contempt of court for failing to improve conditions in group homes for the mentally and physically disabled."

DOJ Investigating Deaths By Police Taser Use. USA Today (6/14, Johnson) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing the deaths of up to 180 people who died after law enforcement officers used stun guns or other electro-shock devices to subdue them. … 'These deaths raise a question in our mind that should be examined,' said Glenn Schmitt, acting director of the department's National Institute of Justice. He said the review will initially focus on 30 deaths, including one from two decades ago." USA continues, "Most of the deaths occurred within the past four years, corresponding with the mass deployment of stun guns to police departments throughout the country. A number of departments have re-evaluated their use of the weapons because of the fatal incidents. … More than 80 deaths since 1999 were identified in a recent analysis by The Arizona Republic. Amnesty International has identified more than 150 deaths since 2001." USA adds, "The devices, marketed as alternatives to lethal force, are designed to incapacitate unruly suspects through electric shock. … Taser International, the nation's largest maker of stun guns, has supplied more than 130,000 devices to about 7,000 of the nation's 16,000 police agencies. … The company has maintained that its products are safe and have saved the lives of police officers and suspects. … 'As we know, in-custody deaths are part of policing,' Taser spokesman Steve Tuttle said when asked about the Justice Department review. 'The more we can study and understand the circumstances that lead to in-custody deaths, the more opportunities there are to develop law enforcement tactics and procedures that will help prevent these unfortunate events in the future.'"

Minneapolis Weighing Excessive Force Charges Against Two Police Officers. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (6/14, Xiong, 424K) reports, "Allegations that two Minneapolis police lieutenants mistreated a man they arrested at Little Earth housing complex will be presented to the city attorney's office for consideration of possible criminal charges. In a press release issued Tuesday afternoon, police said they need time to enhance video and photos of the May 26 incident before the case goes to the attorney's office in two weeks. At issue is whether Lt. Mike Fossum intentionally used force with drug suspect Juan T. Vasquez and whether he and Lt. Richard Thomas left Vasquez in an excessively hot squad car." The Star Tribune adds, "The FBI has reserved the right to review the case for possible civil rights violations after the department's investigation is over, which is typical." The AP (6/14) notes, "Interim Police Chief Tim Dolan and other police officials met Tuesday with representatives of the FBI, the Hennepin County attorney's office and the city attorney's office to discuss the preliminary investigation into the officers' conduct. … The FBI has reserved the right to review the final investigation for possible civil rights violations, police said."

DOJ_NMG_0033574

Maryland Alien Smuggling Suspects Face New Charges. The Washington Times (6/14, Summers) reports, "Money laundering and identity theft were added yesterday to the charges against eight Montgomery County residents accused of smuggling illegal aliens into the county to work in a prostitution ring." The Times continues, "A federal grand jury in November indicted seven persons on charges that they transported illegal aliens into Maryland to work as prostitutes during the week and arranged for them to travel back to their homes in New York and New Jersey on the weekends." The Times adds, "The U.S. attorney's office in Maryland said the grand jury charged one more person and added three counts of money laundering for the purchase of vehicles to transport the women and property using sex ring money. … One suspect also was charged with using a false name and Social Security number to lease an apartment that was used as a brothel. … The prostitution ring generated more than $1 million in proceeds, court documents say."

EEOC Said To Be Falling Behind On Cases. The Washington Post (6/14, A21, Lee, 744K) reports that labor union officials and civil rights advocates say the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission "is falling behind in enforcing federal civil rights laws in the workplace." The EEOC "is expected to have a backlog of 47,516 charges of employment discrimination next fiscal year, up from an estimated 39,061 this year and 33,562 in 2005, say officials with the American Federation of Government Employees, citing federal figures. … At the same time, President Bush's 2007 budget request for the agency is $323 million, $4 million less than it received this budget year."

Some Fear Public Accommodations Will Spark Backlash Against Muslim Women. USA Today (6/14, Dorell, 2.31M) reports that Muslim women in the US "have been asking the public to accommodate their religious beliefs about modesty, a trend that some Muslims worry will provoke a backlash. In some recent examples: In Lincoln Park, Mich., Fitness USA relented when Muslim women demanded that the gym wall off a co-ed aerobic center from their women-only section because men could see them working out. In Bridgeview, Ill., a Muslim school says it wants its girls' basketball team to play road games against non-Muslim schools provided the public schools ban men and teenage boys from the game." USA adds, "Meeting such demands could create a backlash against Muslims, says Zuhdi Jasser, chairman of American Islamic Forum for Democracy, which advocates separation of religion and government."

Hentoff Criticizes ACLU Efforts To Quiet Dissenters. Nat Hentoff, a former member of the ACLU's national board, writes in USA Today (6/14, 2.31M), "While the staff of the ACLU has never been more essential to protecting the Constitution, the top leadership of the ACLU is working to prevent dissenting national board members from going to the news media with criticisms of ACLU policies." Hentoff adds that "one principled dissenter: Michael Meyers, the director and founder of the New York Civil Rights Coalition and a longtime ACLU board member, has been forced out from the executive committee and the national board in punishment for going to the news media several times. … Does that make its national membership, and the country, any more safe — or free?"

ANTITRUST:

Blockbuster Accuses Netflix Of Antitrust Violations In Patent Dispute. The AP (6/14, Liedtke) reports, "Escalating a bitter legal battle, Blockbuster Inc. on Tuesday accused Netflix Inc. of manipulating the U.S. patent system in a devious effort to monopolize the booming market for online DVD rentals." The AP continues, "The antitrust allegations represent Blockbuster's counterpunch to patent infringement claims Netflix filed two months ago. … The wrangling eventually could affect the rapidly growing audience that's migrating to the Internet to rent DVDs through the mail." The AP adds, "About 6.2 million people currently subscribe to the online services of Netflix and Blockbuster, which both charge a flat monthly fee to rent DVDs for an unlimited time. Most subscribers pay $17.99 per month to check out up to three DVDs at a time. … Los Gatos, Calif.-based Netflix pioneered the concept in 1999 and ended March as the industry leader with 4.9 million subscribers. … Blockbuster launched its own online service in 2004 after losing hordes of customers who formerly rented movies in traditional stores. The Dallas-based company began the spring with about 1.3 million online subscribers. … Netflix obtained the first patent on its service in 2003, but didn't seek a court order to enforce its claims against Blockbuster until it received an even broader patent in April. … In its countersuit filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, Blockbuster framed Netflix's patent claims as a 'sham' aimed at locking out competitors that will help protect consumers from price gouging."

DOJ_NMG_0033575

Fight Over Net Neutrality Moves Back To Senate. CNET News (6/14, Broache) reports, "The political tussle over Net neutrality shifted back to the Senate's turf Tuesday, taking center stage at the last public hearing before a mammoth communications bill goes up for a preliminary vote." CNET continues, "As leaders of the Senate Commerce Committee continue negotiations over how to deal with the controversial concept, committee members and witnesses from advocacy groups took turns airing their positions yet again." CNET adds, "The latest draft of the sweeping bill, called the Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act, numbers 151 pages and covers everything from the digital television switch to city-run broadband networks to changes in the procedure by which video services operators seek franchises to serve new areas. … Arguably the most contentious portion has turned out to be Net neutrality, the idea that network operators should not be allowed to prioritize Internet content and services that travel across their pipes or to make deals with companies seeking special treatment." CNET notes, "Some Democrats and at least one Republican in the Senate have backed detailed regulations barring such practices, while several others, primarily from the Republican side, have voiced staunch opposition. The ongoing dispute clearly had some politicians concerned about the chances that the broader bill will pass. … A committee vote on the final version of the bill is expected to occur June 22, with the last round of revisions expected to be released as early as Wednesday."

Apple Can Learn Lessons From EU's Treatment Of Microsoft. The Financial Times (6/14, Buck) reports, "If Apple is looking for advice on how to deal with regulators worried about 'inter-operability' it need look no further than its old rival from Redmond in Washington state. Microsoft has been battling antitrust officials on both sides of the Atlantic for many years." The Times continues, "The software group's troubles culminated in March 2004, when the European Commission slapped a record €497m fine on Microsoft for violating European Union competition rules. Brussels found, among other abuses, that the group had failed to provide rival software developers with sufficient technical information to allow them to create inter-operable products." The Times adds, "Could Apple face similar pressure from the Commission in the future? Both groups have a strong grip on their respective markets. Apple's iTunes accounts for as much as 80 per cent of downloads in some EU markets, while Microsoft's Windows operating system boasts a market share of more than 90 per cent worldwide. … Moreover, while Microsoft at least claims that it is serious about inter-operability, Apple has unashamedly built its success on the concept of a 'walled garden' - a closed world of proprietary technology. … Some experts point out, a key difference: few companies in the information technology sector can operate successfully without some form of interaction with Windows. And Micrssoft's strong position in a range of related markets from servers to media players gives it additional clout. … Music, by contrast, will continue to be distributed through various channels, the experts say."

EU Moves Up Deadline For Suez-GDF Ruling. The AP (6/14, White) reports, "The European Commission on Tuesday brought forward to June 19 its deadline to rule on a French government-backed merger between Suez SA and Gaz de France SA even as French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy suggested the government delay the deal." The AP continues, "The Suez-Gaz de France merger would create a major new European player in energy, water and waste services, with a market capitalization of 72.6 billion euros ($86 billion), but its size and power have already raised antitrust concerns in neighboring Belgium and could force it to sell off part of its business." The AP adds, "Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt warned in March that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market, while the Belgian energy watchdog is worried that the new lineup would make the French government a part-owner of Belgian nuclear power plants. … EU regulators had earlier said they would decide by July 3 whether they would clear the deal, saying there was an automatic delay because Belgium had asked to take charge of part of the case. … However, they said they brought forward the deadline because Belgium had not made a formal request to look into the deal."

DOJ_NMG_0033576

Mittal Issues Growth Projection To Help Arcelor Bid. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Von Reppert-Bismarck, McGrath) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. raised the pressure on bid target Arcelor SA by publishing details of a midterm business plan that envisions strong growth." The Journal continues, "Luxembourg-based Arcelor, meanwhile, stepped up its plan to woo shareholders by releasing more details of its planned merger with the OAO Severstal steel business owned by Russian entrepreneur Alexey Mordashov." The Journal adds, "Mittal, the world's largest steelmaker by production, said it expects earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortization, or Ebitda, to reach $9.9 billion in 2008, 71% above the 2005 level. Ebitda is projected to rise 26% this year to $7.3 billion. The plan doesn't detail the benefits from an Arcelor deal. … 'The outlook for the steel industry is positive, supported by strong global growth, especially from high-growth, developing markets,' Chairman and Chief Executive Lakshmi Mittal said. … Arcelor countered by releasing its own figures. The company said its stand-alone Ebitda would rise to €8.9 billion ($11.21 billion) in 2008, from its previous forecast of €7 billion, based on market assumptions Mittal has given. Arcelor said the Ebitda of a combined Arcelor-Severstal would rise to €13.1 billion, from €10.3 billion."

Intellectual Ventures Sparks Concerns About Patent Stockpiling. IP Law & Business (6/14, Lerer) reports on the Washington-based company Intellectual Ventures, founded by former Microsoft Corp. chief technologist Nathan Myhrvold, which as been "buying up thousands of patents through shell corporations. A $400 million investment from some of the biggest technology companies, including Nokia Corp., Intel, Apple Computer Inc., Sony Corp. and Microsoft, funds the shopping spree. … Some in the IP asset management field estimate that Intellectual Ventures has amassed 3,000 to 5,000 patents. … As the patent stockpile grows, so does the speculation -- and the fear. IP lawyers and tech executives worry that Intellectual Ventures is less interested in changing the world with big ideas, and more focused on becoming an über-troll, wreaking litigation havoc across industries with its patents. So far the tight-lipped company hasn't revealed much about its plan."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Dismisses Part Of Criminal Charge Against WR Grace. The AP (6/14, Bohrer) reports, "A federal judge has dismissed part of a criminal charge against W.R. Grace & Co. and some former top officials that alleged they knowingly endangered miners and area residents through asbestos exposure in Libby, Mont., site of the company's former vermiculite mine." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Donald Molloy concluded that the statute of limitations -- the time allotted under federal law to prosecute the case -- had expired." The AP adds, 'A federal grand jury indicted Grace and seven one-time top officials in February 2005, accusing them of conspiring to conceal health risks posed by the company's now-closed vermiculite mine. … Molloy's ruling, dated last week, is a partial victory for the defense, which has been attempting to get a conspiracy charge thrown out or limited. The conspiracy charge itself was not thrown out, but the allegation that the defendants 'knowingly endangered' residents and miners is a major foundation of that conspiracy charge. … Hundreds of people in the northwestern Montana town have been sickened, some fatally, by exposure to asbestos. The vermiculite mined at Libby contained harmful tremolite asbestos. The mine closed in 1990. … Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said, 'We are considering our options at this point' and declined further comment."

DOJ Enters Colorado Land-Use Dispute. The Longmont (CO) Daily Times-Call (6/14, Camron) reports, "Neither Rocky Mountain Christian Church officials nor the lawyer representing Boulder County is surprised that the federal Department of Justice is stepping into a lawsuit between the entities. … 'It's not altogether unexpected that they would defend the constitutionality of a federal statute, the same way the Colorado attorney general's office would defend the Colorado Constitution,' said David Hughes, the attorney representing the county on the lawsuit." The Times-Call continues, "The federal government will defend the constitutionality of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, which Boulder County claimed in March is unconstitutional." The Times-Call adds, "The church has asked the county to allow an expansion of 132,000 square feet that would include an education building, a multipurpose chapel building, a gymnasium and a gallery that would connect the new buildings with the existing church. The church also would add about 500 parking spaces. Church officials said construction would occur over the next 15 to 20 years. … RLUIPA, as the federal law is called, prevents local governments from placing a 'substantial burden' on churches; when restrictions are made, they must be the 'least restrictive' possible. However, federal courts have differed on the meaning of 'substantial burden,' and none of the cases regarding land use has yet been heard by the Supreme Court. … Hughes could not say if the federal government's involvement would complicate or lengthen the case. The government may raise different arguments than the church will, which Hughes acknowledged would cause him more work in defending the county."

DOJ_NMG_0033577

Senate Republicans Scrap Vote On Bush Mine Safety Nominee. The New York Times/AP (6/14) reports Republicans "scrapped a vote on President Bush's choice to head the agency in charge of mine safety after it became clear that he did not have enough support to win Senate approval." Democrats "opposed the nominee, Richard Stickler, saying he had spent too many years as a coal mining executive and had failed to demonstrate that safety was his top priority."

Friedman Says GM Should Focus On Making Fuel-Efficient Vehicles. In his New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) column, Tom Friedman reacts to GM's response to his accusation that the company acted "irresponsibly by offering unlimited gasoline at $1.99 a gallon for one year to anyone who buys certain of its midsize sedans, big S.U.V.'s or gas-guzzling Hummers in California or Florida." Freidman writes, "I don't want to join the many congressmen and senators in drinking G.M.'s Kool-Aid and not demanding that it become the most fuel-efficient automaker in the world. If more people in Washington insisted that G.M. focus on building cars that could compete in a world of $3.99 gasoline, rather than creating an artificial universe of $1.99 gasoline, G.M. would not be worrying about bankruptcy today."

WPost Says Supreme Court Should Hear EPA Case. The Washington Post (6/14, A22, 744K) editorializes, "As early as this week, the Supreme Court will decide whether to hear a case that is now something of a dud but could become one of the most significant pieces of environmental litigation in a generation. The case is a challenge by states and environmental organizations to the Environmental Protection Agency's decision not to regulate the gases that cause global climate change. The justices should hear it, both because a lower court…could not produce a coherent opinion and because the issues it presents are of enormous importance."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In "Major Rebuke" To Seattle SAC, FBI Reassigns US Attorney Murder Probe. The Seattle Times (6/14, Miletich) reports, "In a major rebuke, the FBI's investigation into the slaying of federal prosecutor Thomas Wales was removed from the bureau's Seattle office" Tuesday "in the wake of a decision to reduce the number of agents working on the case." FBI Portland SAC Robert Jordan "will have the authority to add new agents to a longstanding task force investigating Wales' killing in 2001, officials said." The Times notes that FBI Seattle SAC Laura Laughlin "had cut the numbers of agents investigating the case from four to two last month, prompting the special prosecutor in the case to appeal her decision to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C." In a statement released yesterday, Laughlin called "the new moves the completion of a 'strategic realignment' in the investigation." The AP (6/14, Johnson) adds that "Jordan was named 'inspector' for the case and will oversee day-to-day operations. In a Tuesday night interview from Washington, D.C., he told The Associated Press he anticipates increasing the number of people working the case, and that he will meet with the special prosecutor and the investigative team next Monday in Seattle. 'I'm going to put any and every resource necessary to work this case,' Jordan said."

DOJ_NMG_0033578

Federal Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 6 In Drug-Trafficking Case. The Providence (RI) Journal (6/14) reports a federal grand jury has issued indictments charging six men with drug-trafficking offenses, according to the U.S. Attorney's office and the Drug Enforcement Administration." Cocaine and heroin possession are among the charges.

Appeals Court Upholds 2 Murder Convictions In Louisiana. The Daily Advertiser (6/13) reports a state appeals court "has upheld the second-degree murder convictions of a man and a woman whose victims' bodies were cut up and put in boxes. The 3rd Circuit Court of Appeal on Monday rejected appeals by Cynthia Anderson and Larry Surratt, who were found guilty of killing Larry Cook and his girlfriend, Sheila Kirby in January 2003. … The appeals court dismissed claims that the victims had been working from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and that other members of the motorcycle group were more likely to have killed them."

WADA Chairman Says National Hockey League Drug Testing Is Flawed. The AP (6/14) reports the chairman of the World Anti-Doping agency "said the NHL is trying to fool the public with a flawed anti-doping program. Dick Pound said league statements Monday that there were no positive tests among 1,406 administered during the season were meaningless given the loopholes in its anti-doping program. … He said the NHL does not test for stimulants and other banned substances and does not test at times when players are likely to be caught, such as during offseason training."

Search Of Grimsley's Home In Baseball Steroid Investigation Called Surprising. The New York Times (6/14, Rhoden) writes, "Last week, federal investigators searched [Jason] Grimsley's home in Scottsdale, Ariz. … Grimsley, according to documents filed in the United States District Court of Arizona, admitted using anabolic steroids, amphetamines and human growth hormone. Fay Vincent, a former commissioner of Major League Baseball, said he was surprised by the raid because federal agents had not seemed interested in aggressively pursuing illegal drug use by athletes."

Afghanistan Poppy Harvest Expected To Reach Record Levels. The UK's Guardian (6/13) reports the Afghanistan province "being patrolled by British troops will produce at least one third of the world's heroin this year, according to drug experts who are forecasting a harvest that is both a record for the country and embarrassing for the western funded war on narcotics. British officials are bracing themselves for the result of an annual UN poppy survey due later this summer. Early indications show an increase on Helmand's 1999 record of 45,000 hectares (112,500 acres) and a near-doubling of last year's crop."

New Marshals Service Head Profiled. The Plattsburgh (NY) Press-Republican (6/14, Vock) reports, "A Chateaugay (NY) native is directing the U.S. Marshals Service, placing him in the highest-ranking position in the country's oldest law-enforcement agency. … 'Growing up on a dairy farm gives you an appreciation for hard work,' John F. Clark Jr., 45, said in an interview with the Press-Republican. … 'That has conveyed with my life and my career.'" The P-R continues, "The 1978 graduate from Chateaugay Central School was appointed by President George W. Bush and sworn in March 18 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … Clark is the agency's ninth director but the first to have had a career as a marshal."

Captured Fugitive Gunman Faces Weapons Charges In Wisconsin. The Green Bay (WI) Press-Gazette (6/13, Srubas) reports, "A federal fugitive who allegedly shot a Nebraska jeweler about a month ago appeared in federal court in Green Bay (Tuesday) morning after his arrest earlier today in an Appleton-area hotel." The Press-Gazette continues, "Steven Barentson, 57, was arrested without incident about 5:15 a.m. at the hotel after a citizen tip put authorities on his trail in Calumet County, where he was spotted in a tavern near the Calumet and Outagamie county lines. He was the target of a manhunt in the area after his vehicle was discovered abandoned Sunday at a Calumet County farm near Forest Junction. Green Bay police assisted in the hunt." The Press-Gazette adds, "Barentson, brought in by federal marshals to the federal courtroom in Green Bay, bowed slightly to media gathered in the corridors as he was led before U.S. Magistrate James Sickel. … He was arrested on charges of possession of a firearm by a felon and failure to appear for a federal jury trial in August 1992 in Grand Forks, N. D. … Sickel scheduled him for an identity hearing Friday and ordered him held without bond. The hearing Friday requires prosecutors to prove, probably through fingerprints, that Barentson is indeed the man wanted in North Dakota for a variety of federal charges, said Tom Phillip, associate federal defender appointed to Barentson, who claims indigency."

DOJ_NMG_0033579

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Sets $350,000 Bail For Border Patrol Agent. The San Diego Union-Tribune (6/14, 353K) reports, "A judge Tuesday set bail at $350,000 for a Customs and Border Protection officer accused of allowing illegal immigrants to be smuggled through his border inspection lane in return for cash and a Lexus." If Richard Elizalda "makes bail and is released, he will be required to wear a Global Positioning System device to monitor his whereabouts, said Magistrate Judge William McCurine Jr." The Union-Tribune notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Frakes alleged last week that information on the defendant's lane assignment was passed on to the smugglers via pager, cell phone or in person during one of his breaks. Stewart Roberts, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Diego, alleged that Elizalda received between $500 and $1,000 per smuggled immigrant."

Hastert Considers Holding Hearings On Senate Immigration Bill. CQ (6/13, Sandler) reported that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, "said Tuesday he may hold hearings on a Senate-passed immigration overhaul before naming House conferees to reconcile the vastly different measures the chambers have passed. … A Hastert decision to delay seeking a compromise on the most divisive domestic policy issue facing Congress could be a high-stakes gamble that public opinion is with the House, and by highlighting provisions in the Senate bill that might be unpopular with many voters, Republicans will benefit. Still, such a move could trigger a showdown with President Bush, who has made clear his desire for Congress to act this year on a comprehensive immigration overhaul measure that largely mirrors the Senate version."

High Tech CEOs Want To Lift Caps On Some Work Visas. Alan Murray writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) that Microsoft CEO Bill Gates and Sun Microsystems CEO Scott McNealy "are united in the effort to get the US government to lift the caps on immigration visas for highly skilled workers." The limits "are favored by labor unions and others who fear foreign workers may take jobs from US citizens -- although tech companies say the visas are used only for jobs when qualified Americans are unavailable." Murray adds, "The fact that leading-edge companies like Intel, Microsoft and Sun want to do their leading-edge work within US borders certainly contributes to that American advantage. And it's hard to imagine why the US government would want it any other way."

Jenkins Says National ID Card Would Reduce Illegal Immigration. Holman Jenkins writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) that there is "an easy way to reduce illegal immigration. … Just introduce a fraud-proof national ID card with biometric information; make it illegal, with real penalties, for employers to hire anyone, citizen or immigrant, who doesn't have one. … Before we go down this road, however, would we really like the consequences? With 12 million illegals in the country, whole sectors of our economy exist only because of immigrant labor. Farms would shut down along with jobs for suppliers of seeds, packaging and ancillary services. Jobs for waiters, maitre d's and chefs would vanish, not just those of immigrant busboys, kitchen hands and cleaners." The US "has a chance to beat the odds thanks to our freedom from any of the usual fatal exclusivisms. But it will have to accept that it exists on a continent whose fastest-growing cultural force is Spanish speakers."

TAX:

Former Atlanta Mayor Sentenced For Tax Evasion. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/14, Torpy, Scott, Warren) reports, "A federal judge scolded former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell for leading an office riddled with corruption. Then he sentenced him to 30 months in prison. … As the trial progressed, I was overcome, almost appalled, by the breadth of misconduct in your administration,' U.S. District Judge Richard Story told Campbell on Tuesday during the sentencing hearing in federal court. Later, Story looked Campbell in the eye and said, 'I am going to send you to prison, and I do not take that lightly. Within my heart I am not sure you have accepted responsibility for what has transpired.'" The AJC continues, "With the sentence, the judge put the final stamp on a six-year-long federal investigation into Campbell's behavior while he was mayor. Prosecutors claimed he ran his office as a corrupt enterprise, taking cash bribes to fund a lavish lifestyle of gambling and international trips with girlfriends. … Campbell remained stoic as the sentence was handed down. The 52-year-old, who served two terms as Atlanta's mayor from 1994 to 2002, was convicted in March on three counts of tax evasion but acquitted on racketeering charges and taking thousands of dollars in bribes. … Under federal law in determining the sentence, Story was able to consider evidence and testimony presented during the trial about Campbell taking bribes, even though he was acquitted on those charges. … In addition to prison time, Story ordered Campbell to pay the government almost $63,000 in back taxes, a $6,000 fine and to serve a year on probation following his prison term. Prosecutors contended Campbell had evaded paying taxes on about $200,000."

DOJ_NMG_0033580

The New York Times (6/14, Goodman) reports, "The trial capped a seven-year investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Internal Revenue Service into corruption at City Hall that led to the convictions of 10 contractors and officials, many of them Mr. Campbell's close associates. … The sentence fit squarely within federal guidelines, but sending Mr. Campbell to prison was a blow to the former mayor who had said he felt 'vindicated with regard to any allegations of corruption' in March, after a jury failed to convict him of charges of racketeering and bribery." The Times adds, "Based on the new verdict and his record of service, defense lawyers had asked the judge to give Mr. Campbell probation or home confinement. … Instead of speaking to reporters on the courthouse steps, as he has throughout the trial, Mr. Campbell and his wife left through an underground garage. … 'I disagree vehemently with the sentence,' Mr. Campbell said, stopping briefly. 'This is, I think, an abomination in terms of what we expected and certainly in terms of what the jury's verdict was.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Emergency Spending Bill. The New York Times (6/14, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "The House of Representatives approved a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill on Tuesday to provide more money for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and to finance the recovery of Gulf Coast states battered by hurricanes last year." The Senate "is expected to approve the measure in the next few days, clearing the legislation for President Bush to sign." The Times adds, "House and Senate negotiators reached agreement among themselves and with the White House by reducing disaster assistance to stay within the limit set by Mr. Bush. Still, legislators from Louisiana and other Gulf Coast states praised the final bill, saying it would provide money desperately needed by their constituents to repair damage done by the hurricanes of 2005." The vote on the bill was 351 to 67. The no votes "came from 19 Republicans, mainly fiscal conservatives, and 48 Democrats, including some of the party's more liberal House members."

NPR's Day To Day (6/13, 12:50 p.m., Dimsdale) ran a three-minute report on the emergency spending bill, focusing on its military component. NPR said the bill will "be on the President's desk this week, much to the Pentagon's relief, which has been warning that its coffers are getting low." The $94 billion for war operations "should be enough for the rest of the fiscal year at least, which is to the end of September. The cost of the war is running at close to $9 billion a month, depending on how you calculate it. With the passage of this bill, Congress will have appropriated nearly $400 billion for the war on terror since September of 2001."

Rehnquist Legacy Being Reassessed. The Legal Times (6/14, Mauro) reports, "Pausing from its headlong rush toward adjournment, the Supreme Court will meet in special session this week to honor the memory of the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died last September." The Times continues, "Following long-standing tradition, the Supreme Court Bar on Thursday will convene a program of praise and reminiscence from friends and former clerks, then offer a memorial resolution for submission to the Court. … But even as Rehnquist's admirers prepare to praise him, his legacy is unsettled. After a respectful mourning period, his opinions and those of the Rehnquist Court are taking a beating, with even Republicans and conservative academics critiquing his record in ways that could pressure his successor and former law clerk, John Roberts Jr., to complete what he left undone." The Times adds, "Meanwhile, new information has emerged about Rehnquist: His long-private 1948 master's thesis has been published, a former aide has confirmed that Rehnquist once planned to retire in 1991, and the originator of his early nickname, the 'Lone Dissenter,' has stepped forward. … Most striking in the nine months since Rehnquist's death at age 80 has been the steady tide of academic symposia and law review articles that are taking him and his Court to task. Liberals criticize him for taking the wrong path, while conservatives say he did not travel far enough on the right one, allowing major doctrinal shifts on federalism, property rights, and other areas to fizzle or fade."

DOJ_NMG_0033581

New Agriculture Department General Counsel Profiled. The Legal Times (6/14, Schwartz) reports, "Washington is a town where who you know often matters more than what you know. That, at least, is what seems to matter in the appointment of Marc Kesselman as general counsel for the Department of Agriculture. … Kesselman, who was sworn in earlier this month, has little background in agriculture, but he comes from the Office of Management and Budget, where as associate general counsel he became intimately familiar with the maneuvering between federal agencies' legal offices. … 'I don't pretend to be an expert in veterinary medicine or in farming, but USDA has many experts in those fields,' says Kesselman, 34, who on occasion helped USDA lawyers draft regulations in his previous post." The Times adds, "His appointment comes at an important time for the agency, which will be a key player in the upcoming farm bill as well as in coordinating policy for avian flu and mad cow disease. … Before his move to the White House, Kesselman spent three years at the Justice Department, including a stint working under Viet Dinh in the Office of Legal Policy."

Leavitt Touts Welfare Reform Adjustments. The Washington Times (6/14, Wetzstein, 90K) reports that in a speech at the Heritage Foundation, Health and Human Services (HHS) Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said "the landmark 1996 welfare-reform law has done a lot to 'break the cycle of dependency' on public assistance, but it has 'unfinished business' in moving more people into self-sufficiency and stable, two-parent families." Leavitt said "more single mothers are working, child-support collections have nearly doubled and more than 1 million fewer children live in poverty." However, "welfare reform needed a midcourse correction, which was included in the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005, said Mr. Leavitt. States now are required to put at least half their welfare recipients into work or other productive activities, as well as renew efforts to discourage unwed childbearing and encourage two-parent families and healthy marriages."

Private Efforts To Combat Poverty, Hunger Examined. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, A1, Thurow, 2.11M) reports in a front page story on the Backpack Club at Douglas Elementary School in Tyler, Texas. Every Friday "during the school year, just before the final bell," about "70 schoolmates from low-income families rush into the auditorium and wait in line for backpacks filled with food. In the past year, thousands of other children have begun forming similar Friday afternoon lines in schools across 30 states, from big cities like Chicago, to postcard places like Sonoma County, Calif., to rural hamlets surrounded by corn and wheat fields like Hawkeye, Iowa." The backpacks "are an emergency fix to a problem that has defied solution, despite a rising economy and tens of billions of dollars of government spending on nutrition programs, including food stamps, school lunch and aid to mothers and young children." With "little appetite in Washington for costly new government-administered efforts to address poverty, all sorts of small-scale efforts are springing up: some privately funded, entrepreneurial efforts, others government-funded experiments. None are sufficiently large to cure poverty, nor do they pretend to such an ambitious goal. Instead, they are attempts to make life better for those who live in poverty or to test new approaches to a very old problem."

Medicare Overhaul Legislation Seen As Taking Shape. The Hill (6/14, Young) reports that "with several" of the Medicare program's "perennial problems due to resurface in 2007, many healthcare lobbyists say a drive in Congress for Medicare legislation is inevitable." The GOP leadership "in both chambers, not to mention the Bush administration, is said to be wary of opening the door to a wider debate on Medicare this year. A Medicare vehicle also would not enjoy the procedural protections against amendment that helped the leadership avoid such a debate during budget reconciliation last year." Although there is "widespread agreement that no measure will move until after the August congressional recess, speculation is rampant that the leadership may opt to take final action on a bill during a lame-duck session after the elections. Any Medicare legislation would create winners and losers, as lawmakers likely will look to offset billions of dollars of new spending with reductions in other areas of Medicare." The "biggest driver behind Congress's tackling Medicare this year, yet again, is a strong desire by many lawmakers to prevent a cut in Medicare's payments to physicians. On the other hand, the physician-payments provisions would be the most expensive to enact. The Congressional Budget Office has projected that even maintaining the current payment level for one year would cost about $10 billion."

DOJ_NMG_0033582

House Appropriations Panel Votes To Increase Minimum Wage. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "Breaking with its Republican leadership, the House Appropriations Committee approved a $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage as part of a budget bill that adds $4 billion to President Bush's requests for domestic programs." The 32-27 vote "is certain to be challenged when the $596.5 billion measure comes to the House floor. But the seven Republican defections underscored the growing prominence of the wage issue going into the November elections."

House Accepts Pay Raise. The AP (6/14, Taylor) reports, "Despite record low approval ratings, House lawmakers Tuesday embraced a $3,300 pay raise that will increase their salaries to $168,500. The 2 percent cost-of-living raise would be the seventh straight for members of the House and Senate." Lawmakers "easily squelched a bid by Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, to get a direct vote to block the COLA, which is automatically awarded unless lawmakers vote to block it." The New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) runs a similar AP story, while Roll Call (6/14, Yachnin) notes that "under a federal law enacted in 1989, Members automatically receive an annual cost-of-living adjustment unless legislation is passed to block the COLA from being implemented."

Murtha Suspending Bid For Majority Leader. CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Blitzer) reported, "Congressman John Murtha is suspending his bid to become the House majority leader if Democrats win control of that chamber this fall. The House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi announced Murtha's decision." Roll Call (6/14, Kornacki) says Pelosi "convinced the Pennsylvanian to set aside his effort until after the November elections. … 'I appreciate Mr. Murtha's continuing cooperation and leadership in our effort to win a Democratic House to take America in a new direction for everyone,' Pelosi said in a statement."

The Hill (6/14, Hearn) reports Murtha "echoed her sentiments. 'For the unity of the party and to focus on Democratic victory in November, I have suspended my campaign for majority leader until after the election,' he said in a statement."

McConnell Seen As Preparing For Senate Majority Leader. The Hill (6/14, Bolton) reports, "Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell's new hire of Don Stewart, one of the most admired communications strategists in the Senate, is one of several indications that the lawmaker is readying his expected takeover as majority leader next year." McConnell "is also closing the Senate at the end of legislative day and negotiating the unanimous-consent agreements needed to move business forward on the floor, aides say. He is working closely with colleagues facing reelection races to make sure amendments important to them politically are considered on the floor in the run-up to the November election." McConnell "has been trying to raise his visibility in the press, addressing what has been the chief criticism of his performance in the leadership: that he has not played a big enough role in communicating the Republican message and countering Democratic attacks."

Roll Call (6/14, Stanton, Billings) runs a similar report under the headline "McConnell Bides His Time," and says that "political observers predict that short of catastrophic GOP losses on Election Day, McConnell's ascension to the Majority Leader's chair this fall is a sure thing." McConnell, however, "has consistently rebuffed questions from reporters about the future and has issued strict instructions to his staff to maintain their focus on the day-to-day operations of the Senate, lawmakers and Senate aides say."

Mollohan Amends Financial Disclosures, Maintains Innocence. The AP (6/14, Messina) reports, "Answering allegations from a watchdog group that have spawned a federal investigation, U.S. Rep. Alan Mollohan said on Tuesday that he was correcting or amending 19 items on his financial disclosure reports dating to 2000. But the West Virginia Democrat said the 'relative handful of unintentional and immaterial mistakes' fail to amount to the more than 250 'misrepresentations and omissions' the group alleged he had made in the reports." Mollohan also released a letter from the accounting firm of Braund Eiler & Vasko, which "credited skyrocketing real estate values for the rapid growth" in his net worth.

The Charleston (WV) Gazette (6/14, Nyden) adds that Mollohan believes the National Legal and Policy Center "retaliated against him because, as the top Democrat on the House Ethics Committee last year, he blocked House Republican leaders from weakening existing ethics rules. The NLPC began looking at Mollohan in May 2005, just after he prevailed in a battle in the House Ethics Committee." The Washington Post (6/14, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) notes the federal probe began after NLPC, "a small, conservative research institute in Virginia, turned over 500 pages of documents to the FBI in March." Yesterday, "Mollohan strongly denied any wrongdoing," saying, "NLPC is dead wrong in implying that I have improperly benefited from my office."

DOJ_NMG_0033583

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, A12, Wilke, 2.11M) reports, "The amendments answer some questions about his finances but raise others. For example, they reveal that the West Virginia Democrat borrowed $35,000 from a business partner who has won tens of millions of federal dollars directed by the congressman to the nonprofit groups she operates. Loans to lawmakers from political supporters and federal contractors are subject to special scrutiny under federal election-commission and House ethics rules."

The New York Times (6/14, Rudoren, Pilhofer, 1.19M) adds that Mollohan "is facing his most intense electoral challenge since he was first elected in 1982," but "in releasing the long-awaited financial report, Mr. Mollohan said it 'shows that government money has never been used' and 'no money has ever been diverted from the nonprofits' to his investments. He compared the National Legal and Policy Center…to Senator Joseph R. McCarthy for…refusing to release the 500-page complaint detailing the accusations."

Republican Challenger Belittles Mollohan Action. The Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer (6/14, King) reports Mollohan's Republican challenger, state Del. Chris Wakim, "released a statement in response to Mollohan's actions Tuesday." Wakim said, "This may be how career politicians do business in Washington, but it's not how we do business in West Virginia. Here in West Virginia, it doesn't take 200 pages to claim your innocence. Alan Mollohan's problem has nothing to do with forms. His problem is that he used his public office to enrich himself and his political cronies at the expense of the people he was elected to serve."

Clients Boosted Payments Of Lewis Aides' Former Firm. Roll Call (6/14, Kane) reports, "At least 33 former clients of a top GOP staffer on the House Appropriations Committee hiked the fees they paid to the aide's lobbying firm after he returned to Capitol Hill, providing his firm with more than $1.1 million in additional revenue in 2005." The "increased cash from the former clients of Jeff Shockey, deputy staff director of the panel, came largely from longtime clients who increased their payments dramatically in the first six months after his departure — which coincided with the time frame his former partners projected for increased revenue and led to a nearly $2 million buyout from the firm." Shockey's role "with the firm Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White and its connections to Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) are part of a burgeoning federal investigation into the lobbying-for-earmark industry that serves as the financial lifeline of many defense contractors and has expanded in recent years to include municipalities and localities across the country." This spike in revenue "from Shockey's former clients came after Copeland Lowery played an active role in financially underwriting Lewis' campaign for the Appropriations gavel."

Lewis Hires Outside Legal Team. CQ (6/13, Higa) reports House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., "has hired a team of outside lawyers and an experienced public relations hand to field inquiries about an ongoing federal investigation in southern California." Lewis' new spokeswoman, Barbara Comstock of Blank Rome Government Relations, "said Tuesday that the chairman has hired lawyers from the firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher: Robert Bonner and former Rep. Mel Levine, R-Calif. (1983-1993), based in California, and Washington-based Ted Olson and Joe Warin."

Democratic Leaders To Unveil Domestic Agenda. USA Today (6/14, 2.31M) reports Democratic House and Senate leaders "are planning to reduce the cost of student loans and prescription drugs, raise the minimum wage and launch an effort to develop alternative fuels if they win back control of Congress." In an interview Tuesday with USA TODAY, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "previewed the 'New Direction for America' platform hammered out by Democratic members of Congress, mayors and governors. She and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid plan to formally unveil the plan today." Pelosi said, "The American people need to know, if you win, what are your priorities." Reid said the party is standing "with the people we have always stood with: seniors, students and the hardworking families of America. We intend to tackle the issues that matter most." USA adds Pelosi "discouraged comparisons with the Republican 'Contract With America,'" saying Democratic candidates "will be 'independent representatives for their districts,' a nod to the differing views within the party on issues such as abortion, gun control and Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0033584

Report Alleges Misconduct By NIH Alzheimer's Researcher. A report by congressional investigators has found that a world-renowned Alzheimer's diseases researcher at NIH abused the agency's lax oversight to improperly forward tissue specimens to a pharmaceutical company and then accepting hundred of thousands of dollars in consulting fees form the company. The Washington Post (6/14, A6, Weiss, 744K) reports, "Trey Sunderland, chief of the geriatric psychiatry branch at the National Institute of Mental Health, failed to tell agency officials about his arrangement with the drug giant Pfizer Inc., as required by federal rules, the investigators concluded in a 27-page preliminary report released yesterday. Sunderland also did not properly disclose arrangements with another company, said the report, which found no wrongdoing by the drug companies."

The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Willman, 958K) reports, "The new details about the conduct of the scientist, Dr. P. Trey Sunderland III, drew bipartisan criticism from members of an investigative panel of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The House members said Sunderland's conduct raised broad questions about how the NIH accounted for materials harvested from patients — materials that hold promise for finding cures or ways to better diagnose serious diseases. … The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan, said: 'NIH lacks adequate controls for human tissue samples, human subject protection and the scientific conduct of many of its senior employees. Accountability must be restored to NIH's own research programs.'"

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 6, 2;15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported this story last evening, noting, that "the committee found no evidence that the company had broken any NIH rules at the time or knew of any wrongdoing by Dr. Sunderland. He is expected to appear before the committee tomorrow and take the fifth."

Filner Curses VA "Spin Doctor" Over Data Theft Response. Roll Call (6/14, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) was so fired up Tuesday over the Veterans' Affairs' handling of stolen military personnel files that he dropped the F-bomb at a news conference outside VA headquarters. After a VA 'spin doctor,' as Filner calls him, ran outside and accused the Congressman of staging a 'publicity stunt,' Filner, who has been filling in as ranking member on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, let her rip. 'You guys f---ed it up!' the Congressman yelled. 'Stop covering your ass and figure it out!'" Filner "told HOH that he's furious with the VA for waiting three whole weeks before responding publicly to the burglary of a laptop containing 26.5 million military personnel members' personal records."

Bill Would Restrict Consumer Ability To Freeze Credit Reports. USA Today (6/14, Acohido, 2.31M) reports that the Financial Data Protection Act under consideration by Congress, would pre-empt "laws in 17 states that allow anyone to freeze their own credit and instead restricting the privilege to ID theft victims." A credit freeze "cuts off access to your credit history. … Under the bill, backed by the financial services industry, simply having your data lost or stolen isn't enough. You must file a police report describing a specific instance of it being used to commit a crime." USA Adds, "The bill also would pre-empt laws in 29 states requiring companies, institutions and agencies to notify individuals about security breaches compromising their data. It sets national criteria for data protection and breach disclosures, and puts banking and Treasury officials in charge of compliance."

Author Says Executive Privilege Not An Absolute Right. Author Louis Fisher writes in the Los Angeles Times (6/14, 958K), "The Justice Department told a federal judge Monday that a challenge to the National Security Agency's controversial domestic eavesdropping program must be thrown out of court because the secrets involved are just too sensitive. … This is not the first time the Justice Department has invoked what is known as the 'state secrets privilege.' … Each time, the courts have agreed to dismiss the proceedings simply because the Justice Department says that trying the cases would reveal state secrets." Fisher adds, "The executive branch may assert a right to keep its secrets, but this must not be viewed as an absolute right, only a privilege granted by the court when appropriate."

NYTimes Calls Obama's Proposed Deal With Automakers "Worthy New Idea." An editorial in the New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) says, "Companies like Ford and General Motors groan under the weight of their history, manifested in the legacy costs that are a result of decades of promises to support workers and provide them with health care in their old age." The Times adds, "In an ideal world, America would join the overwhelming majority of developed countries and hammer out some kind of national health care system. Failing such a sudden and unlikely onset of sanity, creative solutions are needed. Sen. Barack Obama has proposed striking a bargain with American automakers to help them with retiree health care costs in exchange for higher fuel efficiency standards. While we have some questions about how to make such a system work, it is at least a worthy new idea — one of a very few in a field desperately in need of them."

DOJ_NMG_0033585

OTHER NEWS:

Sluggish Retail Sales May Indicate Slowing Economy. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "Lukewarm retail sales last month suggest that higher gasoline prices and the weakening housing market are taking a toll on consumers and slowing the economy." The Commerce Department "said retail sales rose only 0.1% in May from the previous month, after growing 0.8% in April, as spending patterns took a turn toward thrift. Consumers spent more on filling up their gas tanks -- primarily because pump prices shot up -- but less on new vehicles." Overall, "retail sales in May were 7.6% higher than the year before. Excluding the volatile auto, gasoline and building-materials sectors, retail sales rose a sluggish 0.4% in May, the third consecutive month at that pace."

USA Today (6/14, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Wholesale inflation was mixed in May as overall price pressures eased, but a special measure closely watched by economists ticked up faster than expected, the government said Tuesday." The reports "appear to bolster Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's recent assessment that the economy is slowing from the breakneck pace of the first three months of the year, though not yet quickly enough to contain price pressures." Several economists "said the wholesale inflation data made it more likely that the central bank will decide to raise interest rates again when it meets June 28-29 in a bid to restrain price increases, though many are waiting for today's release of the government's consumer inflation numbers."

The New York Times (6/14, Peters, 1.19M) reports, "Higher prices at the manufacturing level helped push overall prices of wholesale goods higher in May, the Labor Department reported yesterday." While wholesale prices "declined in certain categories like produce, alcoholic beverages and automobiles, they rose elsewhere, resulting in a net price gain for the month." Over all, "the Producer Price Index rose 0.2 percent in May after posting sharper increases in April and March. But the so-called core rate, which excludes food and energy prices, rose 0.3 percent, compared with 0.1 percent increases the previous two months. That surprised economists, who were expecting a rise of 0.2 percent."

Rise In Foreign Official Holdings Seen As Presaging Recession. In a New York Times op-ed (6/14), Brookings Institution guest scholar Martin Mayer says, "Recent large increases in foreign official holdings indicate that foreign private investors see fewer attractive places to put their money in the American economy. They could presage a significant fall in the price of American assets, stocks (witness the recent drops in American stock markets) and bonds and real estate and all, and a hard landing for a world economy still floating on the crest of cheap credit."

Stock Markets Continue Losing Trend. The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 7, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Those nagging worries about a return of inflation sent stock prices lower today. The Dow fell 86 points [to close at 10,706.14]. The NASDAQ lost nearly 19 [to close at 2,072.47]."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A bit of a negative benchmark on Wall Street today. Stocks continued their sell off with the blue chips finishing in negative territory for the year for the first time this year."

USA Today (6/14, Krantz, 2.31M) reports stocks "and commodities tumbled worldwide Tuesday as investors grew increasingly concerned that rising interest rates could hurt global economies and crimp demand for everything from industrial materials to precious metals."

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "Global stock and commodity prices tumbled again, extending a rout that appears to defy -- but may simply highlight -- the strong pace of economic growth in much of the world." In Japan, "the world's second-largest economy, the Nikkei Stock Average shed 614.41, or 4.1%, to close at 14218.60, and other markets were down sharply." Gold, "which often moves in the opposite direction to stocks, also lost ground. The price of a troy ounce, which had recently crossed the $700 mark, dropped $44.30, or 7.3%, to close at $562.50, and the price of silver fell 13%." Many economists "now think the broad reversal in the prices of stocks, bonds and commodities like gold and silver is less a warning signal of an economic downturn than a consequence of the ratcheting up of interest rates by the world's central banks."

DOJ_NMG_0033586

Indexes Based On Fundamental Measures Said To Outperform Capitalization-Weighted Indexes. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (6/14), Jeremy Siegel, the Russell E. Palmer Professor of Finance at Wharton, says, "New research demonstrates that it is possible to construct broad-based indexes offering investors better returns and lower volatility than capitalization-weighted indexes" such as the S&P 500. These indexes "are weighted by fundamental measures of firm value, such as sales or dividends, instead of allowing the market price alone to dictate how much of each firm should be included in the index." If you "are a fan of indexing, as I and so many other investors are, you are no longer trapped in capitalization-weighted indexes which overweight overvalued stocks and underweight undervalued stocks. Devotees of value investing who are searching for a simple, low-cost indexed portfolio in which to hold their stocks need wait no longer. Fundamentally weighted indexes are the next wave of investing."

Globalization Of Finance Generates New Risks. In his Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K), Robert Samuelson says, "Spoiled by years of cheap credit, global investors seem to be reacting to the prospect of higher interest rates by fleeing stock markets almost everywhere. There is danger of a broader financial and economic setback." The "riskiest and most mysterious aspect of the present situation is the increasingly global nature of investment capital. Once, capital was largely compartmentalized by nation. Americans saved and invested in the United States; Germans saved and invested in Germany. This world is disappearing. It is now routine for pension funds, mutual funds and many wealthy investors to move money in and out of American, European, Asian and Latin American stocks and bonds." In theory, "liberalization benefits everyone." But global finance "has created new risks. At least two stand out. First, huge trade imbalances." Second, "worldwide financial crises. Global investors may move in herds, first pouring money into some countries -- or investments -- and then withdrawing abruptly. That's what happened in the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis."

Former Reagan Navy Secretary Wins Virginia Democratic Senate Primary. The AP (6/14, Lewis) reports, "James Webb, a former Reagan administration Navy secretary who left the Republican Party over the Iraq war, won the Democratic nomination Tuesday for the right to take on GOP Sen. George Allen in the fall." Webb "defeated lobbyist and longtime Democratic Party activist Harris Miller after a bruising primary in which voters decided between a traditional and unabashed liberal (Miller) and a former Republican (Webb) whose populist campaign was aimed at so-called Reagan Democrats -- namely, rural, white moderates." The AP adds, "With all but one precinct reporting, Webb had 83,156 votes, or 53.5 percent, compared with 72,352 votes, or 46.5 percent, for Miller."

The Washington Times (6/14, McLaughlin, 90K) reports, "Last night, Mr. Webb told supporters gathered at the Hilton Crystal City Hotel at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport that voters want someone who is not going to follow the Bush administration 'blindly' like Mr. Allen." Said Webb, "I stand here today because you believed in a vision, not just my vision, a vision for this country. … Many of you called on me months ago because you wanted a leader to carry that vision to Washington. ... Too much was at stake, and the time had come to bring this country on a different course. That is a call I am glad I answered."

The New York Times (6/14, Kornblut, 1.19M) notes Webb "had campaigned against Mr. Miller for his liberal spending on the race, at one point distributing fliers that showed Mr. Miller with money flowing from his pockets and a hooked nose. Mr. Miller, who is Jewish, denounced the image as anti-Semitic; Mr. Webb denied intending a slur." Sen. Charles E. Schumer, "the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and a champion of Mr. Webb's, credited his independent streak and his aggressive campaigning for the victory. … Mr. Schumer said that with Mr. Webb's victory, he expected the Virginia race to become more competitive and to put the balance of the Senate into play."

The Washington Post (6/14, A1, Shear, 744K) reports, "Webb now faces the challenge of raising millions of dollars in an attempt to oust Allen, a popular ex-governor who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008. Allen has more than $7.5 million in the bank and a long history of winning in a state that usually votes for Republicans in federal contests." Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, "said the Republicans look forward to running against a 'very fractured, divided Democratic Party' and 'having John Kerry…campaign with Mr. Webb.'" Kerry backed Webb in the primary.

In an analysis piece titled "Webb Will Try To Turn Past GOP Loyalty Into Advantage," the Washington Post (6/14, A1, Barnes, 744K) notes Webb "cast his first vote for a Democratic presidential candidate only two years ago made." Last night he make it "clear that, in the fall, he will try to turn to his advantage the positions and past alliances that dogged his primary campaign this spring." He "supported Allen and George W. Bush in 2000. He's proud of Ronald Reagan -- he was a prominent member of the administration -- and couldn't abide Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. He has questioned affirmative action and supports gun owners." But "he also thinks that the war in Iraq was a mistake and that Congress is overwhelmed by special interests and doesn't do enough for the little guy. In all of these ways, he thinks he's like most Virginians."

DOJ_NMG_0033587

Liberal Jeers For Clinton Over Iraq Stance Seen As Revealing Deep Democratic Split. The Hill (6/14, Schor) reports, "Angry boos greeted Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) at a liberal conference yesterday when she opposed fixing a date for withdrawing American forces from Iraq. The sour audience response, at the Campaign for America's Future conference, hints at the 2008 presidential front-runner's shaky standing with anti-war Democrats, who wield increasing power in the party." Clinton's speech "packed the room with a crowd billed as the nation's largest gathering of progressives."

The story is being depicted a signaling a split in Democratic ranks. The AP (6/14, Barrett) notes another "potential presidential candidate," Sen. John Kerry, "spoke to the group later in the day and offered an emphatically anti-war appeal. … In remarks that could have been aimed at Clinton, Kerry said: 'It's not enough to argue with the logistics or to argue about the details. ... It is essential to acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake. ... It was wrong, and I was wrong to vote for that Iraqi war resolution.'"

The New York Times (6/14, Nagourney, Toner, 1.19M) runs a similar report under the headline "Clinton And Kerry Show Democratic Divide On Troop Withdrawal," in which it reports Clinton "faced boos and shouts of 'bring them home' from an audience of liberal Democrats,"

The Washington Post (6/14, A10, Balz, 744K) also says Clinton's and Kerry's appearances at the Take Back America conference at the Washington Hilton "put on vivid display the Democratic Party's divisions over the foreign policy issue that dominates this year's midterm elections, and the two possible 2008 presidential candidates offered a preview of the debate that could dominate the battle for the party's nomination." Clinton "won repeated applause through most of her speech, which dealt at length with domestic issues but also sharply criticized President Bush's handling of the war." But "the audience turned against her when, in what she called a difficult conversation, she restated her long-standing position about timetables for withdrawing US forces."

In its report, Knight Ridder (6/14, Kuhnhenn) says, "The Democratic Party's split over the Iraq war cracked into view." The "intra-party division has haunted Democrats from the start of the war and bedeviled Kerry during his 2004 presidential run. The lack of a harmonizing party message comes as public opposition to the war has been strong and congressional elections are about five months away."

The Washington Times (6/14, Pfeiffer, Hoover, 90K) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi also addressed the gathering. Said Pelosi, "Have you had enough of a war that is failing to make America secure?"

The San Francisco Chronicle (6/14, Sandalow) reports, "Democrats have put aside many differences in their common yearning to gain seats in the 2006 midterm congressional elections. Yet when it comes to the war that has polarized the nation, and by some accounts is shaping up as the biggest issue in the November election, Democrats are struggling to speak with a single voice."

Clinton Tries To Refocus Debate On Abortion. In a speech to the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association yesterday, Sen. Hillary Clinton tried to shift the abortion debate to the subject of access of to family planning services, The New York Times (6/14, Hernandez, 1.19M) reports that Clinton said the nation's focus "should be on preventing unwanted pregnancies." The Times says Clinton's remarks "reflect the degree to which Democrats around the country are trying to find a middle ground on the polarizing issue of abortion rights since their party's defeats in the November 2004 elections." The Times also reports the Clinton "also used her speech to take a jab at Republicans who, while adamantly opposed to abortion rights, have resisted efforts to pay for programs providing greater access to contraception and other family planning services."

Rove Seeks To Draw Clear Distinctions Between GOP, Democrats. The Manchester Union Leader (6/14, Distaso, 59K) reports, "When he sharply accused key Democrats this week of 'cutting and running' on the Iraq war, Karl Rove was in a broad way urging New Hampshire Republicans to stand by President George W. Bush during this key mid-term election campaign." Democrats argue Bush's low approval ratings make the GOP vulnerable, but Rove "returned to basics on Monday, verbally drawing a clear bright line between the two parties in trying to rally the faithful." Speaking at the NH GOP State Committee's annual dinner "Rove focused on taxes, spending and national security." Rove "sharpened the differences between the two parties with vintage 'red meat' rhetoric" saying "They're for higher taxes. We're for lower taxes. … They're for more spending. We're for less spending." The DNC "said Rove and the Republicans 'are recycling their tired and despicable partisan attacks' and have no 'real solutions.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033588

Mehlman Says Public Understands Administration Tackling Tough Issues. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman, in an interview on Comedy Central's The Daily Show With John Stewart (6/13), was asked what the GOP strategy for 2006 would include. Mehlman said that he's seen DNC chairman Howard Dean promoting his GOTV leaflet strategy and "I think our strategy is to get him to go to every undecided voter in America with those cards. That's how we can do it." Asked whether Republican candidates would "run away" from the Administration's record, Mehlman replied, "I think the American people understand we are dealing with tough challenges and dealing with a tough war, dealing with a global economy which makes people worry about things like their pensions and healthcare."

Resnick Says GOP Must Reach Out To Independents. Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, writes in the Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K) that the GOP majorities in the House and Senate "do not rest on the base alone. While keeping that segment of the party motivated is certainly an important factor in the November midterms, it isn't enough. To maintain our majorities, particularly in the House, our party must reach out to independent and swing voters." Resnick adds, "The Republican Revolution was a two-pronged effort relying on both a motivated conservative base and efforts to reach out to independent swing voters. To maintain that majority in 2006, we'd do well to remember the lessons of 1994."

Laura Bush Campaigns With Kean In New Jersey. The New York Times (6/14, Chen, 1.19M) reports Vice President Dick Cheney's campaign stop for New Jersey state Sen. Thomas H. Kean Jr. "did not go according to plan." Kean "was late after taking the usually traffic-clogged Route 1 from Trenton rather than the speedier New Jersey Turnpike, prompting speculation that he did not want to be photographed with Mr. Cheney." But yesterday, when "a far more popular administration figure — Laura Bush, the first lady — arrived here on Tuesday for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean's candidacy for the United States Senate, everything appeared to run smoothly." Kean and Mrs. Bush "appeared on stage together, under a big, white tent just a few miles from the Shore, and Mr. Kean delivered, almost verbatim, the same speech from his primary night celebration a week ago." The "fact that Mrs. Bush came to support Mr. Kean so early in the election season is the latest indication of how optimistic the national Republican Party is that it can put a New Jersey Republican in the Senate for the first time in three decades."

DeLay Recorded Phone Message For VA8 Primary Candidate. The Washington Post (6/14, A12, Gowen, 744K) reports that Virginia's 8th Congressional District GOP candidate Mark Ellmore's campaign received some last minute help from former Rep. Tom DeLay, who recently took up official residence in the district. Ellmore, "who lost to Tom O'Donoghue in the GOP primary to face Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D) in November, called DeLay's office Monday morning. DeLay's staff members set up an automated call from their boss that went to 8,000 voters in the district -- which includes Alexandria, Arlington County and part of Fairfax County -- urging them to the polls to support Ellmore. Problem was, in the intro, DeLay said 'Northern California' instead of 'Northern Virginia.'"

Roll Call (6/14, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "DeLay began his message by saying, 'Hello, this is Tom DeLay.' He mentioned that as Majority Leader, he 'battled Jim Moran in Congress for 14 years.' Then, for some reason, he continued, 'I recently re-registered to vote in Northern California.' … Clearly, or so we assume, DeLay meant to say that he recently re-registered to vote in Northern Virginia. Though we just can't help but wonder if perhaps he was dreaming of the day that hippy dippy Marin County takes a hard turn to the right."

Giuliani Outlines Energy Strategy. The AP (6/14, Fouhy) reports, "Stepping up his political visibility as he contemplates a run for president, former Mayor Rudolph Giuliani laid out an energy strategy Tuesday that calls for more use of nuclear power and ethanol." Speaking to the Manhattan Institute, Giuliani "called for a comprehensive effort to wean the nation from petroleum. The New York Times (6/14, Healy, 1.19M) says that while Giuliani "did not criticize Mr. Bush by name, and some of his ideas reflected Republican orthodoxy about increasing energy supply," he "implicitly accused the White House of doing little to expand energy sources. Afterward, too, he expressed concern about global warming, saying that 'everyone accepts the fact that it's happening and it has an impact.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033589

Gore Says He Has No Plans To Run Again. Former Vice President Al Gore was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (6/13) if he has thought about entering the 2008 presidential race. Gore said, "I don't have plans to be a candidate again. I haven't made the so-called Sherman statement but that's not to leave the door open. It's more sort of an internal shifting of the gears. I really don't expect to be a candidate again." Gore added that "if you were a political reporter and you went to Iowa and New Hampshire, anywhere else in the country, you would look in vain for anyone who had been contacted by me or anyone on my behalf. I'm really not taking any steps. I have no intention, no plans to do that again."

Hayworth Invitation Calls Quayle 44th US President. The Washington Post (6/14, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "A recent e-mail from Rep. J.D. Hayworth 's reelection campaign invited supporters to join the Arizona Republican, his wife and 'The Honorable Dan Quayle , 44th President of the United States.'" Quayle "was actually the 44th vice president, but a typo dropped the 'vice' and started a buzz among startled GOPers who thought Quayle wanted to be the next -- that would be 44th -- president." The Post adds, "A correction was quickly issued; at press time, the only heart-pounding element at the June 24 event will be the coffee."

States Said To Have Financial Incentive To Encourage Adoption. NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 8, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Congress passed a law almost 10 years ago that gives states bonuses based on the number of kids moved from foster care into adoptive homes. Now, some child welfare experts are saying the bonuses are leading some children to be put at risk." NBC (Thompson) added, "Why would a state pressure welfare workers to force adoptions? One reason may be money. States can earn Federal bonuses for keeping adoption numbers high, and in Kentucky, workers can even get extra vacation." An NBC News computer analysis "shows adoptions have risen dramatically nationwide. In Kentucky, they've tripled in six years while those Federal bonuses have grown to more than a million dollars. At the same time, the number of kids returned to their parents, often the best solution, has dropped sharply. States don't get bonuses for that."

States Consider Privatizing Parts Of Interstate Highway System. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/14, A1, Goldstein, 744K) reports that the state of Indiana "is about to turn over its entire toll road for the next 75 years to two foreign companies, making it more expensive to drive. The decision to hand the Indiana Toll Road to an Australian and Spanish team for $3.8 billion at the end of this month has blown up into one of the biggest brawls here in a generation." The decision "places Indiana at the leading edge of a nascent trend in which states and local governments are exploring the idea of privatizing parts of the United States' prized interstate highway system."

Israel Kills Terrorists, Civilians In Gaza Strike. The New York Times (6/14, Erlanger, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "Eight Palestinian civilians were killed and more than 40 wounded Tuesday by an Israeli missile strike on Islamic militants riding in a van that Israeli officials said was carrying rockets to launch at Israel. Two men in the van were also killed, including a man the Israelis consider an important rocket maker." The Times says the civilian deaths "are bound to make it harder for" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "and the United States to persuade Hamas…to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Palestinian-Israeli agreements... Mr. Abbas will also find it more difficult to get Hamas to accept a referendum proposal that would at least implicitly recognize Israel."

The Washington Post (6/14, A19, Wilson, 744K) calls the strike "the deadliest such attack this year," and notes, "The armed confrontation between Israel and the Palestinian militias…has coincided with a worsening internal conflict among the Palestinian parties. Deep partisan divisions within the security services have split its more than 70,000 members into rival camps, a combustible situation made worse by delays of more than three months in payment of salaries because of economic sanctions."

DOJ_NMG_0033590

The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, Prusher, 61K) reports, "The cross-border arms volley -- as well as worsening strife among Palestinians -- has gained a deadly momentum since late last week, setting up a dynamic that may put prospects for dialogue among all the parties further out of reach."

Israel Says Palestinian Explosive Was Responsible For Gaza Beach Deaths. ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Israel contends it was not responsible for the beach explosion that killed Palestinians last week. Palestinians have blamed an artillery shelling. But Israel says its investigation found an explosive buried in the sand was responsible. It says an analysis of the shrapnel found the Israelis were not involved. Palestinians dismiss the Israeli claim."

LATimes Says Palestinian Conflict Endangers US Efforts In Iraq. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/14, 958K) says "bad news from the West Bank and Gaza -- the site of the proposed Palestinian state that he envisions existing alongside Israel -- is also bad news for the US mission in Iraq." The Palestinian cause "has been embraced -- sometimes sincerely, sometimes cynically -- by millions of Arabs and Muslims. A bloodbath in the West Bank and Gaza -- even a fratricidal one -- would have ominous echoes for the United States elsewhere, including Iran and, yes, Iraq."

Four Chinese Companies Sanctioned For Aiding Iran. The Treasury Department has sanctioned four Chinese companies saying they had aided Iran's ballistic missile programs. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "The US moves underscore the complexities Washington faces as it seeks to contain Iran. … The four Chinese state-owned companies are Beijing Alite Technologies Co., LIMMT Economic and Trade Co., China National Precision Machinery Import/Export Corp., and China Great Wall Industry Corp., or CGWIC. The US also cited CGWIC's Torrance, Calif., U.S. subsidiary, G.W. Aerospace Inc. The Treasury froze the companies' US assets, and barred US companies, banks and individuals from doing business with them."

Democrats Say Bush Focus On Iran Is Political Ploy. The Hill (6/14, Tiron) reports that some Democrats believe the White House's recent focus on Iran "is a political ploy aimed at boosting the President's low approval ratings." Democrats "point out that the Iran situation could be a win-win for Bush. If he brokers a deal Bush can claim victory, and if it falls apart it would set up an opportunity for the President to talk about homeland security and terrorism in the lead-up to the election. While Democrats are quick to point out that keeping nuclear weapons out of Iran's hands is extremely important, some of them say that politics are playing a significant role in the administration's foreign-policy initiative."

Pew Poll Shows US Global Image Weakening. The New York Times (6/14, Knowlton, 1.19M) reports a 15-nation Pew Research Center poll showing that, "as the war in Iraq continues for a fourth year, the global image of America has slipped further, even among people in some countries closely allied with the United States." The prevalence of positive views of the US declined sharply in the past year in Spain, India, Russia, Turkey and Indonesia. "Declines were less steep in France, Germany and Jordan, while people in China and Pakistan had a slightly more favorable image of the United States this year than last. In Britain, Washington's closest ally in the Iraq war, positive views of America have remained in the mid-50-percent range in the past two years, down sharply from 75 percent in 2002, before the war." Respondents in 13 of the 15 nations said the war in Iraq was a greater danger to security than Iran's nuclear program.

US Seen As "Quietly Beginning To Accept" ICC. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Bravin, 2.11M) reports Washington "is quietly beginning to accept the International Criminal Court, the Hague tribunal that President Bush repudiated in 2002, as the White House seeks to temper criticism that it considers itself unbound by international law. That new approach will be on display today, when the ICC's chief prosecutor reports to the United Nations Security Council on his investigation into alleged war crimes in Darfur." The US is said to "consider the ICC perhaps the only chance to bring Darfur war criminals to justice."

US Military Violated Irish Law By Transporting Convicted Marine Through Airport. The AP (6/14, Pogatchnik) reports, "The U.S. military violated Irish law by transporting a convicted U.S. Marine through Shannon Airport without government permission, Foreign Minister Dermot Ahern announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "The episode – discovered when a cleaner spotted the man, in handcuffs and military fatigues, on the plane at the airport – underscored Irish

DOJ_NMG_0033591

suspicions that the U.S. military also could be ferrying munitions and terrorism suspects through this officially neutral nation." The AP adds, "U.S. Ambassador James Kenny confirmed that a U.S. Marine, who had been convicted of stealing by a U.S. military tribunal in Kuwait, was being transported Sunday under guard on a Defense Department-chartered aircraft. He said the military should have sought written permission from Ireland's Justice Department to bring the convict into Irish airspace but failed to do so. … 'We regret that this incident happened and are reviewing procedures closely with Irish authorities to ensure that this does not happen again,' said Kenny, who pledged that all future U.S. military and chartered troop transports refueling in Shannon would be 'completely transparent and in conformity with Irish law and the wishes of the Irish government.'" The AP notes that Ahern "said the legal breach was particularly sensitive because of widespread suspicions that the Central Intelligence Agency was using Shannon – a strategically located, trans-Atlantic refueling point – for transporting al-Qaeda and Taliban suspects. Both the Irish and U.S. governments have denied this. … Ireland's practice of permitting U.S. military troop carriers bound for Iraq to refuel at Shannon has been deeply controversial. This is the first time, however, that the government has formally accused U.S. authorities of overstepping the limits of Irish neutrality."

GAO Report Says US Is Unprepared For Venezuelan Oil Ban. A congressional investigation has found that a Venezuelan embargo on oil exports to the US would cause an immediate 15% surge in world oil prices. The Financial Times (6/14, Webb-Vidal) reports that the GAO study, "obtained by the Financial Times before its release this month, warns that the US is inadequately prepared for a potential loss of oil from Venezuela. The investigation was requested 18 months ago by Senator Richard Lugar, Republican chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, reflecting growing concerns about the reliability of Venezuelan oil supplies."

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Luhnow, 2.11M) also reports on the GAO study. According to the Journal, "The report tries to measure how vulnerable the US is to both short-term and longer-term disruptions in the flow from Venezuela, where President Hugo Chávez has been a vociferous critic of US policy. It calculates, for instance, that a six-month stoppage of Venezuelan output would lead to a short-term price spike of $11 a barrel of oil and cost the US economy some $23 billion. Such a stark turn is unlikely, however, because Mr. Chávez relies on the US as his biggest buyer of oil and needs the revenue to fund half his government's populist agenda."

Oil-Producing Countries Using Leverage Over Consuming Nations. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Bahree, Cummins, 2.11M) reports that there is an "enduring shift in the balance of power between the fuel-guzzling West and oil-rich developing countries." The West's "mutual dependency is unraveling and a new order is taking shape, turning the tables on America, its allies and other big energy consumers. Major exporting nations have concluded that they have more leverage than ever before over consuming countries."

Canadian Conservative Draws Comparisons To Chavez. The New York Times (6/14, Austen, 1.19M) reports that Danny Williams, a member of the Conservative Party of Canada, "is being compared to a self-proclaimed revolutionary, the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chávez. … Since walking out on talks with a group led by Exxon Mobil and the Canadian subsidiary of Chevron over the development of the Hebron oil field this spring, Mr. Williams has never been more popular, at least at home. And he has since bolstered that gain by threatening to propose a new law that would revoke the lease on the property that has been held by the oil consortium for more than two decades." Williams' "battle with some of the world's largest oil companies over a last major offshore reserve has led critics to label him a revolutionary — kind of a North American version of Mr. Chávez."

Bush To Take Koizumi On Tour Of Graceland. USA Today (6/14, Dorell, 2.31M) reports that will take Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on a guided tour through Graceland during Koizumi's lat official US visit. Koizumi "will get to visit the home and final resting place of the King on June 30, a day after he and Bush discuss human rights and the US-Japanese alliance, the Japanese Embassy said." The visit ""will be the first visit by any sitting president or world leader, said Jack Soden, chief executive of Elvis Presley Enterprises, which manages the estate."

The Washington Post (6/14, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "The trip had to have been Koizumi's idea. The 64-year-old PM is well known as the most serious Elvis disciple of today's world leaders. He shares a birthday (Jan. 8) with the rock icon, and his brother once ran the Presley fan club's Yokohama chapter. In 1987, he was one of the key players in erecting a bronze statue of Presley in Tokyo. He's sung Elvis tunes poolside at Bush's Crawford ranch and dazzled Condi Rice with his knowledge of Elvis trivia at a G8 dinner."

DOJ_NMG_0033592

Somali Militias Seek To Reassure Western Leaders. The Washington Post (6/14, A17, Timberg, 744K) reports, "The Islamic militias that took over the capital of Somalia last week are seeking to solidify their rule while reassuring Western leaders that they do not intend to impose an extremist, Taliban-style government on that battered East African country, diplomats, analysts and militia officials say. … This contrasts starkly with initial reports that the loosely organized militias are dominated by religious fundamentalists bent on delivering a purist vision of Islamic law, including the banning of certain films, the chopping off of robbers' hands and the public execution of murderers."

US Sends Conciliatory Signals To Somalia. The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the US on Thursday "will initiate a 'Somalia contact group' of interested countries and organizations to begin deliberating on how the international community can help stabilize what experts consider to be a 'failed state.'" The US "is sending out conciliatory signals to the Islamic Courts Union, which vows to turn Somalia into a religious state under sharia law. In addition to setting up the international contact group, the State Department is issuing cautious, open-minded statements toward the advancing Islamists. The tone suggests a carefully revised US position on Somalia, analysts say."

Before US Visit, Uribe Orders Investigations Into Police Scandal. The Washington Times (6/14, Salisbury, 90K) reports that as newly elected Colombian President Alvaro Uribe prepares to meet with President Bush at the White House today, an "explosive new scandal has placed the Colombian military under unusual pressure." Before leaving Colombia for the US, Uribe "ordered investigations into reputed extrajudicial executions by government troops and the possibility of illegal 'paramilitary' and drug-trafficking infiltration of the Colombian army, the Colombian presidential intelligence service, and the Colombian national police."

Meyerson Calls Proposed Colombia Trade Agreement "Ridiculous." Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K) that the Administration's proposed trade agreement with the government of Colombia is "ridiculous." Colombia's million-member union movement functions "is no fan of the proposed trade accord, which it fears will allow US agribusiness to undercut Colombia's non-drug-related agricultural economy while doing nothing about the nation's abysmal standards of worker rights. For the average Colombian, the trade agreement would add insult to what is all too often deadly injury."

Senate Measure Would Establish Permanent Trade Relations With Vietnam. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) reported, "A bipartisan group of senators, led by Montana Democrat Max Baucus and Oregon Republican Gordon Smith, are launching a drive to waive Cold War-era restrictions that limit trade with Vietnam. Legislation backed by the senators would establish permanent trade relations between the US and Vietnam, ensuring Vietnam is accorded the same basic US trade benefits as all other members of the World Trade Organization."

UN Preparing For New Peacekeeping Mission In East Timor. The AP (6/14) reports that UN Secretary General Kofi Annan yesterday said he would send a team to East Timor. Annan said the team would "prepare for the return of United Nations peacekeepers," but he "warned that a new mission would need at least six more months to set up." The AP adds that Annan "also bluntly suggested that the Security Council had scaled down the previous United Nations peacekeeping mission in East Timor too quickly. That, he said, was partly responsible for new violence that has killed more than 30 people in the last month."

The Washington Post (6/14, A18, Lynch, 744K) reports, "The new UN mission would replace an Australian-led multinational force of about 2,700 troops that intervened in East Timor last month to quell fighting between military factions, which threatened the stability of the world's youngest independent nation. A senior UN envoy, Ian Martin, told reporters that the mission would provide law and order primarily in Dili, the capital, in advance of East Timor's May 2007 presidential and legislative elections."

Agencies Paying Millions In AIDS Incentives. The Washington Times (6/14, Palmer, 90K) reports, "Across the impoverished continent, aid agencies are doling out millions of dollars on 'allowance' fees and per diems, financial incentives for people in countries hard hit by the AIDS epidemic to attend meetings and seminars to learn how to prevent it. Although widely practiced, the custom is rarely talked about: Donors would likely be shocked if they knew their dollars were the only thing that can lure to AIDS seminars the very people who should be most interested in promoting development and battling the disease."

DOJ_NMG_0033593

NYTimes Researcher's Trial In China To Begin This Week. The New York Times (6/14, Lague, 1.19M) reports that the trial of a New York Times researcher who is accused of disclosing state secrets and fraud will begin In Beijing Friday. The researcher, Zhao "has been in custody for 22 months without appearing in court. … The accusation that he disclosed state secrets arose from a September 2004 article published in The Times that reported that a former president, Jiang Zemin, had offered to resign his post as head of the military, according to the indictment. The article prompted a high-level leak investigation by the governing Communist Party. Mr. Jiang resigned two weeks later. Mr. Zhao denies the charges. The Times also denies that Mr. Zhao disclosed state secrets."

Power Restored To US Mission In Cuba. Electricity has been restored to the US mission in Cuba. The AP (6/14, Snow) reports that the power was restored "after Washington accused Fidel Castro's government of deliberately cutting off the building's power. Cuba denied the charge." On Monday, US officials "accused Cuba of harassing the American mission by deliberately cutting off power and reducing the water supply." The Washington Times (6/14, 90K) also runs the AP story this morning.

Russian Law Enforcement Agencies Said To Be Acting To Enrich Corrupt Officials. The New York Times (6/14, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "On March 29, agents of the Interior Ministry seized 167,500 mobile phones that Motorola had shipped into Sheremetyevo Airport in Moscow, dragging the company into the Kafkaesque world where Russian justice intersects with business." The Times adds, "With a shadowy economy, a growing bureaucracy and a capricious embrace of law, Russia has long been a maddening place for businesses to operate, a developing market that is at once lucrative and full of risks. But the experience of Motorola has highlighted what executives, analysts and even some pro-government lawmakers in a largely pliant Parliament say is a worrisome trend: law enforcement agencies are not only taking sides in commercial disputes, but also precipitating them to enrich corrupt officials and their intermediaries."

Humanitarian Funding For Darfur Running Low. The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 9, 4:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported that in Darfur, "three years ago, open warfare broke out when ethnic African farmers rose up against the Arab-led government, which responded by unleashing these nomad Arab militias. Since then, at least 180,000 people have died and 2 million have been driven from their homes." CBS (Logan) added, "This overstretched clinic itself may not survive. It's one of only two medical facilities serving more than 40,000 people here in Zam Zam Camp in North Darfur. But it's being forced to close in two weeks because it's run out of money. There was no shortage of funding when the crisis in Darfur began three years ago with fighting between local rebels and the government of Sudan allied with Arab militias. With whole villages abandoned as people fled the fighting, foreign aid money came pouring into camps like this. Today, these people's needs are still great, but international interest and donations are fading. There are 20,000 people living here, but that's just a tiny fraction of the two million people in Darfur who have been forced out of their homes and live in camps like this, where, as you can see, there's little or no protection from the harsh desert climate, and they rely entirely on aid for their survival. That aid comes primarily from organizations like the International Rescue Committee, which runs projects across Darfur. But they can't reach everyone."

ElBaradei Lauds US-India Deal, Touts Disarmament. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K), IAEA Director-General and Nobel laureate Mohamed ElBaradei suggests "new approaches in a number of areas" to improve the international nonproliferation regime. Nations with nuclear weapons should "recommit" to disarmament, and must "tighten controls" on nuclear fuel that might include an IAEA-run nuclear fuel bank for civilian reactor operators." ElBaradei continues, "However fervently we might wish it," Israel, India and Pakistan, which "remain outside the NPT," are not "likely to give up [their] nuclear weapons or the nuclear weapons option outside of a global or regional arms control framework. Our traditional strategy -- of treating such states as outsiders -- is no longer a realistic method of bringing these last few countries into the fold." The U.S.-India nuclear cooperation agreement "is a creative break with the past that, handled properly, will be a first step forward for both India and the international community. India will get safe and modern technology to help lift more than 500 million people from poverty, and it will be part of the international effort to combat nuclear terrorism and rid our world of nuclear weapons." El-Baradei concludes, "No one ever said controlling nuclear weapons was going to be easy. It will take courage,… tenacity…a great deal more outside-of-the-box thinking, and a sense of realism," but "it will be worth the effort."

DOJ_NMG_0033594

Italian Foreign Minister Says He'll Work To Strengthen Euro-Atlantic Ties. Massimo D'Alema, the foreign minister of Italy, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M), "In a few days I will travel to Washington with a simple and clear message. The new government in Rome is committed to building a stronger Euro-Atlantic community. … The Italian center-left opposed military intervention in Iraq in March 2003. This does not mean, however, that the new Romano Prodi government will turn Italy into a less useful partner for Washington. The opposite may well prove true. … There is no readymade recipe for the tangle of issues that hamper progress in the broader Middle East, but Europe and the U.S. can and should devise a regional strategy equally convincing to both sides of the Atlantic, and combine their resources in pursuit of shared visions."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Security Crackdown Begins In Baghdad."
"Paralyzed L.A. Officer Glad To Be Alive."
"Top Bush Aide Rove Won't Be Charged."
"A Wok With Jesus: Saving Souls In Chinese Kitchens."
"Sunbather's Death Puts Focus On SUV Patrols."
"An English-Only Beef In A Cheesesteak Joint? Comin' Right Up."
"USC May Be Spoiler In NFL Coliseum Plan."

USA Today:
"FEMA Lost $1B To Fraud, Errors."
"Traumas Create Unwitting Test Subjects."
"Some Muslims Press Public Spaces To Make Room For Women's Modesty."

New York Times:
"Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Iraq To Press Leadership."
"No Rove Charges Over Testimony In C.I.A. Leak."
"Israeli Missiles Kill 10 In Gaza."
"Lives Suspended On Gulf Coast, Crammed Into 240 Square Feet."
"Hiding In Plain Sight, Google Expands Its Power."

Washington Post:
"Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case, Lawyer Says."
"Webb Wins Democratic Nomination In Virginia."
"In Baghdad, Bush Pledges Support To Iraqi Leader."
"Strapped States Try New Route, Lease Toll Roads To Foreign Firms."

Washington Times:
"If You're A Council Friend, You Don't Pay."
"Bush Drops By Baghdad."
"To U.S., World Cup Is Ho-Hum."
"Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case."
"Liberal Groups Treat Hillary To Jeers, Cheers."

Detroit Free Press:
"Doctor's Wife Beaten, Drugged."
"Union Votes $60 Million For Growth, Survival."
"Bush To Iraq: It's Up To You."
"Is $5 Million Fair For Fairways."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Bush Drops In On Iraq."
"Cabinet Official Is Primary User Of CDC Jet."
"Prison For Ex-Mayor."
"$752 – It's A Lot For Some 'People.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"Bush Offers Reassurance In A Surprise Visit To Iraq."
"Super-Secret 'Googleplex.'"
"More City Parking Tickets Are Sticking."
"With Cloud Of Indictment Past, Rove Free To Strategize."
"Risky Acts In Spotlight After Steeler QB's Injury."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Trip; Baghdad Security Plan; Zarqawi Successor-Threats; Israel-Gaza Explosion; Rove-No Indictment; Tropical Storm Alberto; FEMA-Katrina Fraud; Electronic Stability Control; Pittsburgh QB Recovery; KFC-Transfat Lawsuit; Woodruff Recovery.

DOJ_NMG_0033595

CBS: Bush-Iraq Trip; Iraq Visit-Secrecy; Rove-No Indictment; Tropical Storm Alberto; FEMA-Katrina Fraud; NIH-Tissue Sample Fraud; Stock Markets; Type 2 Diabetes Drug; Darfur-Funding Shortage; Funeral-CBS Soundman.
NBC: Bush-Iraq Trip; Iraq Trip-Political Strategy; Iraq Violence; Rove-No Indictment; Tropical Storm Alberto; FEMA-Katrina Fraud; Patrick Kennedy-Guilty Plea; Foster Care-Abuse Allegations; Stock Markets; USS New York.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Baghdad Visit; Rove-CIA Leak; Tropical Storm Alberto; House-Minimum Wage.
NPR: Iraq-Security Crackdown; Bush-Baghdad Visit; Pentagon-Interrogation Techniques; Conway Nomination; Wall Street; Tropical Storm Alberto; House-Cost Of Living Raise; Primary Elections.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the President of Colombia; meets with members of the Iraq Study Group, Roosevelt Room; attends the congressional picnic, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Participates in a tour of part of the National Gallery of Art collection with Leila Castellaneta, wife of Ambassador Giovanni Castellaneta.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. SENATE FLOOR _ Meets for morning business; then resumes consideration of H.R. 4939.

9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Hearing on liability issues in the cleanup of abandoned hardrock mines. EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson; Dennis E. Ellis Executive Director, Colorado Dept. of Public Health and Environment; Velma M. Smith, National Environmental Trust; John Gioia, Chair, Board of Supervisors, Contra Costa Public Works; Terry Harwood, former Executive Director Hazardous Material Policy Council, USDA; Scott A. Lewis, Director, Environmental and Governmental Affairs, AngloGold Ashanti North America Inc. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee hearing on S. 374, the Tribal Parity Act, and S. 1535, the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe Equitable Compensation Amendments Act. Testimony from the Lower Brule Sioux Tribe; Crow Creek Sioux Tribe; Morgan, Angel & Associates; Great Plains Tribal Chairmans Association; Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe. Location: Room 485, Russell.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on communications laws. FTC Commissioner William Kovacic; Vinton Cerf - Vice President and chief Internet evangelist, Google Inc.; David L. Cohen, Comcast Corp., Philadelphia; Walter McCormick, president and CEO, U.S. Telecom Association; Christopher Putala, Earthlink Inc.; Blair Levin, Stifel, Nicolaus and Co. Inc., St. Louis; Paul T. Morris, Utah Telecommunication Open Infrastructure Agency; John Kuhns, Pennsylvania State University. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and votes on nominations, followed by a hearing on proposed changes in the Federal Accounting Standards Board rules on retirement plans. Chairman Robert Herz, David Tweedie of the International Accounty Standards Board. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Technology, Innovation and Competitiveness Subcommittee. Hearing on alternative energy technologies. Alan Gotcher, Altair Nanotechnologies, Inc.; Francis Preli, Jr., UTC Power; K.R. Sridhar, Ion America Corp.; Thomas Werner, SunPower Corp.; Peter Corsell, GridPoint, Inc.; George Taylor, Ocean Power Technologies, Inc.; Daniel Raudebaugh, Center for Transportation and the Environment. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on extension of the Mark-to-Market program of HUD that helps to provide affordable housing. Deputy Assistant HUD Secretary Ted Toon; Chris Foster, President, National Leased Housing Association. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed meeting on pending business. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 5576 - Transportation, Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, the Judiciary, the

DOJ_NMG_0033596

District of Columbia, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on NIH research policies regarding human tissue samples. Thomas Insel, Director, National Institute of Mental Health, NIH; Dr. David L. Friedman, Madison, Conn.; Trey Sunderland, Geriatric Psychiatry Branch, National Institute of Mental Health, NIH; Karen Putman, formerly with the NIMH, Wyoming, OH; Michael Gottesman, Intramural Research, NIH. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R.5450 - National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Act. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 4890 - Line Item Veto Act of 2006. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Workforce Protections Subcommittee. Hearing on Labor Department's use of non-consensus standards for workplace health and safety. Assistant Labor Secretary Edwin Foulke; Joseph Casper, Brick Industry Association; others. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on implementation of the Medicare prescription drug benefit, beneficiary enrollment and lessons learned. Testimony tentatively scheduled from HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt; HHS Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Administrator Mark McClellan; Connecticut Dept. of Social Services; Pharmaceutical Care Management Association; Families USA; American Health Insurance Plans; National Council on Aging; National Association of Insurance Commissioners. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

11 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on waste and fraud following Hurricane Katrina. Testimony from Donna Daniels, FEMA, Dept. of Homeland Security; Joseph Becker, American Red Cross; GAO. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

11 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Subcommittee Oversight Hearing on ``Modern-Day Slavery: Spotlight on the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, Forced Labor, and Sex Trafficking at the World Cup." Briefing by Julia Ormond, UN Goodwill Ambassador; testimony from Department of State; International Justice Mission; as well as two Russian trafficking victims. Location: 2172 Rayburn House Office Bldg.

11 a.m. RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on H.R. 4761 - Domestic Energy Production through Offshore Exploration and Equitable Threatment of State holds Act of 2006. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

1 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on Deepwater implementation. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on how to inform parents and protect children from violent and explicit video games. Testimony from the FTC, Wal-Mart, Entertainment Software Association, Entertainment Software Rating Board, Kids Risk Project, Children's Technology Review, and the National Institute on Media and the Family. Location: 2123 Rayburn.

2 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Intelligence, Information Sharing and Terrorism Risk Assessment Subcommittee. Hearing on TSA's Office of Intelligence. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

3 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Terrorism/Human Intelligence, Analysis and Counterintelligence Subcommittee. Closed briefing on Title 50 and Title 10. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

Other: PRESIDENT ALVARO URIBE VELEZ OF COLOMBIA _ Highlights: 11 a.m. Meets with President Bush, White House; 12 p.m. Photo op of meeting with USTR Susan Schwab. 600 17th St. NW.

REGIONAL LEADERS _ Rep. Ruben Hinojosa hosts the 5th Regional Leaders Conference for local elected officials, education administrators, municipal representatives others. Highlights: 8:15 a.m. Deputy Agriculture Secretary Chuck Connor. 8:45 a.m. Sen. Robert Menendez. 9 a.m. NIH Director Elias Zerhouni and CMMS Administrator Mark McClellan. 10 a.m. Rep. Steny Hoyer. 11:15 a.m. Reps. Luis Gutierrez and Silvestre Reyes on immigration reform and border security. 11:45 a.m. Rep. George Miller. Location: Jefferson Building, Library of Congress.

ENERGY CONFERENCE _ The U.S. Energy Association holds its 17th annual Energy Efficiency Forum.

DOJ_NMG_0033597

Highlights: 8:55 a.m. Cheng Lianyuan, Director, Beijing Municipal Bureau of Industrial Development. 10 a.m. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. 10:30 a.m. Timothy Wirth, President UN Foundation and Better World Fund. 11 a.m. Pennyslvania Gov. Ed Rendell. 11:30 a.m. Panel discussion on balancing energy supply and demand, with President Red Cavaney of the American Petroleum Institute, Edison Electric Institute President Thomas Kuhn, American Gas Association President David Parker. 1 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman. Location: National Press Club.

TAKE BACK AMERICA _ Speakers at today's Campaign for America's Future meeting include: Sens. Russ Feingold and Barack Obama, Reps. Lynn Woolsey, Bernie Saunders and others. Highlights: 9 a.m. Russ Feingold. 11:15 a.m. Reps. Lynn Woolsey and Bernie Saunders and former Ambassador and author Joe Wilson. 12:45 p.m. Sen. Barack Obama and Rep. Jan Schakowsky. Location: Washington Hilton.

GLOBAL DEVELOPMENT _ The Initiative for Global Development holds its National Summit. Speakers include Bill Gates, Sr., former EPA Administrator Bill Ruckelshaus, retired Gen. John Shalikashvili, former Secretaries of State Madeleine Albright and Colin Powell. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SENATE-FLAG AMENDMENT _ 8:45 a.m. Senate Majority Leader Frist and other members of the Senate join Maj. Gen. Patrick Brady, U.S. Army (Ret.) and Chicago Cubs great Rick Monday and former Miss America Heather French at news conference on the Flag Protection Amendment. Location: Russell Senate Park.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 9 a.m. House Democratic Caucus meets, followed by stakeout. Location: 345 Cannon House Office Bldg.

HOUSE GOP _ 9 a.m. House Republicans meet, followed by stakeout. Location: Capitol Hill Club.

DEMOCRATS-ACCOUNTABILITY _ 10 a.m. House Democrats hold a news conference on oversight and accountability, with Reps. Nancy Pelosi, Steny Hoyer, others. Location: Cannon Rotunda, outside 345 Cannon. Notes: Follows 9 a.m. closed House Democratic Caucus meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 10 a.m. The House Republican leadership holds a media availability on supporting the troops in Iraq. Location: Stakeout area, outside the Capitol Hill Club. Notes: Follows closed 9 a.m. House GOP Conference meeting.

RUMSFELD _ 10 a.m. Defense Secretary Rumsfeld hosts honor cordon to welcome Ecuador's Minister of National Defense Oswaldo Jarrin. Location: Steps of Pentagon Mall Entrance.

EMERGENCY HEALTH CARE _ 11 a.m. The Institute of Medicine (IOM) hosts a briefing, ``Improving Emergency Care in the United States.'' The event, part of an IOM series, describes in detail the current state of the emergency medical system and recommends ways to end overcrowding and ambulance diversions, overcome financial problems, achieve better preparedness for disasters, and provide suitable care for pediatric patients. Briefers include: Gail L. Warden (chair), president emeritus, Henry Ford Health System, Detroit; Benjamin K. Chu, regional president, Southern California Kaiser Foundation Health Plan and Hospital, Pasadena, Calif.; A. Brent Eastman, chief medical officer, Scripps Health, San Diego; Shirley Gamble, consultant, Austin, Texas; and Marianne Gausche-Hill, clinical professor of medicine and director of pre-hospital care, Harbor-UCLA Medical Center, Torrance, Calif. Location: Room 100, National Academies' Keck Center, 500 Fifth St. NW.

IRAN-NEIGHBORS _ 11 a.m. Release of a public opinion survey by Terror Free Tomorrow in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey on Iran's nuclear weapons program. Notes: For details, contact Tracy Zimmerman, 202-518-8047.

DEMOCRATS-FLAG AMENDMENT _ 11:30 a.m. Sens. Patrick Leahy, Russ Feingold and Edward Kennedy hold news conference with members of veterans opposed to a Constitutional amendment on flag desecration. Location: Senate Swamp.

IRAQ-DEMOCRATS _ 11:30 a.m. Democratic members of the House Armed Services Committee hold a news conference on Iraq. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

LATINO LUNCHEON _ 11:30 a.m. Texas State Sen. Leticia Van de Putte gives the keynote speech at the Latino Leaders Luncheon. Location: St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K Sts. NW.

NICARAGUA _ 11:30 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a discussion with Nicaraguan presidential candidate Eduardo Montealegre. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

US ENERGY POLICY _ 12:30 a.m. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman addresses Johnson Controls 17th Annual

DOJ_NMG_0033598

Energy Efficiency Forum in Washington, DC. He's expected to discuss the administration's Advanced Energy Initiative and the importance of renewable energy. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

DEMOCRATS-AGENDA _ 12 p.m. The 21st Century Democrats organization holds a roundtable discussion with Democratic candidates from around the country about the challenges and promises facing the Democratic Party and the progressive movement. Location: National Press Club.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE _ 12:30 p.m. Supporters of the Pledge Protection Act, to keep the words ``under God'' in the Pledge of Allegiance, hold a news conference. Congressional sponsors of the legislation will attend. Location: Russell Senate Park.

DEMOCRATS-CONFERENCE CALL _ 1 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Reps. Charles Rangel, George Miller, Collin Peterson and Rosa DeLauro hold conference call to discuss Democrats' commitment to fight for a New Direction for America. Contacts: Brendan Daly, 202-226-7616. Notes: call 888-283-1645; code 061406.

IRAQ _ 1 p.m. Reps. Martin Meehan, Neil Abercrombie, Walter Jones and Ron Paul hold a news conference to discuss the House leaderhip's unwillingness to hold a full debate on the Iraq war. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

JOHANNS _ 1:15 p.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks to the Nebraska Bankers Association meeting. Location: Beacon Hotel, 1615 Rhode Island Ave. NW.

INTERNET FREEDOM _ 1:45 p.m. Sens. Olympia Snowe (R-ME) and Byron Dorgan (D-ND) hold news conference along with the Christian Coalition, Moveon.org and other groups. They're supporting the Internet Freedom Preservation Act. Location: Russeell Senate Park.

NEW ORLEANS HOUSING-HUD _ 2 p.m. US Housing Secretary Alphonso Jackson holds teleconference to announce HUD's plan to reopen and redevelop New Orleans public housing. Contacts: Donna White, 202-708-0685. Notes: Call 800-377-4872; ask for chairperson Alphonso Jackson.

SENATE-BUDGET _ 2 p.m. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist hold press conference to discuss improvements to the budget process. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

VETERANS-ID THEFT _ 2:30 p.m. Senators Akaka, Murray, Clinton, Salazar hold news conference on Veterans ID theft. Location: Senate Studio.

IRAQ-DEATHS _ 3 p.m. Take Back America organization holds a silent walk with banners, signs and flag-draped coffins in response to the U.S. military deaths in Iraq. Location: Starts at the Washington Hilton and proceeds to the White House.

THEOCRACY-ELECTIONS _ 3:30 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion on ``American Theocracy: Comments on the Forthcoming 2006 Elections,'' with author Kevin Phillips, others. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CULTURAL AWARENESS _ 5:30 p.m. Sens. Edward Kennedy and Richard Lugar, others, meet more than 250 high school students from the Islamic world who are participating in the Cultural Bridges program. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

ARMED FORCES _ 6 p.m. Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England addresses Armed Forces Foundation 2nd annual gala. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Pentagon Will Not Hide Interrogation Tactics 3
Opening Arguments Made At Terrorism Trial In Arkansas 3
Family Of Guantanamo Detainee Doubts He Committed Suicide 3
Cleric Linked To 2002 Bali Bombings Released From Prison 3
Muslim Man Shot In London Raid Says Police Fired Without Warning 4

Homeland Response:

Counter Terrorism Officials Tell Senators Of Disrupted Homegrown Sleeper Cells 4
9th Circuit Hears Arguments On Proposed California Biodefense Lab 4
DHS To Review Proposals For Missile Defense Systems On Commercial Planes 5
US Navy Building Ship To Honor New York 5
NYTimes Urges Senate Not To Pass Chemical Plant Security Bill 5
GAO Finds FEMA Lost At Least $1 Billion To Hurricane Relief Fraud, Waste 5
Alberto Causes Little Damage In Florida 6

War News:

Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Baghdad 6
Iraqi, US Forces To Launch Offensive Against Insurgents 9
Rumsfeld, Rice, Brief Lawmakers On Iraq 9
Defense Phase Of Saddam Trial Ends 9
US To Probe Video Of Marine Making Light Of Killing Iraqi Family 9
Gore Says Rumsfeld Should Resign 10
Injured ABC Anchor Visits Newsroom 10
CBS Soundman Killed In Iraq Buried In London 10
Iraqis Continue "Exodus" To Syria, Jordan 10
US-Led Coalition To Launch Offensive Against Taliban 10
Administration Announces Nominee For Marine Commandant .. 10

Corporate Scandals:

SEC To Crack Down On Backdating Of Stock Options 10
Enron Broadband Jurors Say They Were Pressured To Convict 11
White House Increases Pressure On Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac 12
SEC Opens Mutual Fund Rules For Comment 12
SEC Nears Naming Of Accounting Oversight Board Head 13
Cooperative Accounting Regulation Urged 13

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Won't Charge Rove In CIA Leak Investigation 13
DOJ Challenges House Leaders On Searches 15
Judge Postpones Safavian Jury Deliberations Due To Misconduct Allegation 16
Convicted "Mafia Cops" Seek Reversals For Inadequate Representation 16
Former Chicago City Clerk Sentenced To 2 Years In Prison 16
Mississippi County Official Pleads Not Guilty To Katrina Kickback Charges 17
California Man Pleads Guilty To Racketeering In Israel Cartel Case 17
Duke Basketball Star Charged With Drunk Driving 17
Antigua Challenges US Online Gaming Laws 17
Patrick Kennedy Pleads Guilty To Driving While Impaired 17
FBI Web Site Seeks Public Corruption Tips 18
Box Blown Up Near Miami Federal Courthouse May Have Contained Criminal Evidence 18

Civil Rights:

DOJ Cites Deaths, Violence In Probe Of DC Mental Facility 19
DOJ Investigating Deaths By Police Taser Use 19
Minneapolis Weighing Excessive Force Charges Against Two Police Officers 19
Maryland Alien Smuggling Suspects Face New Charges 19
EEOC Said To Be Falling Behind On Cases 20
Some Fear Public Accommodations Will Spark Backlash Against Muslim Women 20
Hentoff Criticizes ACLU Efforts To Quiet Dissenters 20

Antitrust:

Blockbuster Accuses Netflix Of Antitrust Violations In Patent Dispute 20
Fight Over Net Neutrality Moves Back To Senate 20
Apple Can Learn Lessons From EU's Treatment Of Microsoft ... 21
EU Moves Up Deadline For Suez-GDF Ruling 21
Mittal Issues Growth Projection To Help Arcelor Bid 21
Intellectual Ventures Sparks Concerns About Patent Stockpiling 21

Environment:

Judge Dismisses Part Of Criminal Charge Against WR Grace ... 22

DOJ Enters Colorado Land-Use Dispute ... 22
Senate Republicans Scrap Vote On Bush Mine Safety Nominee 22
Friedman Says GM Should Focus On Making Fuel-Efficient Vehicles ... 22
WPost Says Supreme Court Should Hear EPA Case ... 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In "Major Rebuke" To Seattle SAC, FBI Reassigns US Attorney Murder Probe ... 22
Federal Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 6 In Drug-Trafficking Case ... 23
Appeals Court Upholds 2 Murder Convictions In Louisiana ... 23
WADA Chairman Says National Hockey League Drug Testing Is Flawed ... 23
Search Of Grimsley's Home In Baseball Steroid Investigation Called Surprising ... 23
Afghanistan Poppy Harvest Expected To Reach Record Levels 23
New Marshals Service Head Profiled ... 23
Captured Fugitive Gunman Faces Weapons Charges In Wisconsin ... 23

Immigration:

Judge Sets $350,000 Bail For Border Patrol Agent ... 24
Hastert Considers Holding Hearings On Senate Immigration Bill 24

Tax:

Former Atlanta Mayor Sentenced For Tax Evasion ... 24

Congress-Administration:

House Approves Emergency Spending Bill ... 25
Rehnquist Legacy Being Reassessed ... 25
New Agriculture Department General Counsel Profiled ... 25
Leavitt Touts Welfare Reform Adjustments ... 26
Medicare Overhaul Legislation Seen As Taking Shape ... 26
House Appropriations Panel Votes To Increase Minimum Wage 26
House Accepts Pay Raise ... 26
Murtha Suspending Bid For Majority Leader ... 27
McConnell Seen As Preparing For Senate Majority Leader ... 27
Mollohan Amends Financial Disclosures, Maintains Innocence .. 27
Clients Boosted Payments Of Lewis Aides' Former Firm ... 27
Democratic Leaders To Unveil Domestic Agenda ... 28
Report Alleges Misconduct By NIH Alzheimer's Researcher ... 28
Filner Curses VA "Spin Doctor" Over Data Theft Response ... 28
Bill Would Restrict Consumer Ability To Freeze Credit Reports .. 29
Author Says Executive Privilege Not An Absolute Right ... 29
NYTimes Calls Obama's Proposed Deal With Automakers "Worthy New Idea." ... 29

Other News:

Sluggish Retail Sales May Indicate Slowing Economy ... 29
Former Reagan Navy Secretary Wins Virginia Democratic Senate Primary ... 30
Liberal Jeers For Clinton Over Iraq Stance Seen As Revealing Deep Democratic Split ... 31
Clinton Tries To Refocus Debate On Abortion ... 31
Rove Seeks To Draw Clear Distinctions Between GOP, Democrats ... 32
Laura Bush Campaigns With Kean In New Jersey ... 32
DeLay Recorded Phone Message For VA8 Primary Candidate . 32
Giuliani Outlines Energy Strategy ... 32
Gore Says He Has No Plans To Run Again ... 33
Hayworth Invitation Calls Quayle 44th US President ... 33
States Said To Have Financial Incentive To Encourage Adoption 33
States Consider Privatizing Parts Of Interstate Highway System 33
Israel Kills Terrorists, Civilians In Gaza Strike ... 33
Four Chinese Companies Sanctioned For Aiding Iran ... 34
Pew Poll Shows US Global Image Weakening ... 34
US Seen As "Quietly Beginning To Accept" ICC ... 34
US Military Violated Irish Law By Transporting Convicted Marine Through Airport ... 34
GAO Report Says US Is Unprepared For Venezuelan Oil Ban .. 34
Bush To Take Koizumi On Tour Of Graceland ... 35
Somali Militias Seek To Reassure Western Leaders ... 35
Before US Visit, Uribe Orders Investigations Into Police Scandal 35
Senate Measure Would Establish Permanent Trade Relations With Vietnam ... 36
UN Preparing For New Peacekeeping Mission In East Timor ... 36
Agencies Paying Millions In AIDS Incentives ... 36
NYTimes Researcher's Trial In China To Begin This Week ... 36
Power Restored To US Mission In Cuba ... 36
Russian Law Enforcement Agencies Said To Be Acting To Enrich Corrupt Officials ... 36
Humanitarian Funding For Darfur Running Low ... 36
ElBaradei Lauds US-India Deal, Touts Disarmament ... 37
Italian Foreign Minister Says He'll Work To Strengthen Euro-Atlantic Ties ... 37

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 37

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 38

DOJ_NMG_0033601

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Will Not Hide Interrogation Tactics. The AP (6/13, Baldor) reports, "The Pentagon has dropped plans to keep some interrogation techniques secret by putting them in a classified section of a military manual." It had come under pressure from human rights advocates and members of Congress. The article notes that Secretary Rumsfeld "said for the first time last month that officials were at odds over whether the manual should endorse different interrogation techniques for enemy insurgents than are allowed for regular prisoners of war."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/14, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports the Defense Department is also "expected to drop a plan to have one set of interrogation methods for detainees that the military considers 'unlawful combatants,' like detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and another set for traditional prisoners of war captured on the battlefield." It lists numerous critics of the planned classification of interrogation policy: GOP Sens. John McCain, John Warner, and Lindsey Graham; Gens. John Abizard and Peter Schoonmaker; and Elisa Massimino of Human Rights Watch.

Opening Arguments Made At Terrorism Trial In Arkansas. The Springdale (AR) Morning News (6/14, Wood) reports that in opening arguments at the trial of former University of Arkansas graduate student Arwah Jaber, accused of providing material support to Palestinian Islamic Jihad and lying to immigration officials, Jaber's lawyers "told jurors Tuesday morning the government's whole case is based on a series of misunderstandings." The attorneys "said he was frustrated by a professor who was not allowing him to graduate with his doctorate degree. They admit he made statements he shouldn't have made but he had no intention of violating the law." However, "Federal prosecutors said…that making false statements, using multiple names and someone else's social security number was an indication that Jaber intended to become a martyr for the Palestinian cause against Israel. They say he also made small amounts of an explosive, had Palestinian propaganda and he told numerous people he intended to go fight the Israelis and might not return."

Professors Split On Former Jaber's Aims. The AP (6/14) reports, "Charles Wilkins, a professor of chemistry and Jaber's adviser, testified Tuesday that he told FBI agents he didn't see any inclination toward terrorism in the graduate student. Jaber had recently been denied his doctoral degree in chemistry when he said he was going to Palestine with his wife." However, "David Paul, an associate professor of chemistry who was on Jaber's doctoral dissertation committee, said he noticed Jaber stopped making progress toward his degree after speaking with a friend in Palestine. … 'He needed to go home and make the Israelis sorry,' Paul said."

Family Of Guantanamo Detainee Doubts He Committed Suicide. The Washington Post (6/14, Ambah, 744K) reports the doubts of late Saudi detainee Yassar Talal al-Zharani's family that he killed himself. The family "described a man who was optimistic, stubborn and too devout to have taken his own life." His father "said he believes his son was either hanged by guards or beaten to death by them. The body has not been returned; the father has asked the Saudi government to demand an independent autopsy and investigation." The article quotes a former inmate who says Zharani was a former "Taliban foot soldier" and another who remembers that Zharani was "pushed hard" by interrogators.

Guantanamo Prison Criticized. In the Washington Post (6/14, 744K), columnist David Ignatius says that initial remarks by American officials on the Guantanamo suicides showed him "it's time to close that camp -- not just because of what it's doing to the prisoners but because of how it is dehumanizing the American captors." Ignatius writes of the inmates, "They are human beings and, as such, they have basic human rights."

In the New York Times (6/14, 1.19M), former detainee Mourad Benchellali writes of his two and a half years in the prison, "I cannot describe in just a few lines the suffering and the torture; but the worst aspect of being at the camp was the despair, the feeling that whatever you say, it will never make a difference." Benchellali writes, "I believe that a small number of the detainees at Guantánamo are guilty of criminal acts, but as analysis of the military's documents on the prisoners has shown, there is no evidence that most of the 465 or so men there have committed hostile acts against the United States or its allies."

Cleric Linked To 2002 Bali Bombings Released From Prison. The Financial Times (6/14, Donnan) reports, "Indonesia on Wednesday released radical cleric Abu Bakar Bashir from prison where he finished serving a 30-month sentence for giving his blessing to plans for the 2002 Bali bombings. Supporters have said that the 68-year-old cleric would be returning home to central Java on Wednesday where he is expected to meet with reporters and distribute aid to survivors of last month's earthquake in the area."

The Washington Times/AP (6/14, Hakim) notes "the Bush administration criticized the release," which also

DOJ_NMG_0033602

"sparked disapproval by Australia." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "said the United States was 'deeply disappointed by what we consider a light sentence handed out to this individual.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, McCawley, 61K) says "analysts are downplaying fears that Bashir, accused of being the 'emir' or leader of the militant group Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), will begin ordering bombings." Rather, Bashir "is more likely to use his celebrity to preach fire and brimstone and bolster the cause of hard-line Islam." The New York Times (6/14, Bonner, 1.19M) reports Bashir "has steadfastly denied any involvement in terrorist activities, but has been equally firm in his admiration for Mr. bin Laden, and in his loathing of Jews and the United States. Until Mr. Bashir made common cause with Al Qaeda sometime in the 1990's, the primary goal of Jemaah Islamiyah was the establishment of an Islamic state in Indonesia. Mr. Bashir is expected to return to proselytizing for that cause." The Times adds, "Jemaah Islamiyah has been severely weakened by the Indonesian police and intelligence services, terrorism experts here say. Sidney Jones, an authority on Jemaah Islamiyah and the director of the Jakarta office of the International Crisis Group, an organization that studies violent conflicts, said that releasing Mr. Bashir was not likely to increase the threat of terrorism."

Muslim Man Shot In London Raid Says Police Fired Without Warning. The Washington Post (6/14, A17, Jordan, 744K) reports, "A 23-year-old Muslim man who was shot during a massive police raid on his house earlier this month, then released without charge, said Tuesday that an officer fired at him without warning. In his first public statements since the raid early this month, Mohammed Abdul Kahar described himself as a law-abiding man who loved London, his birthplace. His emotional words, delivered at a news conference here, added to the embarrassment that the anti-terrorism raid has caused Scotland Yard."

The New York Times (6/14, Cowell, 1.19M) notes that during the news conference, Kahar "denied being a supporter of violence or terrorism, describing himself as a postal van driver and part-time supermarket worker who 'just wanted to work to please my family, to support my mum and dad.'" The Times adds, "His account could add to sentiment among some of Britain's 1.6 million Muslims that, in the words of Massoud Shajareh of the Islamic Human Rights Commission last weekend, 'they were shot because they were Muslim or perceived to be Muslim.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Counter Terrorism Officials Tell Senators Of Disrupted Homegrown Sleeper Cells. The AP (6/14, Shrader) reports, "U.S. counterterrorism officials say they are uncovering homegrown Islamic radicals inside the United States who lack formal ties to al-Qaeda and operate independently." NCTC Director Vice Adm. John Scott Redd told a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing yesterday that "those independent qualities – combined with the radicals' ability to organize and plot on the Internet – make them particularly difficult to disrupt." Redd cited the Atlanta, Torrance and Lodi arrests as "three potential homegrown organizations that have been disrupted in the U.S. in just over a year." The AP adds, "Showing how the government's mission has changed, Redd said that before 9/11 the FBI wrote 25 intelligence-information reports a year, but now the bureau produces more than 1,000 annually. Still, Delaware Sen. Joe Biden…called it 'on the verge of criminal' that the government is not fully funding the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission, estimated at $42 billion over five years."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/14, Gertz, 90K) reports Redd and State Department counter-terrorism coordinator Henry Crumpton also told the Senators, "Al Qaeda remains a major threat despite the death last week of…Abu Musab Zarqawi." Redd "also said other Sunni extremist groups inspired by al Qaeda are expanding from regional organizations into a global network that may target U.S. interests." The Times adds, "Asked by Committee Chairman Sen. Richard G. Lugar…about a recent terrorist attempt to bomb Saudi Arabian oil fields, Mr. Crumpton said terrorists are trying to attack such economic targets to 'disrupt the oil supplies.'"

9th Circuit Hears Arguments On Proposed California Biodefense Lab. The AP (6/14, Lindlaw) reports, "A federal appeals court judge said Tuesday she found it 'troublesome' that the Bush administration wants to open a lab for testing lethal agents including HIV, plague and anthrax in the densely populated San Francisco Bay Area. … But a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer told the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the administration had thoroughly researched its plans for a biodefense lab at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and concluded there was little risk of a disaster." The AP continues, "If pathogens were to seep from the proposed lab and reach the public, they would have dispersed into such low concentrations they would be unlikely to injure anyone, Justice Department attorney Todd Aagaard said. … A lawyer for the lab's opponents sharply disagreed, saying even a small release could kill thousands." The AP adds, "The government also failed to consider the possibility that a plane or truck could be deliberately crashed into the site 50 miles east of San Francisco, said Stephan Volker, the lab opponents' lead attorney. … Instead, the administration used

DOJ_NMG_0033603

'a one-size-fits-all scenario, borrowed from another agency' when it studied the possible risks, he told the judges. … The Bush adminstration has been preparing the biodefense lab for years, and said this week it plans to open the facility by August. But local residents have been fighting it in the courts. A lower federal court said in September 2004 that it could proceed, and the opponents appealed. The appeals court did not rule on Tuesday."

DHS To Review Proposals For Missile Defense Systems On Commercial Planes. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Keeton, 2.11M) reports DHS will review proposals from Raytheon Co. and Northrop Grumman Corp. this month for systems to protect "commercial aircraft from shoulder-fired missiles." Though a Rand Corp. study "estimated that the initial cost for putting laser jammers on 6,800 commercial planes in the US would be about $11 billion, ballooning to $40 billion over a 10-year period," the defense contractors "say the cost of any of the programs would be substantially less."

US Navy Building Ship To Honor New York. NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 10, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A year from now, the US fleet will have a special new member. A ship bearing the proud name of New York will hit the seas with an already proud and very dynamic story behind it." NBC (Savidge) added, "Just outside New Orleans, the USS New York has twice been touched by tragedy. The Navy amphibious assault ship has seven and a half tons of steel from tower two of the World Trade Center in its bow, and while under construction, Katrina struck." Katrina "gave hundreds of shipyard workers good reason to leave and start over somewhere else. But only half finished, the ship gave them an even better reason to stay." Many "now call the shipyard home, bunking down within sight of the New York, separated from their displaced families."

NYTimes Urges Senate Not To Pass Chemical Plant Security Bill. The New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) editorializes that a chemical plant bill up for debate in the Senate today "could actually make the country less safe. If senators are afraid to stand up to the chemical industry and pass a good bill, they should at least have the courage to do nothing." The bill, drawn up by Sens. Susan Collins and Joseph Lieberman, "needs tough language added requiring chemical plants to replace dangerous chemicals with safer alternatives. The chemical industry is resisting. An even bigger disgrace is that the industry is pushing hard to get 'pre-emption' language added to the bill."

GAO Finds FEMA Lost At Least $1 Billion To Hurricane Relief Fraud, Waste. USA Today (6/14, Hall, 2.31M) reports a GAO report to be released today concludes that FEMA paid "at least $1 billion in questionable disaster-relief claims in the six months after last year's devastating Gulf Coast hurricanes." Relief funds went "to thousands of people who registered with FEMA using information belonging to prison inmates or who provided only a post office box as the address of their damaged home." The GAO said FEMA "needs to immediately put 'adequate safeguards' in place to 'build the American taxpayers' confidence that federal disaster assistance only goes to those in need.'"

ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 7, 2:00, Cochran, 8.78M) reported, "Millions of dollars went to people who registered several times for aid, using the names and Social Security numbers of prison inmates. FEMA also gave out debit cards and cannot verify that cards worth $1.5 million actually went to Katrina victims. … Congress is hopping mad." Investigators "estimate Katrina-related fraud is between $600 million and $1.4 billion. But they say the actual figure is much, much higher because they did not investigate insurance fraud and other bogus claims."

The Washington Post/AP (6/14, A3, Margasak) reports, "To dramatize the problem, the GAO provided lawmakers with a copy of a $2,358 US Treasury check for rental assistance that an undercover agent got using a bogus address. The money was paid even after FEMA learned from its inspector that the undercover applicant did not live at the address." Though FEMA "said it has identified $16.8 million in improperly awarded disaster relief money and has started efforts to collect the money," congressional investigators said they were "95 percent confident that improper and potentially fraudulent payments were much higher: between $600 million and $1.4 billion." The AP article appeared on at least 140 news websites.

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 6, 2:25, Reid, 9.87M) quoted Sen. Susan Collins: "The examples are so egregious that what they tell us is that FEMA didn't perform even basic checks to safeguard taxpayer's money." Reid: "The report says FEMA didn't even try to verify the identities of people who applied for aid by phone, and it says FEMA's fraud controls are weak or nonexistent. More than two thousand people applied for aid from prison and received about $12 million."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 5, 2:20, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News has learned that congressional investigators this week turned over 7,000 cases for possible prosecution." Rep. Michael McCaul, Texas: "I think there was a rush to get the money out without any proper controls put in place by FEMA."

The New York Times (6/14, Lipton, 1.19M) reports McCaul said the "scale of abuse that...far exceeded even his worst fears, despite months of accumulating evidence that the fraud-prevention system at the Federal Emergency Management Agency was woefully inadequate." The GAO found that "aid was used to pay for football tickets, the bill at a Hooters in San Antonio, a $200 bottle of Dom Perignon, 'Girls Gone Wild' videos, even an all-inclusive weeklong Caribbean vacation, the report says." FEMA spokesman Aaron T. Walker "said the agency was moving to correct management weaknesses that might have contributed to the fraud, including establishing a system that will block multiple registrations for aid filed under a single Social Security number."

DOJ_NMG_0033604

Tens Of Thousands Along Gulf Coast Still In FEMA Trailers. The New York Times (6/14, Barry, 1.19M) reports from Hancock County, Mississippi, where there are more than 9,000 FEMA trailers, each containing "lives in claustrophobic suspension." The Times continues that the phrase "FEMA trailer" "has nearly lost meaning, so embedded is it in the national memory of last year's crushing hurricanes, Katrina and Rita." However, "tens of thousands of people continue to live crammed in FEMA trailers, greeting this year's hurricane season the same way they said goodbye to the last one: in light-metal boxes that even a tropical storm could flip like playing cards and which seem so vulnerable alongside the brush fires crackling through some stretches of the Gulf Coast."

Alberto Causes Little Damage In Florida. USA Today (6/14, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports Tropical Storm Alberto landed in Florida "Tuesday with a whimper, but it ratcheted up tension for residents after two years of record storms. … Some low-lying coastal areas and city streets flooded, but the rain was a welcome soaking for Florida's parched pastures, farms and groves in the center of the state. While damage from Alberto appeared minor, residents remain wary."

The New York Times (6/14, Aguayo, 1.19M) reports the storm hit "with heavy rain and high winds, but it did not pose the threat that forecasters had initially feared." Gov. Jeb Bush said the storm was "a good lesson…in preparedness," adding, "I can assure you that if a stronger storm comes our way, we have a great team locally and at the state level."

While the CBS Evening News and ABC World News Tonight ran brief reports noting that Alberto hit Florida as a weaker storm than had previously been expected, a longer report on NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 5, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) seemed to focus on what negative impact the storm did have, reporting that it "is making for an awfully wet and nasty and dangerous Tuesday for parts of Florida's Gulf Coast and points north." NBC (Sanders) added, "One emergency official called Alberto a good rehearsal." Damage is "mostly along the coast. The tide, in some spots, surged more than seven feet. In Citrus County, jail inmates were ordered to help fight back by sandbagging low-lying areas. Power was temporarily knocked out to 21,000 homes and businesses."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/13) reported, "Worries outpace reality: So far, Tropical Storm Alberto has not been as rough as expected. It did threaten Florida, but only managed to menace the state with heavy rain." Fox News' Fox Report (6/13, Smith) reported, "Hurricane, not even close. But Alberto dropped plenty of rain in Florida along the peninsula as the first tropical storm of '06 made landfall."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (6/13, Cooper) reported, "Alberto is more midget than monster, falling short of hurricane. Right now it's cruising toward South Carolina with 40 mph winds, after soaking Florida, sparing it however major damage. In what is expected to be a very busy hurricane season, it could have been so much worse." CNN (Zarrella) added, "For folks in Crystal River on Florida's Gulf Coast, the 'A' in Alberto stood for annoying."

Many Said To Have Defied Evacuation Orders. The Washington Post (6/14, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports from Horseshoe Beach, where despite a hurricane warning that "echoed ceaselessly from televisions," a "City Hall meeting to encourage people to leave" and a mandatory evacuation, "many and maybe most" residents decided to stay. "Scott Garner, chief of emergency management for the county, estimated that only 30 percent of residents in Dixie's coastal communities, which include Horseshoe Beach, complied with the evacuation order. About 50 people went to shelters." Many residents "along the nation's hurricane-threatened coasts, prefer to make the evacuation decision based on personal storm experience and meteorological insight."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Baghdad. President Bush's made a surprise visit to Iraq yesterday. The AP (6/13, Hunt) reports Bush "spent over 5 1/2 hours in Baghdad in his second visit of the three-year war, both kept secret until he had safely arrived. … In a mission designed to both showcase US support for the new unity government and to ease war concerns at home, the president told the Iraqi prime minister the United States would stand by the new government as it works to achieve stability."

The story is receiving extensive media coverage: it led the network newscasts last night, drawing a total of about 16 minutes of coverage, and is being prominently carried by the wire services and major dailies. The tenor of the stories is generally positive -- as were the reactions to the trip from usual Bush critics such as Sen. Joe Biden and former Vice President Gore. Typical of the coverage is the Wall Street Journal (6/14, McKinnon, Dreazen, 2.11M) runs a story headlined "Bush's Visit To Baghdad Signifies Upturn In His Political Fortunes," in which it says that the President, "caught for months in a losing battle for public approval, suddenly is scoring gains on several fronts, raising a far-reaching question: Is he setting the stage for a political recovery? Mr. Bush Tuesday sought to capitalize on progress on the most vital front of all, Iraq, making an unannounced visit to Baghdad to hail the formation of a new government there. … Along with other recent good news, the developments hold at least the prospect that Mr. Bush's political slide has hit bottom."

DOJ_NMG_0033605

Like the Journal, a number of stories put the trip in the context of a recent "spate of positive developments," as the Washington Post (6/14, A1, Baker, 744K) puts it, that may suggest the President's fortunes are on the upswing after months of bad news and sagging poll numbers. The Post, however, also cautions that "the question is whether this latest updraft in Bush's fortunes will last much longer than the president's surprise trip yesterday to Iraq."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, Feldmann, 61K) runs a similarly positive assessment under the headline "A Lift In Iraq And A Bump Back Home," in which it says "the pictures out of Baghdad Tuesday morning spoke volumes." Bush "is beaming, the new Iraqi leader at his side, after pulling off a secret flight to the country that is the make-or-break project of his presidency. … Not only has Bush been edging steadily upward in overall job performance, after hitting bottom in early May at 31 percent, by Gallup's measure, his approval ratings on individual issues -- from Iraq and energy to the economy and immigration -- have bumped up as well."

Knight Ridder (6/14, Hutcheson, Douglas) says yesterday was "another good day for the president, who finally has a few reasons to celebrate after a long string of setbacks that battered his popularity." It "added to the optimism that swept through the White House after last week's slaying of terrorist chief Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq and the completion of a new Iraqi government. … 'All of a sudden the clouds broke and the sun started to shine,' said Ed Gillespie, a former Republican Party chairman. 'After six months of thunderstorms and rain it feels pretty good.'"

The Chicago Tribune (6/14, Silva, 643K) reports the trip "was intended to catch two waves of success: formation of a tough new government in Iraq and the killing of a reviled insurgent leader. For the moment, at least, Bush appeared to be riding those waves with a gradual improvement in the public's opinion of the president's performance in the past month and an additional slight uptick since last week's killing of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq." The Tribune adds, "After unremitting bad news from Iraq that dragged Bush's approval ratings to an all-time low this spring, the president has caught a few breaks that could offer his administration hope."

The New York Times (6/14, Stolberg, 1.19M), in another positive assessment of Bush's trip, says it was "powerful political theater, choreographed by an experienced team that played up the drama and secrecy of the moment." The trip, "including a stealthy nighttime helicopter departure from Camp David, unfolded with the precision of a campaign event, complete with the image of the commander in chief addressing cheering American troops."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 2, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Photo ops by this White House don't get more elaborate than this. A daring presidential trip into a war zone designed to create new hope for Iraq." The "timing of the trip, aides insist, was driven by the completion of Iraq's unity government last week, not by the death of terrorist Zarqawi, but that provided an extra boost. The emerging White House strategy stressed the importance of Iraqi leaders leading the country's turnaround." Some Democrats "today dismissed this trip as a face-saving attempt by the president and again pushed him, Brian, to set a deadline for the withdrawal of US troops."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, lead story, 3:25, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "The White House said the President wanted to get to know Iraq's prime minister personally." Bush: "I've come to not only look you in the eye. I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it will keep its word." Palmer: "With the cabinet watching from Camp David by satellite link, Prime Minister Maliki replied that Iraqis were determined to succeed. 'And when the suffering is over,' he said, 'the soldiers will return to their countries with our gratitude.' Tonight, those soldiers were stunned to get a visit from their Commander in Chief, who congratulated them on a recent victory."

On ABC World News Tonight (6/13, lead story, 4:25, Raddatz, 8.78M), Bush was shown saying to the Iraqi Prime Minister, "I have expressed our country's desire to work with you. But I appreciate you recognize the fact that the future of your country is in your hands." That Bush quote appears in most print media reports this morning. USA Today (6/14, Soriano, Nichols, 2.31M), in fact, headlines its story "Bush Tells Iraq: Your Future 'Is In Your Hands.'"

The Washington Times (6/14, Curl, 90K) notes al-Maliki "expressed his country's appreciation for US efforts in Iraq, where about 2,500 troops have died in the war. 'I present our gratitude for those that have sacrificed themselves for the Iraqi people,' he said." The New York Times (6/14, Burns, Filkins, 1.19M) says "Maliki's remarks…seemed aimed at echoing Mr. Bush's themes without adding any of his own."

Biden "Encouraged" By Bush Trip. Sen. Joe Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/13) that he sees a "great opportunity" in Iraq, noting, "I think that the setting- up of their government, coupled with the fact that Zarqawi has been killed, presents an opportunity for the President to change course, set out a plan, just like he changed course in Iran. I think it's good." Biden added that he is "encouraged" by Bush's trip to Baghdad.

Biden was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/13) if Bush's trip is "propaganda." Biden said, "It could be but I hope not. I hope when he went over, he went over and talked with Maliki about what the plan is, that is that they got. Look, everyone agrees on three things. One, in order for them to be able to provide security, they have to get rid of the thugs in the military and they have to get rid of the sectarian violence and so if he went over and said look, are you on the same page with us, we're going to in fact deal with the militias and you're going to deal with us, stick with us, then that's good. The second thing everybody knows, you have to get the Sunnis to buy in, give them a piece of the action. … And the third thing is you have to keep the neighbors out and that's I hope he said look, you'd better support us when we call for a regional conference whereby the major powers sit down and say stay out. If he did those three things, then he is turning lemons into some lemonade."

DOJ_NMG_0033606

Gore Says Bush Trip Was "Good Thing." Former Vice President Al Gore said on CNN's Larry King Live (6/13), "I think for security reasons it's wise for him to have done it in the way he did and I think it's valuable for him to have a chance to meet personally with this new head of the government there. Of course, the whole situation is so tragic and how we got there is not the point now. We are there and there are no real good options. But whatever options there are will be enhanced by a good working relationship between President Bush and this new leader and so I think it's a good thing."

Lott Says Bush Trip Will Affect Dynamics In Iraq, US. Sen. Trent Lott said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/13), "I think he needed to go over there to affect the dynamics here and over there, and the fact that he went over there and met with him I think will help instill a lot of confidence in them that we're watching them, that we're going to continue to be supportive. They've got a lot more to do but there's been some good news for the last couple of weeks, and we want to build on that, we want to keep it moving."

"Deception" Surrounding Trip Preparations Noted. The "deception" and secrecy surrounding preparations for the trip are being widely noted by the media. ABC World News Tonight (6/13, lead story, 4:25, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "This trip was not only surrounded in secrecy, there was a bit of deception, as well." Bush's "CIA Director didn't know. His Attorney General, not even the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff knew where the President was headed. Only the Vice President and the Secretaries of State and Defense knew the plan." While the President "was flying, the White House press office was giving the Washington press corps a fake schedule." ABC producer John Garcia: "They were still giving out details and information about a supposed White House Rose Garden event with the President." Raddatz: "Not until he landed in Iraq did Washington know the truth." Even Iraqi Prime Minister Nourli al Malaki "had been kept in the dark until five minutes before the President arrived to meet him."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We had expected to come on the air tonight reporting on what the President had to say at his news conference at 2:30 this afternoon in the Rose Garden. It turns out, however, that was a ruse, one of many, all part of an elaborate and highly deceptive plan that resulted in the President's secret overnight trip to Baghdad."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 2, 1:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) also reported, "This trip was so secret, not even the head of the CIA knew it was happening, and he was supposed to have breakfast with the President this morning. As one former Administration official put it, this is a White House that's very good at keeping secrets."

The Washington Times (6/14, Curl, 90K) runs a similar report under the headline "Trip To Iraq Was Shrouded In Secrecy," while USA Today (6/14, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) says "Bush, known for going to bed early, retired especially early Monday night. After a long day of Iraq meetings at Camp David, Bush told Cabinet members and other aides around 7:45 p.m. that he was 'losing altitude' and headed off for a little reading before bedtime." Instead, "he ducked out of the presidential retreat in the Catoctin Mountains and boarded a helicopter for the roughly 60-mile trip to Andrews Air Force Base in suburban Maryland. By 9:07 p.m., Bush was aboard Air Force One, and the jet was airborne, bound for Iraq."

The Washington Post (6/14, A1, Finer, Abramowitz, 744K) reports, "White House counselor Dan Bartlett told reporters on the 11-hour flight to Baghdad from Andrews Air Force Base that Bush had planned the trip for months with a 'very, very close circle' of about six White House staff members."

WPost Praises Bush For Backing Iraq's Government "Correctly And Courageously." The Washington Post (6/14, A22, 744K) writes in an editorial "If Democratic leaders such as Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) had their way, almost all U.S. troops would be out of Iraq by the end of 2006 -- a blow that Mr. Maliki's government almost certainly could not survive. Mr. Bush's willingness -- at least for now -- to resist such politically expedient demands may not rescue Iraq's fledgling political system; it may be that nothing can at this point. But he is -- correctly and courageously -- using what remains of his personal political capital to give Iraqi democracy a chance."

NYTimes Says Bush Visit Aimed At Midterm Election Boost. Under the headline "Too Soon To Cheer In Baghdad," the New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) editorializes, "By now, Americans surely know the difference between a presidential publicity stunt and a true turning point in this ever-lengthening war. If they had any question about which one this was, Karl Rove provided some guidance in New Hampshire, where he delivered the campaign talking points to the Republican faithful: the Democrats could never have summoned the will to kill Mr. Zarqawi. For an administration that is supposed to be rallying a nation at war, it was a revealingly nasty, partisan and divisive moment. … After too many photo-ops aimed at giving Mr. Bush and his fellow Republicans a short-term lift in the domestic opinion polls at election time, Americans hunger more than ever for a realistic game plan for Iraq and some real progress."

DOJ_NMG_0033607

More Commentary. USA Today (6/14, 2.31M) editorializes, "Bush's visit was part of a public relations offensive designed to shore up both the fledgling Iraq government and sagging support at home for the Iraqi mission." If Bush's trip "helps build support for the mission and the Iraqi government, it's time well spent."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) says "Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad yesterday was long overdue and, at five hours duration, too short. But it was still a trip worth making, if only to show both Americans and Iraqis that the US remains committed to seeing this war through to victory."

Iraqi, US Forces To Launch Offensive Against Insurgents. Iraqi and US forces are preparing for a new, large scale offensive in Baghdad called "Operation Forward Together." ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 2, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the new plan "involves making the capital safer by flooding the streets with mostly Iraqi troops and extending the city's curfew." ABC (Marquez) added, "Its goal, to put an to end the ever-increasing violence in the Iraqi capital, a full one-fifth of the country's population lives there. It calls for 75,000 troops, two Iraqi army divisions, two Iraqi police divisions, plus US forces. Their jobs, secure roads in and out of Baghdad. Set up checkpoints and raid insurgent hideouts. The plan will also extend by three hours, Baghdad's curfew from 9:00 PM to 6:00 AM, and ban weapons carried by civilians."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, lead story, 3:25, Palmer, 7.66M) reported the operation's aim "is to make Baghdad safe again by taking control of areas riddled with violent crime and sectarian killings and neighborhoods like this one, where the police no longer dare to go."

The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Roug, 958K), USA Today (6/14, Soriano, 2.31M), Washington Post (6/14, A18, Partlow, Shammari, 744K) and Washington Times (6/14, Behn, 90K) also report on the planned offensive.

Government Also Pondering Conditional Amnesty Offer. Meanwhile, the Financial Times (6/14, Khalaf) reports the Iraqi government is also "preparing a national reconciliation initiative that could include a conditional amnesty offer and negotiations with some armed insurgent groups to be implemented alongside a tougher security plan. … It will be combined with massive new security operations."

Insurgents Target Kirkuk Officials. The New York Times (6/14, Oppel, Al-Ansary, 1.19M) reports, "Insurgents unleashed a volley of bombings across the northern oil city of Kirkuk on Tuesday, killing more than two dozen Iraqis in morning rush hour attacks that were aimed at top police officials and security patrols, authorities there said." The attacks "came after what the local authorities described as the capture and elimination several days ago of a major terrorist cell. While Kirkuk has been the scene of a number of assassinations and other violence, the six bombings on Tuesday represented an attack of unusual coordination that local security officials suggested might have been retaliation for the arrest of the cell's members or intended as a signal that the insurgency in the city remained strong."

Rumsfeld, Rice, Brief Lawmakers On Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Bash) reported that after meetings with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "Republican senators and Democrats came out with very different views on what they heard." Republicans "say they heard signs of progress from members of the administration talking to them. But Democrats say that they simply didn't hear anything new."

The Financial Times (6/14, Dinmore) also reports "Democrats appeared unimpressed. Senator Jack Reed said he had heard 'nothing remarkably new' in the classified briefing." And Sen. Joseph Biden "said he hoped Mr Bush's trip to Baghdad would lead to a 'fundamental change in policy' but that he feared the president would rely on more of the same."

Defense Phase Of Saddam Trial Ends. The APP (6/13) reports, "The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's trial declared an end to the defense phase of the proceedings on Tuesday, shrugging off protests from the former Iraqi leader's lawyers that they have not had a fair chance to present their case and want to put more witnesses on the stand." The trial, "which has lasted nearly eight months, moves into closing arguments, with the prosecution starting on Monday, followed by the defense on July 10"

US To Probe Video Of Marine Making Light Of Killing Iraqi Family. The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Spiegel, 958K) reports, "The US Marine Corps is trying to find out who is behind a video posted on the Internet that appears to show a Marine performing a song that makes light of killing an Iraqi family. The four-minute video, posted anonymously on the Web site YouTube, shows the singer playing a song he calls 'Hadji Girl' in which he tells of falling in love with an Iraqi, only to be fired upon by her father and brother with automatic weapons." The Times adds, "As an unseen audience laughs and cheers, the performer -- dressed in a green T-shirt and what appears to be camouflage pants -- singing about using 'her little sister' as a shield against his attackers."

DOJ_NMG_0033608

Gore Says Rumsfeld Should Resign. During an interview dealing with many topics on CNN's Larry King Live (6/13, 9:32 p.m.), host King asked Al Gore, "Should Rumsfeld resign?" Gore replied, "Oh, sure. Well, I say it as a throwaway line. Yes, he should. I publicly called for his resignation after the Abu Ghraib tragedy. And I think that when we were talking earlier about the difficult options we have to get our troops home quickly and to deal with whatever slim chances -- and I hope they're not slim -- but whatever chances there are for them to actually make it in this transition."

Injured ABC Anchor Visits Newsroom. ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 11, 1:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And finally, tonight, many of you who watch this broadcast, and even many who don't, have been kind enough in recent weeks to inquire about the welfare of Bob Woodruff. Bob, you'll recall, was seriously injured when he was reporting for this broadcast. Doing what he knew and loved. And for the first time since his injuries, he came back to the newsroom today, back to this studio." Woodruff: "Missed you all. Missed you all." Gibson: "As you might expect, he attracted a crowd." ABC News President David Westin: "So the plan was not to mob you, right? This is beautifully executed."

CBS Soundman Killed In Iraq Buried In London. The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 10, 1:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Yesterday, we said goodbye to CBS News cameraman Paul Douglas. Today in London, friends and family said goodbye to sound man James Brolan. Douglas and Brolan died two weeks ago in the car bomb blast that also left our correspondent, Kimberly Dozier, critically wounded. A standing room only crowd of 500 joined Brolan's wife, son, and daughter for a service filled with tears and laughter and music."

Iraqis Continue "Exodus" To Syria, Jordan. The New York Times (6/14, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports, "In one of the first comprehensive tallies of Iraqis fleeing Iraq since the American-led invasion, an American refugee advocacy group has counted 644,500 Iraqi refugees in Syria and Jordan in 2005." The figure, provided by the United States Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, "a nongovernmental group based in Washington, is equal to about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population, and substantiates the overwhelming evidence of an exodus that has been accumulating in Iraqi passport offices and airline waiting rooms in recent months." The committee "has counted Iraqi refugees in the past, but the most recent figure is by far the largest to date — more than triple the 213,000 recorded in 2004 — and the first big surge since the American invasion. At first, Iraqis living abroad began returning home. But as the war became increasingly deadly, more Iraqis chose to leave."

US-Led Coalition To Launch Offensive Against Taliban. USA Today (6/14, 2.31M) reports, "The US-led coalition in Afghanistan plans to unleash more than 11,000 troops Thursday in the biggest offensive since the fall of the Taliban in 2001." Maj. Gen. Benjamin "Freakley, US operational commander, said Operation Mountain Thrust is a push by US, British, Canadian and Afghan troops against Taliban fighters in four volatile provinces: K andahar, Helmand, Zabul and Uruzgan."

Administration Announces Nominee For Marine Commandant. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, A2, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration announced the nomination of Lt. Gen. James Conway to take over the Marine Corps at a time when the Corps is dealing with the alleged killing of civilians by American soldiers in Haditha, Iraq." Gen. Conway, who "served as the top Marine commander in Iraq in 2003 and 2004, has worked closely with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld over the past two years. He hasn't shied away from publicly criticizing aspects of how the war has been handled."

The New York Times (6/14, Shanker, 1.19M) reports, "Pentagon and Marine Corps officials said the timing of the announcement on Tuesday was unrelated to investigations that marines might have killed 24 civilians without provocation in Haditha, in restive Anbar Province."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC To Crack Down On Backdating Of Stock Options. The Washington Post (6/14, D1, Day) reports, "Federal regulators plan to crack down on an increasingly popular corporate practice that boosts executive compensation by guaranteeing profits on stock option awards." The Post continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is to issue a statement, possibly as early as next month, clarifying the agency's view of when current law allows backdating of stock options -- picking a date when the stock was at a low point to be the date of the award, thereby immediately guaranteeing a profit. Companies need the permission of directors, consistent with company policy, and full disclosure to investors, including properly counting the added costs against earnings. … The action stems from a widening federal probe by the SEC and the Justice Department into whether several dozen companies backdated stock options illegally, making them more valuable by changing the date on which they were said to have been issued without telling shareholders and without recording the additional compensation cost as an expense against the bottom line."

DOJ_NMG_0033609

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Scannell) reports, "SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in an interview that the executive-compensation rule 'will almost certainly address options backdating explicitly.' He added: 'It is altogether possible ... that there will be additional disclosure requirements.'" The Journal adds, "In conjunction with the rule, Mr. Cox said the SEC would issue guidance 'saying when it is appropriate or not appropriate for a company to grant options while in possession of material nonpublic information when it comes to "spring loading,"' a practice that involves granting options ahead of good news. … 'I don't want to rule anything out in terms of the final rule and guidance, because they're not finished yet,' he said, adding that he expects the process to be completed before the end of the summer."

Grassley Urges DOJ Action On Backdating. Bloomberg (6/14) reports, "Executives guilty of manipulating their stock option grants should be prosecuted to the fullest extent possible, Senator Charles E. Grassley, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said yesterday. … 'I hope the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are taking a hard look at this practice,' Mr. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said in a statement yesterday. … 'I've asked the Justice Department to let me know whether the tax laws on the books are adequate to rein in and prosecute stock option backdating. If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up.'" Bloomberg adds, "At a Senate hearing on corporate tax issues, Mr. Grassley asked Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general of the Justice Department's tax division, to outline actions federal prosecutors are taking against companies accused of manipulating stock option grants to benefit executives."

The Financial Times (6/14, Grant) reports, "The Department of Justice on Tuesday said it considered allegations that dozens of US companies might have improperly backdated stock options 'very serious', as another company said it was under investigation. … More than 40 companies, mostly in the technology sector, are the subject of probes by the US attorneys or the Securities and Exchange Commission – or both – after it emerged that stock options were retroactively awarded to executives to dates that immediately preceded a rise in the company's share price." The Times adds, "Investigations are understood to be focused on whether the backdating of stock options was done without proper disclosure to shareholders, and whether or not they were properly 'expensed' for tax purposes. … 'The department considers allegations of this nature to be very serious,' Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney-general at the department's tax division, told a Senate finance committee hearing. … Ms O'Connor said criminal penalties applicable included 25 years in jail and a $250,000 fine for securities fraud."

MarketWatch (6/14, Watts) reports that O'Connor "said that the department is investigating allegations in 'several districts around the country' that some option grants were backdated to provide executives lower exercise prices. O'Connor didn't discuss any individual investigations. … Authorities also are looking into whether other potentially illegal practices were used to price the options at a low-dollar amount, such as awarding options based on 'inside' information about a pending event that would subsequently send the stock price higher, she added. … 'Such conduct would be a fraud on the market; it would boost executives' compensation at the expense of other investors,' O'Connor told the committee." MarketWatch adds, "If the probes reveal criminal behavior, prosecutors could bring charges including securities fraud, mail fraud, wire fraud and various tax-related charges against individuals and corporations, she said. Such charges carry the potential for prison time and hefty fines."

Pension Funds Suing Companies Amid Stock Options Probe. USA Today (6/14) reports, "Pension funds in the USA, Europe and Australia have begun suing dozens of companies under investigation in the widening scandal over illegally backdated stock options." USA continues, "Darren Robbins, an attorney at the Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins law firm in San Diego, told the Associated Press that the pension funds are 'completely beside themselves and outraged over the self-dealing that has gone on.'" USA adds, "In one lawsuit, security software maker McAfee was sued by the Heavy & General Laborers' Pension and Annuity Funds, and technology firm Juniper Networks was sued by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds, according to the Financial Times. … The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are looking at about 40 U.S. companies for suspected illegal backdating of stock options, according to the companies' SEC filings and media reports."

Enron Broadband Jurors Say They Were Pressured To Convict. The AP (6/14, Lozano) reports, "Lawyers for a former Enron Corp. broadband executive found guilty last month on fraud and conspiracy charges have asked for a new trial after several jurors said they felt pressured to convict." The AP continues, "Affidavits by two jurors and two alternate jurors were part of a 90-page motion by attorneys for former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, who was convicted on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. The same jury acquitted former in-house accountant Michael Krautz of the same charges." The AP adds, "In their affidavits, the jurors said they felt that they had been instructed by U.S. District Judge

DOJ_NMG_0033610

Vanessa Gilmore and pressured by other jurors to reach a unanimous verdict and avoid a hung jury, even though they believed that Howard was innocent. … A trial last year against Howard, Krautz and three other broadband executives ended with a hung jury. Howard and Krautz were the first to be retried. … 'There was just so much pressure to change my vote that I felt like we had to compromise and give in to the majority because I felt like there was no other choice,' juror Anne Marie Campbell said in her affidavit."

Two Utilities To Pay $50 Million In Enron Settlement. The New York Times (6/14, Johnston) reports, "Two small utilities are set to pay more than $50 million to Enron for electricity that they agreed to buy but that Enron will never deliver, under terms of a settlement that raises larger issues." The Times continues, "As part of the settlement, which may be approved as early as today, the staff of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission will not investigate fraud claims against Enron for manipulating electricity prices, critics say. They added that the settlement might allow the destruction of evidence crucial to proving that Enron cheated customers and would prevent others from resolving their fraud claims." The Times adds, "Brian Lee, a commission spokesman, said the criticisms were ill-informed and baseless. He said the settlement did not prevent the handful of utilities and customers who had to yet to resolve their fraud claims to continue pursuing their complaints before the commission. … Enron, which is in bankruptcy proceedings, made $1.6 billion in profits from what the commission's staff has testified was 'unjust and unreasonable' pricing. The commission ruled earlier that Enron could be forced to give up all its profits since 1997 because of its manipulations. … Enron said that under terms of its contracts with the two utilities, it was owed more than $170 million whether or not the power was delivered. The utilities said that they did not owe anything but decided to pay the smaller amount to remove a big financial risk from their books."

White House Increases Pressure On Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Solomon, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports the Bush Administration, "seeking to ratchet up pressure on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and propel legislation stalled on Capitol Hill, threatened to tighten control over the mortgage giants on its own and to ponder using its authority to limit their growth." In a "move seen as a warning that the administration may act on its own if Congress doesn't, the Treasury said it will review the process it uses to approve requests by the mortgage companies to issue debt. The administration is pressing Congress to alter the law to limit the size of the portfolios of mortgages and mortgage-backed securities that the two stockholder-owned, government-chartered companies hold." Meanwhile, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Alphonso Jackson "said that until Congress tightens regulation of the companies, he intends to use existing powers to 'increase the transparency' of the companies to make sure their investments are in line with their mission of supporting the housing market."

The Washington Post (6/14, D1, Shin, 744K) reports the Bush Administration announced "Cabinet-level studies of the companies' holdings and whether they can be reined in using existing law and regulatory powers." Legislation to "slow the companies' growth and narrow their activities began moving through Congress last year in response to multibillion-dollar accounting scandals, but it is stalled in the Senate." Treasury Undersecretary Randal K. Quarles "said his agency was examining whether it had the authority to limit Fannie and Freddie's ability to sell debt and, by extension, their ability to grow." Announcement "of the two studies follows Fannie's agreement to pay $400 million in fines to settle charges that its executives manipulated earnings to trigger higher bonus payments."

The AP (6/14, Gordon) reports, "The administration has long been critical of the two companies, and officials have pointed to the accounting scandals to bolster their case that the massive mortgage portfolios are improperly managed and pose a risk to the financial system." The AP adds, "On Tuesday, two officials - Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson and Randal Quarles, Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance - disclosed the new reviews by their departments in separate appearances before groups in Washington. … Quarles said he had directed Treasury staff to review the department's process for approving the massive mortgage-related debt issued by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. … Some Treasury officials have taken the view in recent years that the department has the authority to limit that debt."

WSJournal Says Administration Should Press Senate To Pass Shelby Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) says in an editorial that the Treasury and HUD actions "ought to send a message to Congress, which has been acting as if it wants the entire subject to go away. In the Senate, the question is why the Republican leadership has not heeded the very damaging report on Fannie from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight to force a vote on Banking Chairman Richard Shelby's strong reform bill. Ofheo revealed that Fannie's top executives enriched themselves over a period of years through dubious accounting. Do Senators support reform of a corrupted and dangerous institution whose finances remain a black box even today, or are they for the status quo?"

SEC Opens Mutual Fund Rules For Comment. The New York Times/Bloomberg (6/14) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is inviting public comment on the cost of mutual fund governance rules set aside by a federal court in April, a move that leaves open the possibility of reviving or revising them." Bloomberg continues, "The agency will accept comment until Aug. 21 on the cost issue and on 'any issue related to the underlying purpose' of the rules, the S.E.C. said in a statement yesterday." Bloomberg adds, "The rules would require that the chairman and three-quarters of the directors of mutual funds be independent from management. They were adopted on a 3-2 vote under William H. Donaldson, the agency's former chairman. … The United States Chamber of Commerce successfully challenged the requirements in a lawsuit. On April 7, a federal appeals court said the S.E.C. had not followed its own procedures in adopting the rules. The court gave the agency 90 days to correct its process. … The five-member commission voted unanimously to solicit the new round of comment, the S.E.C. said in yesterday's statement. Commissioners are split on whether ultimately to kill the rule or keep it."

DOJ_NMG_0033611

SEC Nears Naming Of Accounting Oversight Board Head. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Reilly) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is close to naming a new chairman for the body that regulates accounting firms and has settled on a shortlist of three candidates for that post, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The appointment of a new chairman for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, or PCAOB, would end a regulatory uncertainty that has hung over the accounting world since the agency's first chairman, William McDonough, stepped down late last year. It also would mark one of the most significant appointments to be made by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox since he took over last year as head of the securities-market regulator." The Journal adds, "The SEC appoints PCAOB members but does so in consultation with the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve, and the shortlist of candidates reflects this relationship, the people familiar with the matter said. … The candidates for the PCAOB post include William Gradison, 77 years old, who has served as acting chairman since last December. A former nine-term Republican congressman from Ohio, Mr. Gradison has indicated an interest in taking the post permanently, according to people familiar with the matter. If he doesn't get the nod, Mr. Gradison would continue serving as a board member. The chairman's position pays $615,000 a year, according to the PCAOB, while board members make $500,000. … Another contender is Jerome H. Powell, 53, a former Treasury Department official who served as assistant secretary for domestic finance and undersecretary for finance in the administration of the first President Bush. Until last year, Mr. Powell was also an executive with private-equity firm The Carlyle Group. … The third candidate is Mark W. Olson, 63, a Federal Reserve Board governor and former Ernst & Young LLP partner who has also served as staff director of a Senate subcommittee overseeing the SEC, accounting issues and the insurance industry."

Cooperative Accounting Regulation Urged. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/14), Neil Lerner, global head of regulatory issues for KPMG LLP, writes, "The last few weeks have provided clear reminders, if any were needed, that prosecutors are keen to crack down on corporate fraud. We have seen Jeff Skilling and Ken Lay convicted of multiple charges related to the Enron collapse and likely to face long jail terms. We have also seen Daewoo motor company founder Kim Woo-Choong sentenced to 10 years in prison for embezzlement and accounting fraud. … Part of this scrutiny of business has landed on auditors. Clearly the work of auditors is a critical safeguard against corporate fraud. Consequently, the oversight and inspection of their work must be effective, too. However, getting effective, practical regulation in place has proved to be a tall order for government. And this problem is compounded by the fact that auditors -- and the companies they work with -- operate around the globe these days. The stakes are high, as we saw when Enron's outside auditing firm, Arthur Andersen, went out of business under the weight of prosecution." Lerner adds, "Legislators have been busy on this front, too. The U.K. government is proposing a new offense for auditors if they 'knowingly or recklessly' sign off misleading, false or deceptive information. … It would be a pity if the effectiveness of these efforts to improve corporate governance and the integrity of financial reporting was undermined by a spaghetti junction of overlapping regimes for monitoring the work of auditors. But that is what we are in danger of seeing when it comes to oversight of auditors working for the myriad companies that are listed in more than one jurisdiction." Lerner concludes, "The challenge is to produce a regulatory system that is rigorous and effective but which allows business to get on with its job and produce results. We have seen this challenge before with Sarbanes-Oxley and other regulation. And as the world's borders continue to blur and commerce becomes ever more global, we no doubt will see it again."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Won't Charge Rove In CIA Leak Investigation. The Washington Post (6/14, A1, Vandehei) reports, "White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove will not be indicted in the CIA leak investigation, his attorney announced yesterday, a decision that signals that a special prosecutor's probe is unlikely to threaten any other Bush administration officials." The Post continues, "Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald told Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, in a short letter delivered Monday afternoon that he 'does not anticipate seeking charges' against Rove in the case, Luskin said. Rove was told about 4 p.m. while aboard a Southwest Airlines flight en route to a campaign speech in New Hampshire, but he waited until early yesterday morning to publicly reveal the news." The Post adds, "The announcement ends months of speculation about Rove's legal future and frees the architect of President Bush's presidential victories to resume his central White House role without the threat of criminal charges hanging over him. Rove, who spent countless hours preparing for five grand jury appearances in the case and sharpening his defense, was 'delighted, obviously,' Luskin said. 'We've always said he did everything he could to cooperate' with the prosecutor, he added. … 'It's a chapter that has ended,' Bush told reporters during his trip back from Iraq. The president said he thinks Fitzgerald 'has conducted his investigation in a dignified way.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033612

The New York Times (6/14, Johnston, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports the decision "not to bring charges against Karl Rove in the C.I.A. leak case followed months of intense behind-the-scenes maneuvering between the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Rove's lawyer, lawyers in the case said." The move "frees Mr. Rove in his role as Mr. Bush's top strategist during midterm elections this year." A spokesman "for Mr. Rove's legal team, Mark Corallo, said that Mr. Rove had made no deals to cooperate with the prosecution in any way, and that the decision was based purely on Mr. Fitzgerald's findings."

The AP (6/14, Locy) reports, "Aboard Air Force One Tuesday, President Bush praised Fitzgerald. 'It's a chapter that has ended,' Bush said. 'Fitzgerald is a very thorough person. I think he's conducted his investigation in a dignified way.'" Bush "said White House officials would remain mum about the leak and the results of the investigation."

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 3, 1:05, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "It's very good news and very important news for the White House, Bob. Not only is Karl Rove a top presidential adviser, somebody who's known the President since the old Texas days, but he's also the White House point man on the upcoming 2006 midterm elections." The Washington Times (6/14, Seper, Dinan, 90K) notes that yesterday, Rove "emerged from the Eisenhower Executive Office Building several times yesterday in view of photographers staked out on the White House lawn, waving and smiling at them. 'Now Karl can be Karl,' said one senior administration official."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 4, 2:25, Myers, 9.87M) reported Rove was "described as elated and relieved. Rove's team said he got the good news last night just before a fiery political speech in New Hampshire hammering Democrats on the Iraq war." Karl Rove: "They are wrong and profoundly wrong in their approach." Myers: "The chairman of the Republican Party says Democrats owe Rove an apology." Ken Mehlman, Republican National Committee Chair: "People that prejudged his guilt were wrong to, were wrong to say that he ought to have his security clearance taken away, that he ought to lose his job." Mehlman, asked on Comedy Central's The Daily Show with Jon Stewart (6/13) why Rove was not indicted, said, "I think the prosecutor looked at it and decide add crime wasn't committed. … I think we ought to trust his judgment."

ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 5, 2:15, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "The investigation has already resulted in one indictment, former White House adviser Scooter Libby. And some Democrats and some in the media wrongly predicted Rove would be next." David Shuster, MSNBC, May 8: "I am convinced that Karl Rove will, in fact, be indicted." Tapper: "Today, Democrats said that while Rove may not have violated the letter of the law, he may have violated a sacred trust." Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean: "Karl Rove does not belong in the White House. He has done something that is counter to the interest of American national security. And I can't believe the President of the United States can't recognize that." Tapper: "Tonight, a senior adviser to the White House tells ABC News, with the death of Zarqawi and Rove exonerated, it's a welcome week of solid good news for the Administration."

Fox News' Special Report (6/13, Hume) reported, "There had long been doubt special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald could make a case against Rove who cooperated fully, testifying five times in the investigation. Until now Fitzgerald refused to fully rule out further action against Rove."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Blitzer) reported, "The Wilsons suggest some other kind of legal action may be taken against Rove. … Their lawyer issued a statement today saying this, 'The day still may come when Mr. Rove and others are called to account in a court of law for their attacks on the Wilsons.'" USA Today (6/14, Jackson, 2.31M) reports, "Rove may still have legal issues surrounding the case." Amb. Wilson "has said he may file a civil suit against Rove and other administration figures."

The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Neuman, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "The announcement seemed only to ignite partisan fires over corruption and secrecy. Saying the White House was pleased, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said, 'Karl is as he has been throughout the process -- fully focused on the task at hand: crafting and building support for the president's agenda.'" But Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean "was having none of it. 'His real sin…is leaking the name of an intelligence operative during a time of war,' Dean said on NBC's 'Today' program. 'He doesn't belong in the White House.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033613

The Washington Post (6/14, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "Within hours of hearing yesterday morning that…Rove wouldn't be prosecuted in the CIA leak case, Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), the chief of the Democrats' campaign to retake the Senate, hurried to the press gallery to blunt the damage." But "however fervently Schumer wished away Bush's good news, Republicans sensed a shift in momentum."

Bloomberg (6/14, Keil) reports, "Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman said on CNN that Democrats engaged in a 'rush to judgment' in trying to tie Rove to the disclosure of the Central Intelligence Agency operative's identity. He said Dean and other Democratic leaders owe Rove an apology. … 'It's pretty clear that Karl Rove not only did nothing wrong, but he did everything right in terms of cooperating with this investigation,' Mehlman said."

Luskin, Statements To FBI Credited With Keeping Rove From Being Indicted. In an analysis piece titled "Nonindictment Of Rove Owes Much To Tactics," the Wall Street Journal (6/14, Squeo, 2.11M) reports "even some who wanted to see Karl Rove indicted credit the skillful lawyering by attorney Robert Luskin and his open-door strategy with the prosecution and the press alike with convincing the grand jury of his innocence. Indeed, Mr. Luskin had Mr. Rove appear before the grand jury in the case repeatedly to explain that what had appeared to be a misstatement was in fact a lapse of memory."

The AP (6/14, Yost) reports, "In 2003, while Rove allowed the White House to tell the news media that he had no role in leaking Valerie Plame's CIA identity, the presidential aide was secretly telling the FBI the truth. It's now known that Rove had discussed Plame's CIA employment with conservative columnist Robert Novak, who exposed her identity less than a week later, citing two unidentified senior administration officials." Rove's "truth-telling to the FBI saved him from indictment."

Fitzgerald Probe Seen As Unlikely To Lead To Further Indictments. CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Arena) also said, "It seems the only question remaining is whether the original leaker will be charged with committing a crime. A source close to the investigation says that it's increasingly likely the answer is no."

The Washington Post (6/14, A1, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "A source briefed on the case said that the activities of Vice President Cheney and his aides were a key focus of the investigation, and that Cheney was not considered a target or primary subject of the investigation and is not likely to become one." There are "no other outstanding issues to be investigated, the source said, though new ones could emerge."

The Legal Times (6/14, Schwartz) reports, "Legal experts say the decision may signal an end to Fitzgerald's investigation into whether government officials intentionally leaked classified information -- the name of CIA operative Valerie Plame -- to the media." The Times adds, "Fitzgerald's decision raises questions over what, if any, role Rove may play in Libby's upcoming trial, now scheduled for early next year. Former federal prosecutor Peter Henning, now a professor at Wayne State University, says it is possible that Rove could be called as a witness, but 'it's not clear how helpful Rove will be for one side or the other.'"

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) editorializes, "So much for having Karl Rove 'frog-marched' out of the White House 'in handcuffs.' That's the fate Democratic partisan Joe Wilson once predicted for President Bush's political guru, and yesterday his hope and accusations vanished like fog on the Potomac. … The mystery is why Mr. Fitzgerald kept Mr. Rove twisting in the wind for so long." The Journal adds that "what we are left with is a three-year political spectacle that has kept the White House under siege during a war, weakened or pushed out of office some of its most important aides, and made liberal celebrities of Mr. Wilson and his wife. And to what public purpose? A prosecutor with more wisdom than Mr. Fitzgerald would have long ago understood he was injecting himself into a political brawl, closed his case and left the outcome to the voters."

DOJ Challenges House Leaders On Searches.

The AP (6/14, Sherman) reports, "House leaders who called the late-night search of Rep. William Jefferson's office unconstitutional seek special treatment for lawmakers that would allow them to block criminal investigations, the Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Democratic and Republican leaders essentially are calling for a member of Congress to be given notice of a search and to be allowed to be present for it, rights 'that are not available to any other person' under constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures, government lawyers said in a 27-page court filing." The AP adds, "If the House leaders have their way, lawmakers also would be able to determine what documents do not have to be turned over to investigators or cannot be used in prosecution, the department said. In that circumstance, 'a member of Congress could easily thwart a criminal investigation by unilaterally declaring certain documents to be privileged,' the government said." The AP notes, "House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, Majority Leader John Boehner, Republican Whip Roy Blunt and Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer last week asked a federal judge to declare unconstitutional the search of Jefferson's office May 20-21. Such a move could undermine part of a lengthy bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat. … The leaders said the search was heavy-handed and threatened the balance of power in government. But they also acknowledged that the FBI has every right to investigate Jefferson. … Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who approved the warrant, has scheduled a hearing Friday."

DOJ_NMG_0033614

Judge Postpones Safavian Jury Deliberations Due To Misconduct Allegation. The AP (6/14, Sniffen) reports, "A federal court jury in the first trial of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was sent home four hours after beginning deliberations Tuesday so the judge could consider whether to dismiss a juror for misconduct." The AP continues, "The jury of 10 women and two men had selected a foreperson but had not even received their written copies of jury instructions nor begun any substantive deliberations when the problem arose. … Prosecutors argued that a female juror should be dismissed because she disregarded the judge's instructions on several occasions and told other jurors Tuesday she had discussed the costs of a golf trip to Scotland with her father. Safavian's expenses for the August 2002 trip arranged by Abramoff have been an issue in trial testimony." The AP adds, "The defense opposed replacing the juror with an alternate and said U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman should just give jurors a stiff warning to stop all outside discussions. … U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman, who questioned the juror, decided he wanted to study similar cases before ruling on the government's dismissal motion. He said he would rule Wednesday morning, and asked the jury to return then. … He also denied the jury's request for a dictionary and told the jurors that if they needed definitions or had other questions to ask him by note."

Convicted "Mafia Cops" Seek Reversals For Inadequate Representation. The AP (6/14, McShane) reports, "Wearing sharply tailored suits and sharing 'Godfather'-style kisses in the courtroom, attorneys Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes appeared a formidable defense team for two ex-New York Police Department detectives accused of moonlighting as hit men for the mob. … Now, two months after Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were convicted of eight slayings, the former cops are charging that their lawyers botched the case - and asking a federal judge to throw out the verdict." The AP continues, "Both Cutler and Hayes were disappointed by the allegations from their one-time clients, saying Eppolito and Caracappa were desperate men motivated by the life sentences awaiting them if their appeal fails. … 'I was just so personally offended,' Cutler said. 'One day you're begged to come in, and the next day you're knocked by the client, who to me is delusional in a certain respect. He's certainly ungrateful and shameless.'" The AP adds, "The defendants' new lawyers were unsparing in their assessment of their predecessors. … 'Hayes' indifference to Mr. Caracappa's defense, both in terms of preparation and understanding, was apparent throughout the case,' Daniel Nobel, who now represents Caracappa, said in court papers. … Joseph Bondy, the new attorney for Eppolito, said Cutler 'spent the majority of Mr. Eppolito's closing argument speaking about himself, including that he lost over 14 pounds during trial, loved Brooklyn as a borough of bridges and tunnels, and was an admirer of the great Indian Chief Crazy Horse.' … A hearing is set for June 23 on the defendants' allegations of ineffective counsel."

Former Chicago City Clerk Sentenced To 2 Years In Prison. The Chicago Tribune (6/14, Coen) reports, "James Laski at times dabbed tears from his eyes as a federal judge sentenced the former Chicago city clerk to 2 years in prison for taking nearly $50,000 in bribes to steer city business to trucking companies run by his friends. Laski is the highest-ranking official to be charged in the federal investigation of the scandal-ridden Hired Truck Program." Before his sentencing, Laski told the court, "After 26 years in government service, I have thrown everything away for the sum of $48,000," but "the comment brought a rebuke from U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle that Laski was oversimplifying the case. Norgle said Laski's conduct was the kind of breach of trust that saps the faith of ordinary citizens in their government." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/14, Korecki) adds, "Norgle could have given Laski up to 37 months but took into account Laski's family situation and his acceptance of responsibility for his crimes." The Sun-Times also notes that Laski "is the highest-ranking public official convicted in the Hired Truck scandal."

Top Daley Administration Lawyer Testifies At Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (6/14, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "The top lawyer in Mayor Richard Daley's administration told a federal jury Tuesday that she was unaware of any 'irregularities' in city hiring until after the FBI raided the mayor's office last year. Testifying against the mayor's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, Corporation Counsel Mara Georges also said she did not know before the April 2005 raid that officials in the mayor's office kept lists of politically connected job seekers." The Tribune notes, "Prosecutors charge that the office dictated who received city jobs that were supposed to be filled without regard to applicants' political ties. But when Georges discussed Intergovernmental Affairs' role in hiring with Sorich" and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy, "neither mentioned to her that they participated in filling positions covered by the Shakman decree, she said. … Georges also testified that she had discussions with McCarthy about a color-coded list of applicants for city truck driver jobs that FBI agents found in city offices," and she "said McCarthy told her the list helped Intergovernmental Affairs keep an eye on Sanchez, a leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization."

DOJ_NMG_0033615

Mississippi County Official Pleads Not Guilty To Katrina Kickback Charges. The Bolivar Commercial (6/14, Robinette) reports, "Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown's voice was loud and clear as he pleaded not guilty to two felony charges" Tuesday. Brown "was arrested on June 6 for receiving and accepting kickbacks as well as witness tampering by FBI agents at his office. The kickbacks allegedly came from Federal Emergency Management Agency funds for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts in the county. His trial is set for July 17." Defense attorney Douglas Greene said, "He is a fall guy in a political power play and there's a lot more to be revealed later on." The AP (6/14) also notes that Brown "was arrested June 6 by FBI agents. He was later released on $20,000 bond. … On Monday, Brown was suspended without pay by the Bolivar County Board of Supervisors pending a determination by the state attorney general's office."

California Man Pleads Guilty To Racketeering In Israel Cartel Case. The AP (6/14, Marquez) reports, "A reputed enforcer for a notorious Israeli cartel decided to take a plea deal Tuesday in the midst of his federal trial - after a top-ranking member of the group testified against him, officials said." The AP continues, "Hai Waknine - a 35 year-old Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, California, and describes himself as a businessman - pleaded guilty to a single racketeering charge, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Sleisenger. Under a deal with the government, he will be sentenced to nine years in prison, Sleisenger said." The AP adds, "Waknine had faced 46 counts of racketeering, extortion, conspiracy, and other charges stemming from an alleged scheme to hide money embezzled from an Israeli bank by loaning it out in Miami and Los Angeles. Waknine was accused of threatening violence to get debtors to pay up. … The turnabout came shortly after a morning of testimony from Gabi Benharosh, a powerful member of an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group. Authorities say the syndicate has enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe, California, Nevada and elsewhere in the U.S." The AP notes, "Benharosh told jurors Waknine had helped devise the scheme and collect the money, Sleisenger said. That conflicted with the defense's argument that Waknine acted under duress and was merely doing Benharosh's bidding."

Duke Basketball Star Charged With Drunk Driving. The Washington Post/AP (6/14, E2) reports, "Duke basketball star J.J. Redick was arrested early yesterday in Durham, N.C., on charges of drunken driving, another blow to a school shaken by a lacrosse scandal." The AP continues, "Redick, the Associated Press player of the year, also was charged with unlawful use of highways for making an illegal U-turn. … Redick, who has a Virginia driver's license, lost his driving privileges in North Carolina for 30 days, police spokeswoman Kammie Michael said." The AP adds, "Redick, 21, was released on $1,000 bond shortly after being taken before a Durham County magistrate. He is to appear in court July 17. The arresting officer wrote in his report that Redick had 'very glassy eyes, strong odor of alcohol coming from breath.' … Redick had a blood-alcohol level of 0.11 percent. The legal limit for drivers in North Carolina is 0.08."

Antigua Challenges US Online Gaming Laws. The Financial Times (6/14, Williams) reports, "The tiny Caribbean island state of Antigua and Barbuda has taken the first steps to haul the US back before the world trade court in a long-running dispute over internet gambling." The Times continues, "Antigua, which has a population of 68,000, says Washington has failed to comply with a World Trade Organisation ruling last year that US internet gambling laws discriminate against foreign suppliers. As a result, Antigua claims to have lost a large chunk of the rapidly growing offshore gaming business it has been building to diversify its economy away from tourism. US gamblers are estimated to account for about half the $12bn global internet gaming market." The Times adds, "This week, Antigua requested meetings with the US, a prelude to the establishment of a WTO panel to judge compliance. If, after any appeals, the WTO finds the US still in breach of fair trade rules Antigua can ask for permission to retaliate. 'Obviously, we are going to have to be a bit creative in order to come up with something to motivate the Americans,[Mark Mendel, a US lawyer advising Antigua, said after the April 3 2006 deadline set for US compliance expired. … Antigua is especially aggrieved because the US has taken no action to implement the WTO ruling, claiming - on the basis of an interpretive statement by the justice department - that its laws are already in compliance. … 'Antigua and Barbuda does not believe that a simple restatement of a legal position taken by a party to a dispute . . . can be considered a [compliance] measure,' Antigua says in its consultation request. … The US argues it does not discriminate against foreign suppliers of internet gambling services because domestic suppliers are equally restricted in offering services across state boundaries."

Patrick Kennedy Pleads Guilty To Driving While Impaired. NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 7, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported Rep. Patrick Kennedy "pleaded guilty today to a charge of driving under the influence of prescription drugs back when he crashed his car on Capitol Hill last month in the middle of the night. A judge in Washington, DC, gave him a 10-day suspended jail sentence and one year of probation and suspended his driving license for six months."

DOJ_NMG_0033616

Kennedy "again said he takes full responsibility for his actions."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Blitzer) reported Kennedy "says he's suffering another consequence for his drug-induced car crash on Capitol Hill." Kennedy "says he's still running for re-election in Rhode Island despite his guilty plea and recent ordeal."

The Washington Post (6/14, A5, Cauvin) reports, "Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy, who lost control of his car near the Capitol last month in what he says was a drug-induced stupor, pleaded guilty yesterday to driving under the influence of prescription medication and could face 10 days in jail if he fails to comply with a long list of court-imposed conditions." The Post continues, "Placed on probation for a year, Kennedy (D-R.I.) must meet monthly with the psychiatrist overseeing his after-care treatment and attend weekly meetings of a recovery group and Alcoholics Anonymous. Kennedy also must submit to random drug screening and meet regularly with a psychiatrist to monitor his mood and anxiety and use of mental health medications. … 'I've always said that I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions,' Kennedy said in a brief statement outside the D.C. courthouse. 'Today in court, I did just that. I accepted the consequences of my actions.'" The Post notes, "The plea agreement, which was in the works when Kennedy returned from a month-long stay at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, was presented yesterday afternoon in D.C. Superior Court. Earlier in the day, Kennedy was charged with driving under the influence, reckless driving, and driving without a permit. The latter two charges were dropped in return for the guilty plea."

The New York Times (6/14, Stout) reports, "Judge Melendez said that Mr. Kennedy would serve 10 days in jail if he violated his probation and that he must continue drug treatment. The judge also fined the congressman $350, of which $250 will go to the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington and the remaining $100 to a crime victims' fund." The Times adds, "The congressman has said that he has no memory of driving his car into a security barrier around 3 a.m., and that he had not been drinking beforehand, even though the initial police report listed alcohol as a factor in the accident. Rather, Mr. Kennedy has said, he was under the influence of prescription anti-nausea and sleep medications, which he had taken at the 'prescribed amount.'"

The AP (6/14, Miga) reports, "Kennedy was joined in court by Rep. Jim Ramstad, R-Minn., who is his sponsor in Alcoholics Anonymous." Similar stories appear in many newspapers this morning, among them Roll Call (6/14, McArdle), The Hill (6/14, Kucinich), Los Angeles Times (6/14, Neuman, 958K) and Chicago Tribune (6/14, Neuman, 643K).

FBI Web Site Seeks Public Corruption Tips. Fox News (6/14) reports, "Even with stories about public corruption probes flooding the morning papers, Internet and cable news airwaves, the FBI's new Web site for individuals to report malfeasance and just plain bad behavior hasn't made splashy headlines. … But the site, reportcorruption.fbi.gov, is up and running and the G-Men are paying attention. … 'They don't want me to get into numbers, but, yes, we have had credible tips already,' said Steve Kodak, an FBI spokesman." Fox News continues, "It turns out that while tip lines have been in use by nearly every major and minor police department in the nation for years, the FBI's public corruption Web site, created last month, is somewhat of a new venture. … The idea is an offshoot of the Hurricane Katrina fraud tip line, which was created when law enforcement officers realized the outpouring of public support in rebuilding the Gulf Coast after last year's hurricanes wasn't benefiting just the people of Louisiana. A report out Tuesday by the Government Accountability Office reveals the government doled out an estimated $1.4 billion for fraudulent requests for assistance." Fox News adds, "Over the past five years, the FBI has increased the number of agents dedicated to anti-corruption efforts from 450 to about 620. Of late, they have been kept busy with a persistent drumbeat of corruption-related cases involving congressional and federal officials."

Box Blown Up Near Miami Federal Courthouse May Have Contained Criminal Evidence. The Miami Daily Business Review (6/14, Kay) reports, "When police blew up a suspicious box that caused the evacuation of two federal buildings in downtown Miami, they may have blown up a federal criminal case." The Review continues, "Authorities evacuated the courthouses Monday due to a bomb scare. The Miami Police bomb squad responded and destroyed the box, but it may have contained evidence from a just-decided case. … The James Lawrence King Federal Justice Building and the David W. Dyer Federal Building both were evacuated at about 2:30 p.m. for an hour or so on Monday. Hundreds of attorneys and courthouse staffers were ushered out of the buildings by federal marshals wearing yellow vests. They were directed to the street in front of the Federal Detention Center while the bomb squad did its work. Federal judges and magistrates were taken out of the building separately and taken to an undisclosed location. … 'A special robot went over to the box, and it went kaboom,' said Mark Schnapp, a partner at Greenberg Traurig in Miami who was at the U.S. Attorney's office when the building was evacuated. … But according to two lawyers who were present during the bomb scare and did not want to be named, it turned out that the box contained papers and evidence left on the sidewalk by a federal agent. The two lawyers said the evidence was from a criminal case in which a verdict had just been reached. That evidence included fake guns and wiretap equipment. … Alberto Hidalgo, a spokesman for the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0033617

Marshals Service in Miami, confirmed that the box was blown up by the police bomb squad but said he had no information about what was in the box. … Matt Dates, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta, declined to comment on what the box contained. 'We don't talk about security matters,' he said."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Cites Deaths, Violence In Probe Of DC Mental Facility. The Washington Post (6/14, B1, Weiss) reports, "The Justice Department is demanding that the D.C. government correct problems at St. Elizabeths Hospital, saying the city-run psychiatric facility is beset by lax supervision, patient-on-patient violence and substandard care." The Post continues, "Two patients died in 2004 after they were attacked by other patients, and three died last year after problems with their medical care, according to an investigative report. Dozens of others have been kicked or punched in altercations, been put in restraints longer than necessary or been neglected by medical staff, the report said. … The hospital 'fails to provide its patients with a reasonably safe living environment,' the Justice Department said. 'The facility too often subjects its patients to harm or risk of harm.'" The Post adds, "The Justice Department opened a civil rights investigation last year into conditions at the Southeast Washington hospital after a patient advocacy group flagged numerous problems. Justice officials sent their findings May 23 to Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), giving the city a list of steps that must be taken to avoid a civil rights lawsuit. There is no set deadline for the city to respond. … The report marked the second time in recent weeks that the Justice Department has said the District government is endangering some of its most vulnerable residents. Justice lawyers asked a federal judge last month to hold the city in contempt of court for failing to improve conditions in group homes for the mentally and physically disabled."

DOJ Investigating Deaths By Police Taser Use. USA Today (6/14, Johnson) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing the deaths of up to 180 people who died after law enforcement officers used stun guns or other electro-shock devices to subdue them. … 'These deaths raise a question in our mind that should be examined,' said Glenn Schmitt, acting director of the department's National Institute of Justice. He said the review will initially focus on 30 deaths, including one from two decades ago." USA continues, "Most of the deaths occurred within the past four years, corresponding with the mass deployment of stun guns to police departments throughout the country. A number of departments have re-evaluated their use of the weapons because of the fatal incidents. … More than 80 deaths since 1999 were identified in a recent analysis by The Arizona Republic. Amnesty International has identified more than 150 deaths since 2001." USA adds, "The devices, marketed as alternatives to lethal force, are designed to incapacitate unruly suspects through electric shock. … Taser International, the nation's largest maker of stun guns, has supplied more than 130,000 devices to about 7,000 of the nation's 16,000 police agencies. … The company has maintained that its products are safe and have saved the lives of police officers and suspects. … 'As we know, in-custody deaths are part of policing,' Taser spokesman Steve Tuttle said when asked about the Justice Department review. 'The more we can study and understand the circumstances that lead to in-custody deaths, the more opportunities there are to develop law enforcement tactics and procedures that will help prevent these unfortunate events in the future.'"

Minneapolis Weighing Excessive Force Charges Against Two Police Officers. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (6/14, Xiong, 424K) reports, "Allegations that two Minneapolis police lieutenants mistreated a man they arrested at Little Earth housing complex will be presented to the city attorney's office for consideration of possible criminal charges. In a press release issued Tuesday afternoon, police said they need time to enhance video and photos of the May 26 incident before the case goes to the attorney's office in two weeks. At issue is whether Lt. Mike Fossum intentionally used force with drug suspect Juan T. Vasquez and whether he and Lt. Richard Thomas left Vasquez in an excessively hot squad car." The Star Tribune adds, "The FBI has reserved the right to review the case for possible civil rights violations after the department's investigation is over, which is typical." The AP (6/14) notes, "Interim Police Chief Tim Dolan and other police officials met Tuesday with representatives of the FBI, the Hennepin County attorney's office and the city attorney's office to discuss the preliminary investigation into the officers' conduct. … The FBI has reserved the right to review the final investigation for possible civil rights violations, police said."

Maryland Alien Smuggling Suspects Face New Charges. The Washington Times (6/14, Summers) reports, "Money laundering and identity theft were added yesterday to the charges against eight Montgomery County residents accused of smuggling illegal aliens into the county to work in a prostitution ring." The Times continues, "A federal grand jury in November indicted seven persons on charges that they transported illegal aliens into Maryland to work as prostitutes during the week and arranged for them to travel back to their homes in New York and New Jersey on the weekends." The Times adds, "The U.S. attorney's office in Maryland said the grand jury charged one more person and added three counts of money laundering for the purchase of vehicles to transport the women and property using sex ring money. … One suspect also was charged with using a false name and Social Security number to lease an apartment that was used as a brothel. … The prostitution ring generated more than $1 million in proceeds, court documents say."

DOJ_NMG_0033618

EEOC Said To Be Falling Behind On Cases. The Washington Post (6/14, A21, Lee, 744K) reports that labor union officials and civil rights advocates say the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission "is falling behind in enforcing federal civil rights laws in the workplace." The EEOC "is expected to have a backlog of 47,516 charges of employment discrimination next fiscal year, up from an estimated 39,061 this year and 33,562 in 2005, say officials with the American Federation of Government Employees, citing federal figures. … At the same time, President Bush's 2007 budget request for the agency is $323 million, $4 million less than it received this budget year."

Some Fear Public Accommodations Will Spark Backlash Against Muslim Women. USA Today (6/14, Dorell, 2.31M) reports that Muslim women in the US "have been asking the public to accommodate their religious beliefs about modesty, a trend that some Muslims worry will provoke a backlash. In some recent examples: In Lincoln Park, Mich., Fitness USA relented when Muslim women demanded that the gym wall off a co-ed aerobic center from their women-only section because men could see them working out. In Bridgeview, Ill., a Muslim school says it wants its girls' basketball team to play road games against non-Muslim schools provided the public schools ban men and teenage boys from the game." USA adds, "Meeting such demands could create a backlash against Muslims, says Zuhdi Jasser, chairman of American Islamic Forum for Democracy, which advocates separation of religion and government."

Hentoff Criticizes ACLU Efforts To Quiet Dissenters. Nat Hentoff, a former member of the ACLU's national board, writes in USA Today (6/14, 2.31M), "While the staff of the ACLU has never been more essential to protecting the Constitution, the top leadership of the ACLU is working to prevent dissenting national board members from going to the news media with criticisms of ACLU policies." Hentoff adds that "one principled dissenter: Michael Meyers, the director and founder of the New York Civil Rights Coalition and a longtime ACLU board member, has been forced out from the executive committee and the national board in punishment for going to the news media several times. … Does that make its national membership, and the country, any more safe — or free?"

ANTITRUST:

Blockbuster Accuses Netflix Of Antitrust Violations In Patent Dispute. The AP (6/14, Liedtke) reports, "Escalating a bitter legal battle, Blockbuster Inc. on Tuesday accused Netflix Inc. of manipulating the U.S. patent system in a devious effort to monopolize the booming market for online DVD rentals." The AP continues, "The antitrust allegations represent Blockbuster's counterpunch to patent infringement claims Netflix filed two months ago. … The wrangling eventually could affect the rapidly growing audience that's migrating to the Internet to rent DVDs through the mail." The AP adds, "About 6.2 million people currently subscribe to the online services of Netflix and Blockbuster, which both charge a flat monthly fee to rent DVDs for an unlimited time. Most subscribers pay $17.99 per month to check out up to three DVDs at a time. … Los Gatos, Calif.-based Netflix pioneered the concept in 1999 and ended March as the industry leader with 4.9 million subscribers. … Blockbuster launched its own online service in 2004 after losing hordes of customers who formerly rented movies in traditional stores. The Dallas-based company began the spring with about 1.3 million online subscribers. … Netflix obtained the first patent on its service in 2003, but didn't seek a court order to enforce its claims against Blockbuster until it received an even broader patent in April. … In its countersuit filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, Blockbuster framed Netflix's patent claims as a 'sham' aimed at locking out competitors that will help protect consumers from price gouging."

Fight Over Net Neutrality Moves Back To Senate. CNET News (6/14, Broache) reports, "The political tussle over Net neutrality shifted back to the Senate's turf Tuesday, taking center stage at the last public hearing before a mammoth communications bill goes up for a preliminary vote." CNET continues, "As leaders of the Senate Commerce Committee continue negotiations over how to deal with the controversial concept, committee members and witnesses from advocacy groups took turns airing their positions yet again." CNET adds, "The latest draft of the sweeping bill, called the Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act, numbers 151 pages and covers everything from the digital television switch to city-run broadband networks to changes in the procedure by which video services operators seek franchises to serve new areas. … Arguably the most contentious portion has turned out to be Net neutrality, the idea that network operators should not be allowed to prioritize Internet content and services that travel across their pipes or to make deals with companies seeking special treatment." CNET notes, "Some Democrats and at least one Republican in the Senate have backed detailed regulations barring such practices, while several others, primarily from the Republican side, have voiced staunch opposition. The ongoing dispute clearly had some politicians concerned about the chances that the broader bill will pass. … A committee vote on the final version of the bill is expected to occur June 22, with the last round of revisions expected to be released as early as Wednesday."

DOJ_NMG_0033619

Apple Can Learn Lessons From EU's Treatment Of Microsoft. The Financial Times (6/14, Buck) reports, "If Apple is looking for advice on how to deal with regulators worried about 'inter-operability' it need look no further than its old rival from Redmond in Washington state. Microsoft has been battling antitrust officials on both sides of the Atlantic for many years." The Times continues, "The software group's troubles culminated in March 2004, when the European Commission slapped a record €497m fine on Microsoft for violating European Union competition rules. Brussels found, among other abuses, that the group had failed to provide rival software developers with sufficient technical information to allow them to create inter-operable products." The Times adds, "Could Apple face similar pressure from the Commission in the future? Both groups have a strong grip on their respective markets. Apple's iTunes accounts for as much as 80 per cent of downloads in some EU markets, while Microsoft's Windows operating system boasts a market share of more than 90 per cent worldwide. … Moreover, while Microsoft at least claims that it is serious about inter-operability, Apple has unashamedly built its success on the concept of a 'walled garden' - a closed world of proprietary technology. … Some experts point out, a key difference: few companies in the information technology sector can operate successfully without some form of interaction with Windows. And Micrssoft's strong position in a range of related markets from servers to media players gives it additional clout. … Music, by contrast, will continue to be distributed through various channels, the experts say."

EU Moves Up Deadline For Suez-GDF Ruling. The AP (6/14, White) reports, "The European Commission on Tuesday brought forward to June 19 its deadline to rule on a French government-backed merger between Suez SA and Gaz de France SA even as French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy suggested the government delay the deal." The AP continues, "The Suez-Gaz de France merger would create a major new European player in energy, water and waste services, with a market capitalization of 72.6 billion euros ($86 billion), but its size and power have already raised antitrust concerns in neighboring Belgium and could force it to sell off part of its business." The AP adds, "Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt warned in March that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market, while the Belgian energy watchdog is worried that the new lineup would make the French government a part-owner of Belgian nuclear power plants. … EU regulators had earlier said they would decide by July 3 whether they would clear the deal, saying there was an automatic delay because Belgium had asked to take charge of part of the case. … However, they said they brought forward the deadline because Belgium had not made a formal request to look into the deal."

Mittal Issues Growth Projection To Help Arcelor Bid. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Von Reppert-Bismarck, McGrath) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. raised the pressure on bid target Arcelor SA by publishing details of a midterm business plan that envisions strong growth." The Journal continues, "Luxembourg-based Arcelor, meanwhile, stepped up its plan to woo shareholders by releasing more details of its planned merger with the OAO Severstal steel business owned by Russian entrepreneur Alexey Mordashov." The Journal adds, "Mittal, the world's largest steelmaker by production, said it expects earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortization, or Ebitda, to reach $9.9 billion in 2008, 71% above the 2005 level. Ebitda is projected to rise 26% this year to $7.3 billion. The plan doesn't detail the benefits from an Arcelor deal. … 'The outlook for the steel industry is positive, supported by strong global growth, especially from high-growth, developing markets,' Chairman and Chief Executive Lakshmi Mittal said. … Arcelor countered by releasing its own figures. The company said its stand-alone Ebitda would rise to €8.9 billion ($11.21 billion) in 2008, from its previous forecast of €7 billion, based on market assumptions Mittal has given. Arcelor said the Ebitda of a combined Arcelor-Severstal would rise to €13.1 billion, from €10.3 billion."

Intellectual Ventures Sparks Concerns About Patent Stockpiling. IP Law & Business (6/14, Lerer) reports on the Washington-based company Intellectual Ventures, founded by former Microsoft Corp. chief technologist Nathan Myhrvold, which as been "buying up thousands of patents through shell corporations. A $400 million investment from some of the biggest technology companies, including Nokia Corp., Intel, Apple Computer Inc., Sony Corp. and Microsoft, funds the shopping spree. … Some in the IP asset management field estimate that Intellectual Ventures has amassed 3,000 to 5,000 patents. … As the patent stockpile grows, so does the speculation -- and the fear. IP lawyers and tech executives worry that Intellectual Ventures is less interested in changing the world with big ideas, and more focused on becoming an über-troll, wreaking litigation havoc across industries with its patents. So far the tight-lipped company hasn't revealed much about its plan."

DOJ_NMG_0033620

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Dismisses Part Of Criminal Charge Against WR Grace. The AP (6/14, Bohrer) reports, "A federal judge has dismissed part of a criminal charge against W.R. Grace & Co. and some former top officials that alleged they knowingly endangered miners and area residents through asbestos exposure in Libby, Mont., site of the company's former vermiculite mine." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Donald Molloy concluded that the statute of limitations -- the time allotted under federal law to prosecute the case -- had expired." The AP adds, 'A federal grand jury indicted Grace and seven one-time top officials in February 2005, accusing them of conspiring to conceal health risks posed by the company's now-closed vermiculite mine. … Molloy's ruling, dated last week, is a partial victory for the defense, which has been attempting to get a conspiracy charge thrown out or limited. The conspiracy charge itself was not thrown out, but the allegation that the defendants 'knowingly endangered' residents and miners is a major foundation of that conspiracy charge. … Hundreds of people in the northwestern Montana town have been sickened, some fatally, by exposure to asbestos. The vermiculite mined at Libby contained harmful tremolite asbestos. The mine closed in 1990. … Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said, 'We are considering our options at this point' and declined further comment."

DOJ Enters Colorado Land-Use Dispute. The Longmont (CO) Daily Times-Call (6/14, Camron) reports, "Neither Rocky Mountain Christian Church officials nor the lawyer representing Boulder County is surprised that the federal Department of Justice is stepping into a lawsuit between the entities. … 'It's not altogether unexpected that they would defend the constitutionality of a federal statute, the same way the Colorado attorney general's office would defend the Colorado Constitution,' said David Hughes, the attorney representing the county on the lawsuit." The Times-Call continues, "The federal government will defend the constitutionality of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, which Boulder County claimed in March is unconstitutional." The Times-Call adds, "The church has asked the county to allow an expansion of 132,000 square feet that would include an education building, a multipurpose chapel building, a gymnasium and a gallery that would connect the new buildings with the existing church. The church also would add about 500 parking spaces. Church officials said construction would occur over the next 15 to 20 years. … RLUIPA, as the federal law is called, prevents local governments from placing a 'substantial burden' on churches; when restrictions are made, they must be the 'least restrictive' possible. However, federal courts have differed on the meaning of 'substantial burden,' and none of the cases regarding land use has yet been heard by the Supreme Court. … Hughes could not say if the federal government's involvement would complicate or lengthen the case. The government may raise different arguments than the church will, which Hughes acknowledged would cause him more work in defending the county."

Senate Republicans Scrap Vote On Bush Mine Safety Nominee. The New York Times/AP (6/14) reports Republicans "scrapped a vote on President Bush's choice to head the agency in charge of mine safety after it became clear that he did not have enough support to win Senate approval." Democrats "opposed the nominee, Richard Stickler, saying he had spent too many years as a coal mining executive and had failed to demonstrate that safety was his top priority."

Friedman Says GM Should Focus On Making Fuel-Efficient Vehicles. In his New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) column, Tom Friedman reacts to GM's response to his accusation that the company acted "irresponsibly by offering unlimited gasoline at $1.99 a gallon for one year to anyone who buys certain of its midsize sedans, big S.U.V.'s or gas-guzzling Hummers in California or Florida." Freidman writes, "I don't want to join the many congressmen and senators in drinking G.M.'s Kool-Aid and not demanding that it become the most fuel-efficient automaker in the world. If more people in Washington insisted that G.M. focus on building cars that could compete in a world of $3.99 gasoline, rather than creating an artificial universe of $1.99 gasoline, G.M. would not be worrying about bankruptcy today."

WPost Says Supreme Court Should Hear EPA Case. The Washington Post (6/14, A22, 744K) editorializes, "As early as this week, the Supreme Court will decide whether to hear a case that is now something of a dud but could become one of the most significant pieces of environmental litigation in a generation. The case is a challenge by states and environmental organizations to the Environmental Protection Agency's decision not to regulate the gases that cause global climate change. The justices should hear it, both because a lower court…could not produce a coherent opinion and because the issues it presents are of enormous importance."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In "Major Rebuke" To Seattle SAC, FBI Reassigns US Attorney Murder Probe. The

DOJ_NMG_0033621

Seattle Times (6/14, Miletich) reports, "In a major rebuke, the FBI's investigation into the slaying of federal prosecutor Thomas Wales was removed from the bureau's Seattle office" Tuesday "in the wake of a decision to reduce the number of agents working on the case." FBI Portland SAC Robert Jordan "will have the authority to add new agents to a longstanding task force investigating Wales' killing in 2001, officials said." The Times notes that FBI Seattle SAC Laura Laughlin "had cut the numbers of agents investigating the case from four to two last month, prompting the special prosecutor in the case to appeal her decision to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C." In a statement released yesterday, Laughlin called "the new moves the completion of a 'strategic realignment' in the investigation." The AP (6/14, Johnson) adds that "Jordan was named 'inspector' for the case and will oversee day-to-day operations. In a Tuesday night interview from Washington, D.C., he told The Associated Press he anticipates increasing the number of people working the case, and that he will meet with the special prosecutor and the investigative team next Monday in Seattle. 'I'm going to put any and every resource necessary to work this case,' Jordan said."

Federal Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 6 In Drug-Trafficking Case. The Providence (RI) Journal (6/14) reports a federal grand jury has issued indictments charging six men with drug-trafficking offenses, according to the U.S. Attorney's office and the Drug Enforcement Administration." Cocaine and heroin possession are among the charges.

Appeals Court Upholds 2 Murder Convictions In Louisiana. The Daily Advertiser (6/13) reports a state appeals court "has upheld the second-degree murder convictions of a man and a woman whose victims' bodies were cut up and put in boxes. The 3rd Circuit Court of Appeal on Monday rejected appeals by Cynthia Anderson and Larry Surratt, who were found guilty of killing Larry Cook and his girlfriend, Sheila Kirby in January 2003. … The appeals court dismissed claims that the victims had been working from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and that other members of the motorcycle group were more likely to have killed them."

WADA Chairman Says National Hockey League Drug Testing Is Flawed. The AP (6/14) reports the chairman of the World Anti-Doping agency "said the NHL is trying to fool the public with a flawed anti-doping program. Dick Pound said league statements Monday that there were no positive tests among 1,406 administered during the season were meaningless given the loopholes in its anti-doping program. … He said the NHL does not test for stimulants and other banned substances and does not test at times when players are likely to be caught, such as during offseason training."

Search Of Grimsley's Home In Baseball Steroid Investigation Called Surprising. The New York Times (6/14, Rhoden) writes, "Last week, federal investigators searched [Jason] Grimsley's home in Scottsdale, Ariz. … Grimsley, according to documents filed in the United States District Court of Arizona, admitted using anabolic steroids, amphetamines and human growth hormone. Fay Vincent, a former commissioner of Major League Baseball, said he was surprised by the raid because federal agents had not seemed interested in aggressively pursuing illegal drug use by athletes."

Afghanistan Poppy Harvest Expected To Reach Record Levels. The UK's Guardian (6/13) reports the Afghanistan province "being patrolled by British troops will produce at least one third of the world's heroin this year, according to drug experts who are forecasting a harvest that is both a record for the country and embarrassing for the western funded war on narcotics. British officials are bracing themselves for the result of an annual UN poppy survey due later this summer. Early indications show an increase on Helmand's 1999 record of 45,000 hectares (112,500 acres) and a near-doubling of last year's crop."

New Marshals Service Head Profiled. The Plattsburgh (NY) Press-Republican (6/14, Vock) reports, "A Chateaugay (NY) native is directing the U.S. Marshals Service, placing him in the highest-ranking position in the country's oldest law-enforcement agency. … 'Growing up on a dairy farm gives you an appreciation for hard work,' John F. Clark Jr., 45, said in an interview with the Press-Republican. … 'That has conveyed with my life and my career.'" The P-R continues, "The 1978 graduate from Chateaugay Central School was appointed by President George W. Bush and sworn in March 18 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … Clark is the agency's ninth director but the first to have had a career as a marshal."

Captured Fugitive Gunman Faces Weapons Charges In Wisconsin. The Green Bay (WI) Press-Gazette (6/13, Srubas) reports, "A federal fugitive who allegedly shot a Nebraska jeweler about a month ago appeared in federal court in Green Bay (Tuesday) morning after his arrest earlier today in an Appleton-area hotel." The Press-Gazette continues, "Steven Barentson, 57, was arrested without incident about 5:15 a.m. at the hotel after a citizen tip put authorities on his trail in Calumet County, where he was spotted in a tavern near the Calumet and Outagamie county lines. He was the target of a manhunt in the area after his vehicle was discovered abandoned Sunday at a Calumet County farm near Forest Junction. Green Bay police assisted in the hunt." The Press-Gazette adds, "Barentson, brought in by federal marshals to the federal courtroom in Green Bay, bowed slightly to media gathered in the corridors as he was led before U.S. Magistrate James Sickel. … He was arrested on charges of possession of a firearm by a felon and failure to appear for a federal jury trial in August 1992 in Grand Forks, N. D. … Sickel scheduled him for an identity hearing Friday and ordered him held without bond. The hearing Friday requires prosecutors to prove, probably through fingerprints, that Barentson is indeed the man wanted in North Dakota for a variety of federal charges, said Tom Phillip, associate federal defender appointed to Barentson, who claims indigency."

DOJ_NMG_0033622

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Sets $350,000 Bail For Border Patrol Agent. The San Diego Union-Tribune (6/14, 353K) reports, "A judge Tuesday set bail at $350,000 for a Customs and Border Protection officer accused of allowing illegal immigrants to be smuggled through his border inspection lane in return for cash and a Lexus." If Richard Elizalda "makes bail and is released, he will be required to wear a Global Positioning System device to monitor his whereabouts, said Magistrate Judge William McCurine Jr." The Union-Tribune notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Frakes alleged last week that information on the defendant's lane assignment was passed on to the smugglers via pager, cell phone or in person during one of his breaks. Stewart Roberts, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Diego, alleged that Elizalda received between $500 and $1,000 per smuggled immigrant."

Hastert Considers Holding Hearings On Senate Immigration Bill. CQ (6/13, Sandler) reported that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, "said Tuesday he may hold hearings on a Senate-passed immigration overhaul before naming House conferees to reconcile the vastly different measures the chambers have passed. … A Hastert decision to delay seeking a compromise on the most divisive domestic policy issue facing Congress could be a high-stakes gamble that public opinion is with the House, and by highlighting provisions in the Senate bill that might be unpopular with many voters, Republicans will benefit. Still, such a move could trigger a showdown with President Bush, who has made clear his desire for Congress to act this year on a comprehensive immigration overhaul measure that largely mirrors the Senate version."

High Tech CEOs Want To Lift Caps On Some Work Visas. Alan Murray writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) that Microsoft CEO Bill Gates and Sun Microsystems CEO Scott McNealy "are united in the effort to get the US government to lift the caps on immigration visas for highly skilled workers." The limits "are favored by labor unions and others who fear foreign workers may take jobs from US citizens -- although tech companies say the visas are used only for jobs when qualified Americans are unavailable." Murray adds, "The fact that leading-edge companies like Intel, Microsoft and Sun want to do their leading-edge work within US borders certainly contributes to that American advantage. And it's hard to imagine why the US government would want it any other way."

Jenkins Says National ID Card Would Reduce Illegal Immigration. Holman Jenkins writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M) that there is "an easy way to reduce illegal immigration. … Just introduce a fraud-proof national ID card with biometric information; make it illegal, with real penalties, for employers to hire anyone, citizen or immigrant, who doesn't have one. … Before we go down this road, however, would we really like the consequences? With 12 million illegals in the country, whole sectors of our economy exist only because of immigrant labor. Farms would shut down along with jobs for suppliers of seeds, packaging and ancillary services. Jobs for waiters, maitre d's and chefs would vanish, not just those of immigrant busboys, kitchen hands and cleaners." The US "has a chance to beat the odds thanks to our freedom from any of the usual fatal exclusivisms. But it will have to accept that it exists on a continent whose fastest-growing cultural force is Spanish speakers."

TAX:

Former Atlanta Mayor Sentenced For Tax Evasion. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (6/14, Torpy, Scott, Warren) reports, "A federal judge scolded former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell for leading an office riddled with corruption. Then he sentenced him to 30 months in prison. … As the trial progressed, I was overcome, almost appalled, by the breadth of misconduct in your administration,' U.S. District Judge Richard Story told Campbell on Tuesday during the sentencing hearing in federal court. Later, Story looked Campbell in the eye and said, 'I am going to send you to prison, and I do not take that lightly. Within my heart I am not sure you have accepted responsibility for what has transpired.'" The AJC continues, "With the sentence, the judge put the final stamp on a six-year-long federal investigation into Campbell's behavior while he was mayor. Prosecutors claimed he ran his office as a corrupt enterprise, taking cash bribes to fund a lavish lifestyle of gambling and international trips with girlfriends. … Campbell remained stoic as the sentence was handed down. The 52-year-old, who served two terms as Atlanta's mayor from 1994 to 2002, was convicted in March on three counts of tax evasion but acquitted on racketeering charges and taking thousands of dollars in bribes. … Under federal law in determining the sentence, Story was able to consider evidence and testimony presented during the trial about Campbell taking bribes, even though he was acquitted on those charges. … In addition to prison time, Story ordered Campbell to pay the government almost $63,000 in back taxes, a $6,000 fine and to serve a year on probation following his prison term. Prosecutors contended Campbell had evaded paying taxes on about $200,000."

DOJ_NMG_0033623

The New York Times (6/14, Goodman) reports, "The trial capped a seven-year investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Internal Revenue Service into corruption at City Hall that led to the convictions of 10 contractors and officials, many of them Mr. Campbell's close associates. … The sentence fit squarely within federal guidelines, but sending Mr. Campbell to prison was a blow to the former mayor who had said he felt 'vindicated with regard to any allegations of corruption' in March, after a jury failed to convict him of charges of racketeering and bribery." The Times adds, "Based on the new verdict and his record of service, defense lawyers had asked the judge to give Mr. Campbell probation or home confinement. … Instead of speaking to reporters on the courthouse steps, as he has throughout the trial, Mr. Campbell and his wife left through an underground garage. … 'I disagree vehemently with the sentence,' Mr. Campbell said, stopping briefly. 'This is, I think, an abomination in terms of what we expected and certainly in terms of what the jury's verdict was.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Emergency Spending Bill. The New York Times (6/14, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "The House of Representatives approved a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill on Tuesday to provide more money for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and to finance the recovery of Gulf Coast states battered by hurricanes last year." The Senate "is expected to approve the measure in the next few days, clearing the legislation for President Bush to sign." The Times adds, "House and Senate negotiators reached agreement among themselves and with the White House by reducing disaster assistance to stay within the limit set by Mr. Bush. Still, legislators from Louisiana and other Gulf Coast states praised the final bill, saying it would provide money desperately needed by their constituents to repair damage done by the hurricanes of 2005." The vote on the bill was 351 to 67. The no votes "came from 19 Republicans, mainly fiscal conservatives, and 48 Democrats, including some of the party's more liberal House members."

NPR's Day To Day (6/13, 12:50 p.m., Dimsdale) ran a three-minute report on the emergency spending bill, focusing on its military component. NPR said the bill will "be on the President's desk this week, much to the Pentagon's relief, which has been warning that its coffers are getting low." The $94 billion for war operations "should be enough for the rest of the fiscal year at least, which is to the end of September. The cost of the war is running at close to $9 billion a month, depending on how you calculate it. With the passage of this bill, Congress will have appropriated nearly $400 billion for the war on terror since September of 2001."

Rehnquist Legacy Being Reassessed. The Legal Times (6/14, Mauro) reports, "Pausing from its headlong rush toward adjournment, the Supreme Court will meet in special session this week to honor the memory of the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died last September." The Times continues, "Following long-standing tradition, the Supreme Court Bar on Thursday will convene a program of praise and reminiscence from friends and former clerks, then offer a memorial resolution for submission to the Court. … But even as Rehnquist's admirers prepare to praise him, his legacy is unsettled. After a respectful mourning period, his opinions and those of the Rehnquist Court are taking a beating, with even Republicans and conservative academics critiquing his record in ways that could pressure his successor and former law clerk, John Roberts Jr., to complete what he left undone." The Times adds, "Meanwhile, new information has emerged about Rehnquist: His long-private 1948 master's thesis has been published, a former aide has confirmed that Rehnquist once planned to retire in 1991, and the originator of his early nickname, the 'Lone Dissenter,' has stepped forward. … Most striking in the nine months since Rehnquist's death at age 80 has been the steady tide of academic symposia and law review articles that are taking him and his Court to task. Liberals criticize him for taking the wrong path, while conservatives say he did not travel far enough on the right one, allowing major doctrinal shifts on federalism, property rights, and other areas to fizzle or fade."

New Agriculture Department General Counsel Profiled. The Legal Times (6/14, Schwartz) reports, "Washington is a town where who you know often matters more than what you know. That, at least, is what seems to matter in the appointment of Marc Kesselman as general counsel for the Department of Agriculture. … Kesselman, who was sworn in earlier this month, has little background in agriculture, but he comes from the Office of Management and Budget, where as associate general counsel he became intimately familiar with the maneuvering between federal agencies' legal offices. … 'I don't pretend to be an expert in veterinary medicine or in farming, but USDA has many experts in those fields,' says Kesselman, 34, who on occasion helped USDA lawyers draft regulations in his previous post." The Times adds, "His appointment comes at an important time for the agency, which will be a key player in the upcoming farm bill as well as in coordinating policy for avian flu and mad cow disease. … Before his move to the White House, Kesselman spent three years at the Justice Department, including a stint working under Viet Dinh in the Office of Legal Policy."

DOJ_NMG_0033624

Leavitt Touts Welfare Reform Adjustments. The Washington Times (6/14, Wetzstein, 90K) reports that in a speech at the Heritage Foundation, Health and Human Services (HHS) Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said "the landmark 1996 welfare-reform law has done a lot to 'break the cycle of dependency' on public assistance, but it has 'unfinished business' in moving more people into self-sufficiency and stable, two-parent families." Leavitt said "more single mothers are working, child-support collections have nearly doubled and more than 1 million fewer children live in poverty." However, "welfare reform needed a midcourse correction, which was included in the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005, said Mr. Leavitt. States now are required to put at least half their welfare recipients into work or other productive activities, as well as renew efforts to discourage unwed childbearing and encourage two-parent families and healthy marriages."

Private Efforts To Combat Poverty, Hunger Examined. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, A1, Thurow, 2.11M) reports in a front page story on the Backpack Club at Douglas Elementary School in Tyler, Texas. Every Friday "during the school year, just before the final bell," about "70 schoolmates from low-income families rush into the auditorium and wait in line for backpacks filled with food. In the past year, thousands of other children have begun forming similar Friday afternoon lines in schools across 30 states, from big cities like Chicago, to postcard places like Sonoma County, Calif., to rural hamlets surrounded by corn and wheat fields like Hawkeye, Iowa." The backpacks "are an emergency fix to a problem that has defied solution, despite a rising economy and tens of billions of dollars of government spending on nutrition programs, including food stamps, school lunch and aid to mothers and young children." With "little appetite in Washington for costly new government-administered efforts to address poverty, all sorts of small-scale efforts are springing up: some privately funded, entrepreneurial efforts, others government-funded experiments. None are sufficiently large to cure poverty, nor do they pretend to such an ambitious goal. Instead, they are attempts to make life better for those who live in poverty or to test new approaches to a very old problem."

Medicare Overhaul Legislation Seen As Taking Shape. The Hill (6/14, Young) reports that "with several" of the Medicare program's "perennial problems due to resurface in 2007, many healthcare lobbyists say a drive in Congress for Medicare legislation is inevitable." The GOP leadership "in both chambers, not to mention the Bush administration, is said to be wary of opening the door to a wider debate on Medicare this year. A Medicare vehicle also would not enjoy the procedural protections against amendment that helped the leadership avoid such a debate during budget reconciliation last year." Although there is "widespread agreement that no measure will move until after the August congressional recess, speculation is rampant that the leadership may opt to take final action on a bill during a lame-duck session after the elections. Any Medicare legislation would create winners and losers, as lawmakers likely will look to offset billions of dollars of new spending with reductions in other areas of Medicare." The "biggest driver behind Congress's tackling Medicare this year, yet again, is a strong desire by many lawmakers to prevent a cut in Medicare's payments to physicians. On the other hand, the physician-payments provisions would be the most expensive to enact. The Congressional Budget Office has projected that even maintaining the current payment level for one year would cost about $10 billion."

House Appropriations Panel Votes To Increase Minimum Wage. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "Breaking with its Republican leadership, the House Appropriations Committee approved a $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage as part of a budget bill that adds $4 billion to President Bush's requests for domestic programs." The 32-27 vote "is certain to be challenged when the $596.5 billion measure comes to the House floor. But the seven Republican defections underscored the growing prominence of the wage issue going into the November elections."

House Accepts Pay Raise. The AP (6/14, Taylor) reports, "Despite record low approval ratings, House lawmakers Tuesday embraced a $3,300 pay raise that will increase their salaries to $168,500. The 2 percent cost-of-living raise would be the seventh straight for members of the House and Senate." Lawmakers "easily squelched a bid by Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, to get a direct vote to block the COLA, which is automatically awarded unless lawmakers vote to block it." The New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) runs a similar AP story, while Roll Call (6/14, Yachnin) notes that "under a federal law enacted in 1989, Members automatically receive an annual cost-of-living adjustment unless legislation is passed to block the COLA from being implemented."

DOJ_NMG_0033625

Murtha Suspending Bid For Majority Leader. CNN's The Situation Room (6/13, Blitzer) reported, "Congressman John Murtha is suspending his bid to become the House majority leader if Democrats win control of that chamber this fall. The House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi announced Murtha's decision." Roll Call (6/14, Kornacki) says Pelosi "convinced the Pennsylvanian to set aside his effort until after the November elections. … 'I appreciate Mr. Murtha's continuing cooperation and leadership in our effort to win a Democratic House to take America in a new direction for everyone,' Pelosi said in a statement."

The Hill (6/14, Hearn) reports Murtha "echoed her sentiments. 'For the unity of the party and to focus on Democratic victory in November, I have suspended my campaign for majority leader until after the election,' he said in a statement."

McConnell Seen As Preparing For Senate Majority Leader. The Hill (6/14, Bolton) reports, "Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell's new hire of Don Stewart, one of the most admired communications strategists in the Senate, is one of several indications that the lawmaker is readying his expected takeover as majority leader next year." McConnell "is also closing the Senate at the end of legislative day and negotiating the unanimous-consent agreements needed to move business forward on the floor, aides say. He is working closely with colleagues facing reelection races to make sure amendments important to them politically are considered on the floor in the run-up to the November election." McConnell "has been trying to raise his visibility in the press, addressing what has been the chief criticism of his performance in the leadership: that he has not played a big enough role in communicating the Republican message and countering Democratic attacks."

Roll Call (6/14, Stanton, Billings) runs a similar report under the headline "McConnell Bides His Time," and says that "political observers predict that short of catastrophic GOP losses on Election Day, McConnell's ascension to the Majority Leader's chair this fall is a sure thing." McConnell, however, "has consistently rebuffed questions from reporters about the future and has issued strict instructions to his staff to maintain their focus on the day-to-day operations of the Senate, lawmakers and Senate aides say."

Mollohan Amends Financial Disclosures, Maintains Innocence. The AP (6/14, Messina) reports, "Answering allegations from a watchdog group that have spawned a federal investigation, U.S. Rep. Alan Mollohan said on Tuesday that he was correcting or amending 19 items on his financial disclosure reports dating to 2000. But the West Virginia Democrat said the 'relative handful of unintentional and immaterial mistakes' fail to amount to the more than 250 'misrepresentations and omissions' the group alleged he had made in the reports." Mollohan also released a letter from the accounting firm of Braund Eiler & Vasko, which "credited skyrocketing real estate values for the rapid growth" in his net worth.

The Charleston (WV) Gazette (6/14, Nyden) adds that Mollohan believes the National Legal and Policy Center "retaliated against him because, as the top Democrat on the House Ethics Committee last year, he blocked House Republican leaders from weakening existing ethics rules. The NLPC began looking at Mollohan in May 2005, just after he prevailed in a battle in the House Ethics Committee." The Washington Post (6/14, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) notes the federal probe began after NLPC, "a small, conservative research institute in Virginia, turned over 500 pages of documents to the FBI in March." Yesterday, "Mollohan strongly denied any wrongdoing," saying, "NLPC is dead wrong in implying that I have improperly benefited from my office."

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, A12, Wilke, 2.11M) reports, "The amendments answer some questions about his finances but raise others. For example, they reveal that the West Virginia Democrat borrowed $35,000 from a business partner who has won tens of millions of federal dollars directed by the congressman to the nonprofit groups she operates. Loans to lawmakers from political supporters and federal contractors are subject to special scrutiny under federal election-commission and House ethics rules."

The New York Times (6/14, Rudoren, Pilhofer, 1.19M) adds that Mollohan "is facing his most intense electoral challenge since he was first elected in 1982," but "in releasing the long-awaited financial report, Mr. Mollohan said it 'shows that government money has never been used' and 'no money has ever been diverted from the nonprofits' to his investments. He compared the National Legal and Policy Center…to Senator Joseph R. McCarthy for…refusing to release the 500-page complaint detailing the accusations."

Republican Challenger Belittles Mollohan Action. The Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer (6/14, King) reports Mollohan's Republican challenger, state Del. Chris Wakim, "released a statement in response to Mollohan's actions Tuesday." Wakim said, "This may be how career politicians do business in Washington, but it's not how we do business in West Virginia. Here in West Virginia, it doesn't take 200 pages to claim your innocence. Alan Mollohan's problem has nothing to do with forms. His problem is that he used his public office to enrich himself and his political cronies at the expense of the people he was elected to serve."

Clients Boosted Payments Of Lewis Aides' Former Firm. Roll Call (6/14, Kane) reports, "At least 33 former clients of a top GOP staffer on the House Appropriations Committee hiked the fees they paid to the aide's lobbying firm after he returned to Capitol Hill, providing his firm with more than $1.1 million in additional revenue in 2005." The "increased cash from the former clients of Jeff Shockey, deputy staff director of the panel, came largely from longtime clients who increased their payments dramatically in the first six months after his departure — which coincided with the time frame his former partners projected for increased revenue and led to a nearly $2 million buyout from the firm." Shockey's role "with the firm Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White and its connections to Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) are part of a burgeoning federal investigation into the lobbying-for-earmark industry that serves as the financial lifeline of many defense contractors and has expanded in recent years to include municipalities and localities across the country." This spike in revenue "from Shockey's former clients came after Copeland Lowery played an active role in financially underwriting Lewis' campaign for the Appropriations gavel."

DOJ_NMG_0033626

Lewis Hires Outside Legal Team. CQ (6/13, Higa) reports House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., "has hired a team of outside lawyers and an experienced public relations hand to field inquiries about an ongoing federal investigation in southern California." Lewis' new spokeswoman, Barbara Comstock of Blank Rome Government Relations, "said Tuesday that the chairman has hired lawyers from the firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher: Robert Bonner and former Rep. Mel Levine, R-Calif. (1983-1993), based in California, and Washington-based Ted Olson and Joe Warin."

Democratic Leaders To Unveil Domestic Agenda. USA Today (6/14, 2.31M) reports Democratic House and Senate leaders "are planning to reduce the cost of student loans and prescription drugs, raise the minimum wage and launch an effort to develop alternative fuels if they win back control of Congress." In an interview Tuesday with USA TODAY, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "previewed the 'New Direction for America' platform hammered out by Democratic members of Congress, mayors and governors. She and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid plan to formally unveil the plan today." Pelosi said, "The American people need to know, if you win, what are your priorities." Reid said the party is standing "with the people we have always stood with: seniors, students and the hardworking families of America. We intend to tackle the issues that matter most." USA adds Pelosi "discouraged comparisons with the Republican 'Contract With America,'" saying Democratic candidates "will be 'independent representatives for their districts,' a nod to the differing views within the party on issues such as abortion, gun control and Iraq."

Report Alleges Misconduct By NIH Alzheimer's Researcher. A report by congressional investigators has found that a world-renowned Alzheimer's diseases researcher at NIH abused the agency's lax oversight to improperly forward tissue specimens to a pharmaceutical company and then accepting hundred of thousands of dollars in consulting fees form the company. The Washington Post (6/14, A6, Weiss, 744K) reports, "Trey Sunderland, chief of the geriatric psychiatry branch at the National Institute of Mental Health, failed to tell agency officials about his arrangement with the drug giant Pfizer Inc., as required by federal rules, the investigators concluded in a 27-page preliminary report released yesterday. Sunderland also did not properly disclose arrangements with another company, said the report, which found no wrongdoing by the drug companies."

The Los Angeles Times (6/14, Willman, 958K) reports, "The new details about the conduct of the scientist, Dr. P. Trey Sunderland III, drew bipartisan criticism from members of an investigative panel of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The House members said Sunderland's conduct raised broad questions about how the NIH accounted for materials harvested from patients — materials that hold promise for finding cures or ways to better diagnose serious diseases. … The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan, said: 'NIH lacks adequate controls for human tissue samples, human subject protection and the scientific conduct of many of its senior employees. Accountability must be restored to NIH's own research programs.'"

The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 6, 2;15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported this story last evening, noting, that "the committee found no evidence that the company had broken any NIH rules at the time or knew of any wrongdoing by Dr. Sunderland. He is expected to appear before the committee tomorrow and take the fifth."

Filner Curses VA "Spin Doctor" Over Data Theft Response. Roll Call (6/14, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) was so fired up Tuesday over the Veterans' Affairs' handling of stolen military personnel files that he dropped the F-bomb at a news conference outside VA headquarters. After a VA 'spin doctor,' as Filner calls him, ran outside and accused the Congressman of staging a 'publicity stunt,' Filner, who has been filling in as ranking member on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, let her rip. 'You guys f---ed it up!' the Congressman yelled. 'Stop covering your ass and figure it out!'" Filner "told HOH that he's furious with the VA for waiting three whole weeks before responding publicly to the burglary of a laptop containing 26.5 million military personnel members' personal records."

DOJ_NMG_0033627

Bill Would Restrict Consumer Ability To Freeze Credit Reports. USA Today (6/14, Acohido, 2.31M) reports that the Financial Data Protection Act under consideration by Congress, would pre-empt "laws in 17 states that allow anyone to freeze their own credit and instead restricting the privilege to ID theft victims." A credit freeze "cuts off access to your credit history. … Under the bill, backed by the financial services industry, simply having your data lost or stolen isn't enough. You must file a police report describing a specific instance of it being used to commit a crime." USA Adds, "The bill also would pre-empt laws in 29 states requiring companies, institutions and agencies to notify individuals about security breaches compromising their data. It sets national criteria for data protection and breach disclosures, and puts banking and Treasury officials in charge of compliance."

Author Says Executive Privilege Not An Absolute Right. Author Louis Fisher writes in the Los Angeles Times (6/14, 958K), "The Justice Department told a federal judge Monday that a challenge to the National Security Agency's controversial domestic eavesdropping program must be thrown out of court because the secrets involved are just too sensitive. … This is not the first time the Justice Department has invoked what is known as the 'state secrets privilege.' … Each time, the courts have agreed to dismiss the proceedings simply because the Justice Department says that trying the cases would reveal state secrets." Fisher adds, "The executive branch may assert a right to keep its secrets, but this must not be viewed as an absolute right, only a privilege granted by the court when appropriate."

NYTimes Calls Obama's Proposed Deal With Automakers "Worthy New Idea." An editorial in the New York Times (6/14, 1.19M) says, "Companies like Ford and General Motors groan under the weight of their history, manifested in the legacy costs that are a result of decades of promises to support workers and provide them with health care in their old age." The Times adds, "In an ideal world, America would join the overwhelming majority of developed countries and hammer out some kind of national health care system. Failing such a sudden and unlikely onset of sanity, creative solutions are needed. Sen. Barack Obama has proposed striking a bargain with American automakers to help them with retiree health care costs in exchange for higher fuel efficiency standards. While we have some questions about how to make such a system work, it is at least a worthy new idea — one of a very few in a field desperately in need of them."

OTHER NEWS:

Sluggish Retail Sales May Indicate Slowing Economy. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "Lukewarm retail sales last month suggest that higher gasoline prices and the weakening housing market are taking a toll on consumers and slowing the economy." The Commerce Department "said retail sales rose only 0.1% in May from the previous month, after growing 0.8% in April, as spending patterns took a turn toward thrift. Consumers spent more on filling up their gas tanks -- primarily because pump prices shot up -- but less on new vehicles." Overall, "retail sales in May were 7.6% higher than the year before. Excluding the volatile auto, gasoline and building-materials sectors, retail sales rose a sluggish 0.4% in May, the third consecutive month at that pace."

USA Today (6/14, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Wholesale inflation was mixed in May as overall price pressures eased, but a special measure closely watched by economists ticked up faster than expected, the government said Tuesday." The reports "appear to bolster Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's recent assessment that the economy is slowing from the breakneck pace of the first three months of the year, though not yet quickly enough to contain price pressures." Several economists "said the wholesale inflation data made it more likely that the central bank will decide to raise interest rates again when it meets June 28-29 in a bid to restrain price increases, though many are waiting for today's release of the government's consumer inflation numbers."

The New York Times (6/14, Peters, 1.19M) reports, "Higher prices at the manufacturing level helped push overall prices of wholesale goods higher in May, the Labor Department reported yesterday." While wholesale prices "declined in certain categories like produce, alcoholic beverages and automobiles, they rose elsewhere, resulting in a net price gain for the month." Over all, "the Producer Price Index rose 0.2 percent in May after posting sharper increases in April and March. But the so-called core rate, which excludes food and energy prices, rose 0.3 percent, compared with 0.1 percent increases the previous two months. That surprised economists, who were expecting a rise of 0.2 percent."

Rise In Foreign Official Holdings Seen As Presaging Recession. In a New York Times op-ed (6/14), Brookings Institution guest scholar Martin Mayer says, "Recent large increases in foreign official holdings indicate that foreign private investors see fewer attractive places to put their money in the American economy. They could presage a significant fall in the price of American assets, stocks (witness the recent drops in American stock markets) and bonds and real estate and all, and a hard landing for a world economy still floating on the crest of cheap credit."

DOJ_NMG_0033628

Stock Markets Continue Losing Trend. The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 7, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Those nagging worries about a return of inflation sent stock prices lower today. The Dow fell 86 points [to close at 10,706.14]. The NASDAQ lost nearly 19 [to close at 2,072.47]."

NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A bit of a negative benchmark on Wall Street today. Stocks continued their sell off with the blue chips finishing in negative territory for the year for the first time this year."

USA Today (6/14, Krantz, 2.31M) reports stocks "and commodities tumbled worldwide Tuesday as investors grew increasingly concerned that rising interest rates could hurt global economies and crimp demand for everything from industrial materials to precious metals."

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "Global stock and commodity prices tumbled again, extending a rout that appears to defy -- but may simply highlight -- the strong pace of economic growth in much of the world." In Japan, "the world's second-largest economy, the Nikkei Stock Average shed 614.41, or 4.1%, to close at 14218.60, and other markets were down sharply." Gold, "which often moves in the opposite direction to stocks, also lost ground. The price of a troy ounce, which had recently crossed the $700 mark, dropped $44.30, or 7.3%, to close at $562.50, and the price of silver fell 13%." Many economists "now think the broad reversal in the prices of stocks, bonds and commodities like gold and silver is less a warning signal of an economic downturn than a consequence of the ratcheting up of interest rates by the world's central banks."

Indexes Based On Fundamental Measures Said To Outperform Capitalization-Weighted Indexes. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (6/14), Jeremy Siegel, the Russell E. Palmer Professor of Finance at Wharton, says, "New research demonstrates that it is possible to construct broad-based indexes offering investors better returns and lower volatility than capitalization-weighted indexes" such as the S&P 500. These indexes "are weighted by fundamental measures of firm value, such as sales or dividends, instead of allowing the market price alone to dictate how much of each firm should be included in the index." If you "are a fan of indexing, as I and so many other investors are, you are no longer trapped in capitalization-weighted indexes which overweight overvalued stocks and underweight undervalued stocks. Devotees of value investing who are searching for a simple, low-cost indexed portfolio in which to hold their stocks need wait no longer. Fundamentally weighted indexes are the next wave of investing."

Globalization Of Finance Generates New Risks. In his Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K), Robert Samuelson says, "Spoiled by years of cheap credit, global investors seem to be reacting to the prospect of higher interest rates by fleeing stock markets almost everywhere. There is danger of a broader financial and economic setback." The "riskiest and most mysterious aspect of the present situation is the increasingly global nature of investment capital. Once, capital was largely compartmentalized by nation. Americans saved and invested in the United States; Germans saved and invested in Germany. This world is disappearing. It is now routine for pension funds, mutual funds and many wealthy investors to move money in and out of American, European, Asian and Latin American stocks and bonds." In theory, "liberalization benefits everyone." But global finance "has created new risks. At least two stand out. First, huge trade imbalances." Second, "worldwide financial crises. Global investors may move in herds, first pouring money into some countries -- or investments -- and then withdrawing abruptly. That's what happened in the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis."

Former Reagan Navy Secretary Wins Virginia Democratic Senate Primary. The AP (6/14, Lewis) reports, "James Webb, a former Reagan administration Navy secretary who left the Republican Party over the Iraq war, won the Democratic nomination Tuesday for the right to take on GOP Sen. George Allen in the fall." Webb "defeated lobbyist and longtime Democratic Party activist Harris Miller after a bruising primary in which voters decided between a traditional and unabashed liberal (Miller) and a former Republican (Webb) whose populist campaign was aimed at so-called Reagan Democrats -- namely, rural, white moderates." The AP adds, "With all but one precinct reporting, Webb had 83,156 votes, or 53.5 percent, compared with 72,352 votes, or 46.5 percent, for Miller."

The Washington Times (6/14, McLaughlin, 90K) reports, "Last night, Mr. Webb told supporters gathered at the Hilton Crystal City Hotel at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport that voters want someone who is not going to follow the Bush administration 'blindly' like Mr. Allen." Said Webb, "I stand here today because you believed in a vision, not just my vision, a vision for this country. … Many of you called on me months ago because you wanted a leader to carry that vision to Washington. ... Too much was at stake, and the time had come to bring this country on a different course. That is a call I am glad I answered."

The New York Times (6/14, Kornblut, 1.19M) notes Webb "had campaigned against Mr. Miller for his liberal spending on the race, at one point distributing fliers that showed Mr. Miller with money flowing from his pockets and a hooked nose. Mr. Miller, who is Jewish, denounced the image as anti-Semitic; Mr. Webb denied intending a slur." Sen. Charles E. Schumer, "the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and a champion of Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0033629

Webb's, credited his independent streak and his aggressive campaigning for the victory. … Mr. Schumer said that with Mr. Webb's victory, he expected the Virginia race to become more competitive and to put the balance of the Senate into play."

The Washington Post (6/14, A1, Shear, 744K) reports, "Webb now faces the challenge of raising millions of dollars in an attempt to oust Allen, a popular ex-governor who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008. Allen has more than $7.5 million in the bank and a long history of winning in a state that usually votes for Republicans in federal contests." Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, "said the Republicans look forward to running against a 'very fractured, divided Democratic Party' and 'having John Kerry…campaign with Mr. Webb.'" Kerry backed Webb in the primary.

In an analysis piece titled "Webb Will Try To Turn Past GOP Loyalty Into Advantage," the Washington Post (6/14, A1, Barnes, 744K) notes Webb "cast his first vote for a Democratic presidential candidate only two years ago made." Last night he make it "clear that, in the fall, he will try to turn to his advantage the positions and past alliances that dogged his primary campaign this spring." He "supported Allen and George W. Bush in 2000. He's proud of Ronald Reagan -- he was a prominent member of the administration -- and couldn't abide Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. He has questioned affirmative action and supports gun owners." But "he also thinks that the war in Iraq was a mistake and that Congress is overwhelmed by special interests and doesn't do enough for the little guy. In all of these ways, he thinks he's like most Virginians."

Liberal Jeers For Clinton Over Iraq Stance Seen As Revealing Deep Democratic Split. The Hill (6/14, Schor) reports, "Angry boos greeted Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) at a liberal conference yesterday when she opposed fixing a date for withdrawing American forces from Iraq. The sour audience response, at the Campaign for America's Future conference, hints at the 2008 presidential front-runner's shaky standing with anti-war Democrats, who wield increasing power in the party." Clinton's speech "packed the room with a crowd billed as the nation's largest gathering of progressives."

The story is being depicted a signaling a split in Democratic ranks. The AP (6/14, Barrett) notes another "potential presidential candidate," Sen. John Kerry, "spoke to the group later in the day and offered an emphatically anti-war appeal. … In remarks that could have been aimed at Clinton, Kerry said: 'It's not enough to argue with the logistics or to argue about the details. ... It is essential to acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake. ... It was wrong, and I was wrong to vote for that Iraqi war resolution.'"

The New York Times (6/14, Nagourney, Toner, 1.19M) runs a similar report under the headline "Clinton And Kerry Show Democratic Divide On Troop Withdrawal," in which it reports Clinton "faced boos and shouts of 'bring them home' from an audience of liberal Democrats,"

The Washington Post (6/14, A10, Balz, 744K) also says Clinton's and Kerry's appearances at the Take Back America conference at the Washington Hilton "put on vivid display the Democratic Party's divisions over the foreign policy issue that dominates this year's midterm elections, and the two possible 2008 presidential candidates offered a preview of the debate that could dominate the battle for the party's nomination." Clinton "won repeated applause through most of her speech, which dealt at length with domestic issues but also sharply criticized President Bush's handling of the war." But "the audience turned against her when, in what she called a difficult conversation, she restated her long-standing position about timetables for withdrawing US forces."

In its report, Knight Ridder (6/14, Kuhnhenn) says, "The Democratic Party's split over the Iraq war cracked into view." The "intra-party division has haunted Democrats from the start of the war and bedeviled Kerry during his 2004 presidential run. The lack of a harmonizing party message comes as public opposition to the war has been strong and congressional elections are about five months away."

The Washington Times (6/14, Pfeiffer, Hoover, 90K) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi also addressed the gathering. Said Pelosi, "Have you had enough of a war that is failing to make America secure?"

The San Francisco Chronicle (6/14, Sandalow) reports, "Democrats have put aside many differences in their common yearning to gain seats in the 2006 midterm congressional elections. Yet when it comes to the war that has polarized the nation, and by some accounts is shaping up as the biggest issue in the November election, Democrats are struggling to speak with a single voice."

Clinton Tries To Refocus Debate On Abortion. In a speech to the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association yesterday, Sen. Hillary Clinton tried to shift the abortion debate to the subject of access of to family planning services, The New York Times (6/14, Hernandez, 1.19M) reports that Clinton said the nation's focus "should be on preventing unwanted pregnancies." The Times says Clinton's remarks "reflect the degree to which Democrats around the country are trying to find a middle ground on the polarizing issue of abortion rights since their party's defeats in the November 2004 elections." The Times also reports the Clinton "also used her speech to take a jab at Republicans who, while adamantly opposed to abortion rights, have resisted efforts to pay for programs providing greater access to contraception and other family planning services."

DOJ_NMG_0033630

Rove Seeks To Draw Clear Distinctions Between GOP, Democrats. The Manchester Union Leader (6/14, Distaso, 59K) reports, "When he sharply accused key Democrats this week of 'cutting and running' on the Iraq war, Karl Rove was in a broad way urging New Hampshire Republicans to stand by President George W. Bush during this key mid-term election campaign." Democrats argue Bush's low approval ratings make the GOP vulnerable, but Rove "returned to basics on Monday, verbally drawing a clear bright line between the two parties in trying to rally the faithful." Speaking at the NH GOP State Committee's annual dinner "Rove focused on taxes, spending and national security." Rove "sharpened the differences between the two parties with vintage 'red meat' rhetoric" saying "They're for higher taxes. We're for lower taxes. … They're for more spending. We're for less spending." The DNC "said Rove and the Republicans 'are recycling their tired and despicable partisan attacks' and have no 'real solutions.'"

Mehlman Says Public Understands Administration Tackling Tough Issues. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman, in an interview on Comedy Central's The Daily Show With John Stewart (6/13), was asked what the GOP strategy for 2006 would include. Mehlman said that he's seen DNC chairman Howard Dean promoting his GOTV leaflet strategy and "I think our strategy is to get him to go to every undecided voter in America with those cards. That's how we can do it." Asked whether Republican candidates would "run away" from the Administration's record, Mehlman replied, "I think the American people understand we are dealing with tough challenges and dealing with a tough war, dealing with a global economy which makes people worry about things like their pensions and healthcare."

Resnick Says GOP Must Reach Out To Independents. Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, writes in the Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K) that the GOP majorities in the House and Senate "do not rest on the base alone. While keeping that segment of the party motivated is certainly an important factor in the November midterms, it isn't enough. To maintain our majorities, particularly in the House, our party must reach out to independent and swing voters." Resnick adds, "The Republican Revolution was a two-pronged effort relying on both a motivated conservative base and efforts to reach out to independent swing voters. To maintain that majority in 2006, we'd do well to remember the lessons of 1994."

Laura Bush Campaigns With Kean In New Jersey. The New York Times (6/14, Chen, 1.19M) reports Vice President Dick Cheney's campaign stop for New Jersey state Sen. Thomas H. Kean Jr. "did not go according to plan." Kean "was late after taking the usually traffic-clogged Route 1 from Trenton rather than the speedier New Jersey Turnpike, prompting speculation that he did not want to be photographed with Mr. Cheney." But yesterday, when "a far more popular administration figure — Laura Bush, the first lady — arrived here on Tuesday for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean's candidacy for the United States Senate, everything appeared to run smoothly." Kean and Mrs. Bush "appeared on stage together, under a big, white tent just a few miles from the Shore, and Mr. Kean delivered, almost verbatim, the same speech from his primary night celebration a week ago." The "fact that Mrs. Bush came to support Mr. Kean so early in the election season is the latest indication of how optimistic the national Republican Party is that it can put a New Jersey Republican in the Senate for the first time in three decades."

DeLay Recorded Phone Message For VA8 Primary Candidate. The Washington Post (6/14, A12, Gowen, 744K) reports that Virginia's 8th Congressional District GOP candidate Mark Ellmore's campaign received some last minute help from former Rep. Tom DeLay, who recently took up official residence in the district. Ellmore, "who lost to Tom O'Donoghue in the GOP primary to face Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D) in November, called DeLay's office Monday morning. DeLay's staff members set up an automated call from their boss that went to 8,000 voters in the district -- which includes Alexandria, Arlington County and part of Fairfax County -- urging them to the polls to support Ellmore. Problem was, in the intro, DeLay said 'Northern California' instead of 'Northern Virginia.'"

Roll Call (6/14, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "DeLay began his message by saying, 'Hello, this is Tom DeLay.' He mentioned that as Majority Leader, he 'battled Jim Moran in Congress for 14 years.' Then, for some reason, he continued, 'I recently re-registered to vote in Northern California.' … Clearly, or so we assume, DeLay meant to say that he recently re-registered to vote in Northern Virginia. Though we just can't help but wonder if perhaps he was dreaming of the day that hippy dippy Marin County takes a hard turn to the right."

Giuliani Outlines Energy Strategy. The AP (6/14, Fouhy) reports, "Stepping up his political visibility as he contemplates a run for president, former Mayor Rudolph Giuliani laid out an energy strategy Tuesday that calls for more use of nuclear power and ethanol." Speaking to the Manhattan Institute, Giuliani "called for a comprehensive effort to wean the nation from petroleum. The New York Times (6/14, Healy, 1.19M) says that while Giuliani "did not criticize Mr. Bush by name, and some of his ideas reflected Republican orthodoxy about increasing energy supply," he "implicitly accused the White House of doing little to expand energy sources. Afterward, too, he expressed concern about global warming, saying that 'everyone accepts the fact that it's happening and it has an impact.'"

DOJ_NMG_0033631

Gore Says He Has No Plans To Run Again. Former Vice President Al Gore was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (6/13) if he has thought about entering the 2008 presidential race. Gore said, "I don't have plans to be a candidate again. I haven't made the so-called Sherman statement but that's not to leave the door open. It's more sort of an internal shifting of the gears. I really don't expect to be a candidate again." Gore added that "if you were a political reporter and you went to Iowa and New Hampshire, anywhere else in the country, you would look in vain for anyone who had been contacted by me or anyone on my behalf. I'm really not taking any steps. I have no intention, no plans to do that again."

Hayworth Invitation Calls Quayle 44th US President. The Washington Post (6/14, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "A recent e-mail from Rep. J.D. Hayworth 's reelection campaign invited supporters to join the Arizona Republican, his wife and 'The Honorable Dan Quayle , 44th President of the United States.'" Quayle "was actually the 44th vice president, but a typo dropped the 'vice' and started a buzz among startled GOPers who thought Quayle wanted to be the next -- that would be 44th -- president." The Post adds, "A correction was quickly issued; at press time, the only heart-pounding element at the June 24 event will be the coffee."

States Said To Have Financial Incentive To Encourage Adoption. NBC Nightly News (6/13, story 8, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Congress passed a law almost 10 years ago that gives states bonuses based on the number of kids moved from foster care into adoptive homes. Now, some child welfare experts are saying the bonuses are leading some children to be put at risk." NBC (Thompson) added, "Why would a state pressure welfare workers to force adoptions? One reason may be money. States can earn Federal bonuses for keeping adoption numbers high, and in Kentucky, workers can even get extra vacation." An NBC News computer analysis "shows adoptions have risen dramatically nationwide. In Kentucky, they've tripled in six years while those Federal bonuses have grown to more than a million dollars. At the same time, the number of kids returned to their parents, often the best solution, has dropped sharply. States don't get bonuses for that."

States Consider Privatizing Parts Of Interstate Highway System. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/14, A1, Goldstein, 744K) reports that the state of Indiana "is about to turn over its entire toll road for the next 75 years to two foreign companies, making it more expensive to drive. The decision to hand the Indiana Toll Road to an Australian and Spanish team for $3.8 billion at the end of this month has blown up into one of the biggest brawls here in a generation." The decision "places Indiana at the leading edge of a nascent trend in which states and local governments are exploring the idea of privatizing parts of the United States' prized interstate highway system."

Israel Kills Terrorists, Civilians In Gaza Strike. The New York Times (6/14, Erlanger, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "Eight Palestinian civilians were killed and more than 40 wounded Tuesday by an Israeli missile strike on Islamic militants riding in a van that Israeli officials said was carrying rockets to launch at Israel. Two men in the van were also killed, including a man the Israelis consider an important rocket maker." The Times says the civilian deaths "are bound to make it harder for" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "and the United States to persuade Hamas…to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Palestinian-Israeli agreements... Mr. Abbas will also find it more difficult to get Hamas to accept a referendum proposal that would at least implicitly recognize Israel."

The Washington Post (6/14, A19, Wilson, 744K) calls the strike "the deadliest such attack this year," and notes, "The armed confrontation between Israel and the Palestinian militias…has coincided with a worsening internal conflict among the Palestinian parties. Deep partisan divisions within the security services have split its more than 70,000 members into rival camps, a combustible situation made worse by delays of more than three months in payment of salaries because of economic sanctions."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, Prusher, 61K) reports, "The cross-border arms volley -- as well as worsening strife among Palestinians -- has gained a deadly momentum since late last week, setting up a dynamic that may put prospects for dialogue among all the parties further out of reach."

Israel Says Palestinian Explosive Was Responsible For Gaza Beach Deaths. ABC World News Tonight (6/13, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Israel contends it was not responsible for the beach explosion that killed Palestinians last week. Palestinians have blamed an artillery shelling. But Israel says its investigation found an explosive buried in the sand was responsible. It says an analysis of the shrapnel found the Israelis were not involved. Palestinians dismiss the Israeli claim."

LATimes Says Palestinian Conflict Endangers US Efforts In Iraq. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/14, 958K) says "bad news from the West Bank and Gaza -- the site of the proposed Palestinian state that he envisions existing alongside Israel -- is also bad news for the US mission in Iraq." The Palestinian cause "has been embraced

DOJ_NMG_0033632

-- sometimes sincerely, sometimes cynically -- by millions of Arabs and Muslims. A bloodbath in the West Bank and Gaza -- even a fratricidal one -- would have ominous echoes for the United States elsewhere, including Iran and, yes, Iraq."

Four Chinese Companies Sanctioned For Aiding Iran. The Treasury Department has sanctioned four Chinese companies saying they had aided Iran's ballistic missile programs. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "The US moves underscore the complexities Washington faces as it seeks to contain Iran. … The four Chinese state-owned companies are Beijing Alite Technologies Co., LIMMT Economic and Trade Co., China National Precision Machinery Import/Export Corp., and China Great Wall Industry Corp., or CGWIC. The US also cited CGWIC's Torrance, Calif., U.S. subsidiary, G.W. Aerospace Inc. The Treasury froze the companies' US assets, and barred US companies, banks and individuals from doing business with them."

Democrats Say Bush Focus On Iran Is Political Ploy. The Hill (6/14, Tiron) reports that some Democrats believe the White House's recent focus on Iran "is a political ploy aimed at boosting the President's low approval ratings." Democrats "point out that the Iran situation could be a win-win for Bush. If he brokers a deal Bush can claim victory, and if it falls apart it would set up an opportunity for the President to talk about homeland security and terrorism in the lead-up to the election. While Democrats are quick to point out that keeping nuclear weapons out of Iran's hands is extremely important, some of them say that politics are playing a significant role in the administration's foreign-policy initiative."

Pew Poll Shows US Global Image Weakening. The New York Times (6/14, Knowlton, 1.19M) reports a 15-nation Pew Research Center poll showing that, "as the war in Iraq continues for a fourth year, the global image of America has slipped further, even among people in some countries closely allied with the United States." The prevalence of positive views of the US declined sharply in the past year in Spain, India, Russia, Turkey and Indonesia. "Declines were less steep in France, Germany and Jordan, while people in China and Pakistan had a slightly more favorable image of the United States this year than last. In Britain, Washington's closest ally in the Iraq war, positive views of America have remained in the mid-50-percent range in the past two years, down sharply from 75 percent in 2002, before the war." Respondents in 13 of the 15 nations said the war in Iraq was a greater danger to security than Iran's nuclear program.

US Seen As "Quietly Beginning To Accept" ICC. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Bravin, 2.11M) reports Washington "is quietly beginning to accept the International Criminal Court, the Hague tribunal that President Bush repudiated in 2002, as the White House seeks to temper criticism that it considers itself unbound by international law. That new approach will be on display today, when the ICC's chief prosecutor reports to the United Nations Security Council on his investigation into alleged war crimes in Darfur." The US is said to "consider the ICC perhaps the only chance to bring Darfur war criminals to justice."

US Military Violated Irish Law By Transporting Convicted Marine Through Airport. The AP (6/14, Pogatchnik) reports, "The U.S. military violated Irish law by transporting a convicted U.S. Marine through Shannon Airport without government permission, Foreign Minister Dermot Ahern announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "The episode – discovered when a cleaner spotted the man, in handcuffs and military fatigues, on the plane at the airport – underscored Irish suspicions that the U.S. military also could be ferrying munitions and terrorism suspects through this officially neutral nation." The AP adds, "U.S. Ambassador James Kenny confirmed that a U.S. Marine, who had been convicted of stealing by a U.S. military tribunal in Kuwait, was being transported Sunday under guard on a Defense Department-chartered aircraft. He said the military should have sought written permission from Ireland's Justice Department to bring the convict into Irish airspace but failed to do so. … 'We regret that this incident happened and are reviewing procedures closely with Irish authorities to ensure that this does not happen again,' said Kenny, who pledged that all future U.S. military and chartered troop transports refueling in Shannon would be 'completely transparent and in conformity with Irish law and the wishes of the Irish government.'" The AP notes that Ahern "said the legal breach was particularly sensitive because of widespread suspicions that the Central Intelligence Agency was using Shannon – a strategically located, trans-Atlantic refueling point – for transporting al-Qaeda and Taliban suspects. Both the Irish and U.S. governments have denied this. … Ireland's practice of permitting U.S. military troop carriers bound for Iraq to refuel at Shannon has been deeply controversial. This is the first time, however, that the government has formally accused U.S. authorities of overstepping the limits of Irish neutrality."

GAO Report Says US Is Unprepared For Venezuelan Oil Ban. A congressional investigation has found that a Venezuelan embargo on oil exports to the US would cause an immediate 15% surge in world oil prices. The Financial Times (6/14, Webb-Vidal) reports that the GAO study, "obtained by the Financial Times before its release this month, warns that the US is inadequately prepared for a potential loss of oil from Venezuela. The investigation was requested 18 months ago by Senator Richard Lugar, Republican chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, reflecting growing concerns about the reliability of Venezuelan oil supplies."

DOJ_NMG_0033633

The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Luhnow, 2.11M) also reports on the GAO study. According to the Journal, "The report tries to measure how vulnerable the US is to both short-term and longer-term disruptions in the flow from Venezuela, where President Hugo Chávez has been a vociferous critic of US policy. It calculates, for instance, that a six-month stoppage of Venezuelan output would lead to a short-term price spike of $11 a barrel of oil and cost the US economy some $23 billion. Such a stark turn is unlikely, however, because Mr. Chávez relies on the US as his biggest buyer of oil and needs the revenue to fund half his government's populist agenda."

Oil-Producing Countries Using Leverage Over Consuming Nations. The Wall Street Journal (6/14, Bahree, Cummins, 2.11M) reports that there is an "enduring shift in the balance of power between the fuel-guzzling West and oil-rich developing countries." The West's "mutual dependency is unraveling and a new order is taking shape, turning the tables on America, its allies and other big energy consumers. Major exporting nations have concluded that they have more leverage than ever before over consuming countries."

Canadian Conservative Draws Comparisons To Chavez. The New York Times (6/14, Austen, 1.19M) reports that Danny Williams, a member of the Conservative Party of Canada, "is being compared to a self-proclaimed revolutionary, the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chávez. … Since walking out on talks with a group led by Exxon Mobil and the Canadian subsidiary of Chevron over the development of the Hebron oil field this spring, Mr. Williams has never been more popular, at least at home. And he has since bolstered that gain by threatening to propose a new law that would revoke the lease on the property that has been held by the oil consortium for more than two decades." Williams' "battle with some of the world's largest oil companies over a last major offshore reserve has led critics to label him a revolutionary — kind of a North American version of Mr. Chávez."

Bush To Take Koizumi On Tour Of Graceland. USA Today (6/14, Dorell, 2.31M) reports that will take Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on a guided tour through Graceland during Koizumi's lat official US visit. Koizumi "will get to visit the home and final resting place of the King on June 30, a day after he and Bush discuss human rights and the US-Japanese alliance, the Japanese Embassy said." The visit ""will be the first visit by any sitting president or world leader, said Jack Soden, chief executive of Elvis Presley Enterprises, which manages the estate."

The Washington Post (6/14, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "The trip had to have been Koizumi's idea. The 64-year-old PM is well known as the most serious Elvis disciple of today's world leaders. He shares a birthday (Jan. 8) with the rock icon, and his brother once ran the Presley fan club's Yokohama chapter. In 1987, he was one of the key players in erecting a bronze statue of Presley in Tokyo. He's sung Elvis tunes poolside at Bush's Crawford ranch and dazzled Condi Rice with his knowledge of Elvis trivia at a G8 dinner."

Somali Militias Seek To Reassure Western Leaders. The Washington Post (6/14, A17, Timberg, 744K) reports, "The Islamic militias that took over the capital of Somalia last week are seeking to solidify their rule while reassuring Western leaders that they do not intend to impose an extremist, Taliban-style government on that battered East African country, diplomats, analysts and militia officials say. … This contrasts starkly with initial reports that the loosely organized militias are dominated by religious fundamentalists bent on delivering a purist vision of Islamic law, including the banning of certain films, the chopping off of robbers' hands and the public execution of murderers."

US Sends Conciliatory Signals To Somalia. The Christian Science Monitor (6/14, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the US on Thursday "will initiate a 'Somalia contact group' of interested countries and organizations to begin deliberating on how the international community can help stabilize what experts consider to be a 'failed state.'" The US "is sending out conciliatory signals to the Islamic Courts Union, which vows to turn Somalia into a religious state under sharia law. In addition to setting up the international contact group, the State Department is issuing cautious, open-minded statements toward the advancing Islamists. The tone suggests a carefully revised US position on Somalia, analysts say."

Before US Visit, Uribe Orders Investigations Into Police Scandal. The Washington Times (6/14, Salisbury, 90K) reports that as newly elected Colombian President Alvaro Uribe prepares to meet with President Bush at the White House today, an "explosive new scandal has placed the Colombian military under unusual pressure." Before leaving Colombia for the US, Uribe "ordered investigations into reputed extrajudicial executions by government troops and the possibility of illegal 'paramilitary' and drug-trafficking infiltration of the Colombian army, the Colombian presidential intelligence service, and the Colombian national police."

Meyerson Calls Proposed Colombia Trade Agreement "Ridiculous." Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K) that the Administration's proposed trade agreement with the government of Colombia is "ridiculous." Colombia's million-member union movement functions "is no fan of the proposed trade accord, which it fears will allow US agribusiness to undercut Colombia's non-drug-related agricultural economy while doing nothing about the nation's abysmal standards of worker rights. For the average Colombian, the trade agreement would add insult to what is all too often deadly injury."

DOJ_NMG_0033634

Senate Measure Would Establish Permanent Trade Relations With Vietnam. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/13, 2.11M) reported, "A bipartisan group of senators, led by Montana Democrat Max Baucus and Oregon Republican Gordon Smith, are launching a drive to waive Cold War-era restrictions that limit trade with Vietnam. Legislation backed by the senators would establish permanent trade relations between the US and Vietnam, ensuring Vietnam is accorded the same basic US trade benefits as all other members of the World Trade Organization."

UN Preparing For New Peacekeeping Mission In East Timor. The AP (6/14) reports that UN Secretary General Kofi Annan yesterday said he would send a team to East Timor. Annan said the team would "prepare for the return of United Nations peacekeepers," but he "warned that a new mission would need at least six more months to set up." The AP adds that Annan "also bluntly suggested that the Security Council had scaled down the previous United Nations peacekeeping mission in East Timor too quickly. That, he said, was partly responsible for new violence that has killed more than 30 people in the last month."

The Washington Post (6/14, A18, Lynch, 744K) reports, "The new UN mission would replace an Australian-led multinational force of about 2,700 troops that intervened in East Timor last month to quell fighting between military factions, which threatened the stability of the world's youngest independent nation. A senior UN envoy, Ian Martin, told reporters that the mission would provide law and order primarily in Dili, the capital, in advance of East Timor's May 2007 presidential and legislative elections."

Agencies Paying Millions In AIDS Incentives. The Washington Times (6/14, Palmer, 90K) reports, "Across the impoverished continent, aid agencies are doling out millions of dollars on 'allowance' fees and per diems, financial incentives for people in countries hard hit by the AIDS epidemic to attend meetings and seminars to learn how to prevent it. Although widely practiced, the custom is rarely talked about: Donors would likely be shocked if they knew their dollars were the only thing that can lure to AIDS seminars the very people who should be most interested in promoting development and battling the disease."

NYTimes Researcher's Trial In China To Begin This Week. The New York Times (6/14, Lague, 1.19M) reports that the trial of a New York Times researcher who is accused of disclosing state secrets and fraud will begin In Beijing Friday. The researcher, Zhao "has been in custody for 22 months without appearing in court. … The accusation that he disclosed state secrets arose from a September 2004 article published in The Times that reported that a former president, Jiang Zemin, had offered to resign his post as head of the military, according to the indictment. The article prompted a high-level leak investigation by the governing Communist Party. Mr. Jiang resigned two weeks later. Mr. Zhao denies the charges. The Times also denies that Mr. Zhao disclosed state secrets."

Power Restored To US Mission In Cuba. Electricity has been restored to the US mission in Cuba. The AP (6/14, Snow) reports that the power was restored "after Washington accused Fidel Castro's government of deliberately cutting off the building's power. Cuba denied the charge." On Monday, US officials "accused Cuba of harassing the American mission by deliberately cutting off power and reducing the water supply." The Washington Times (6/14, 90K) also runs the AP story this morning.

Russian Law Enforcement Agencies Said To Be Acting To Enrich Corrupt Officials. The New York Times (6/14, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "On March 29, agents of the Interior Ministry seized 167,500 mobile phones that Motorola had shipped into Sheremetyevo Airport in Moscow, dragging the company into the Kafkaesque world where Russian justice intersects with business." The Times adds, "With a shadowy economy, a growing bureaucracy and a capricious embrace of law, Russia has long been a maddening place for businesses to operate, a developing market that is at once lucrative and full of risks. But the experience of Motorola has highlighted what executives, analysts and even some pro-government lawmakers in a largely pliant Parliament say is a worrisome trend: law enforcement agencies are not only taking sides in commercial disputes, but also precipitating them to enrich corrupt officials and their intermediaries."

Humanitarian Funding For Darfur Running Low. The CBS Evening News (6/13, story 9, 4:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported that in Darfur, "three years ago, open warfare broke out when ethnic African farmers rose up against the Arab-led government, which responded by unleashing these nomad Arab militias. Since then, at least 180,000 people have died and 2 million have been driven from their homes." CBS (Logan) added, "This overstretched clinic itself may not survive. It's one of only two medical facilities serving more than 40,000 people here in Zam Zam Camp in North Darfur. But it's being forced to close in two weeks because it's run out of money. There was no shortage of funding when the crisis in Darfur began three years ago with fighting between local rebels and the government of Sudan allied with Arab militias. With whole villages abandoned as people fled the fighting, foreign aid money came pouring into camps like this. Today, these people's needs are still great, but international interest and donations are fading. There are 20,000 people living here, but that's just a tiny fraction of the two million people in Darfur who have been forced out of their homes and live in camps like this, where, as you can see, there's little or no protection from the harsh desert climate, and they rely entirely on aid for their survival. That aid comes primarily from organizations like the International Rescue Committee, which runs projects across Darfur. But they can't reach everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0033635

ElBaradei Lauds US-India Deal, Touts Disarmament. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (6/14, A23, 744K), IAEA Director-General and Nobel laureate Mohamed ElBaradei suggests "new approaches in a number of areas" to improve the international nonproliferation regime. Nations with nuclear weapons should "recommit" to disarmament, and must "tighten controls" on nuclear fuel that might include an IAEA-run nuclear fuel bank for civilian reactor operators." ElBaradei continues, "However fervently we might wish it," Israel, India and Pakistan, which "remain outside the NPT," are not "likely to give up [their] nuclear weapons or the nuclear weapons option outside of a global or regional arms control framework. Our traditional strategy -- of treating such states as outsiders -- is no longer a realistic method of bringing these last few countries into the fold." The U.S.-India nuclear cooperation agreement "is a creative break with the past that, handled properly, will be a first step forward for both India and the international community. India will get safe and modern technology to help lift more than 500 million people from poverty, and it will be part of the international effort to combat nuclear terrorism and rid our world of nuclear weapons." El-Baradei concludes, "No one ever said controlling nuclear weapons was going to be easy. It will take courage,… tenacity…a great deal more outside-of-the-box thinking, and a sense of realism," but "it will be worth the effort."

Italian Foreign Minister Says He'll Work To Strengthen Euro-Atlantic Ties. Massimo D'Alema, the foreign minister of Italy, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/14, 2.11M), "In a few days I will travel to Washington with a simple and clear message. The new government in Rome is committed to building a stronger Euro-Atlantic community. … The Italian center-left opposed military intervention in Iraq in March 2003. This does not mean, however, that the new Romano Prodi government will turn Italy into a less useful partner for Washington. The opposite may well prove true. … There is no readymade recipe for the tangle of issues that hamper progress in the broader Middle East, but Europe and the U.S. can and should devise a regional strategy equally convincing to both sides of the Atlantic, and combine their resources in pursuit of shared visions."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Security Crackdown Begins In Baghdad."
"Paralyzed L.A. Officer Glad To Be Alive."
"Top Bush Aide Rove Won't Be Charged."
"A Wok With Jesus: Saving Souls In Chinese Kitchens."
"Sunbather's Death Puts Focus On SUV Patrols."
"An English-Only Beef In A Cheesesteak Joint? Comin' Right Up."
"USC May Be Spoiler In NFL Coliseum Plan."

USA Today:
"FEMA Lost $1B To Fraud, Errors."
"Traumas Create Unwitting Test Subjects."
"Some Muslims Press Public Spaces To Make Room For Women's Modesty."

New York Times:
"Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Iraq To Press Leadership."
"No Rove Charges Over Testimony In C.I.A. Leak."
"Israeli Missiles Kill 10 In Gaza."
"Lives Suspended On Gulf Coast, Crammed Into 240 Square Feet."
"Hiding In Plain Sight, Google Expands Its Power."

Washington Post:
"Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case, Lawyer Says."
"Webb Wins Democratic Nomination In Virginia."
"In Baghdad, Bush Pledges Support To Iraqi Leader."
"Strapped States Try New Route, Lease Toll Roads To Foreign Firms."

Washington Times:
"If You're A Council Friend, You Don't Pay."
"Bush Drops By Baghdad."
"To U.S., World Cup Is Ho-Hum."
"Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case."
"Liberal Groups Treat Hillary To Jeers, Cheers."

Detroit Free Press:
"Doctor's Wife Beaten, Drugged."
"Union Votes $60 Million For Growth, Survival."
"Bush To Iraq: It's Up To You."
"Is $5 Million Fair For Fairways."

DOJ_NMG_0033636

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Bush Drops In On Iraq."
"Cabinet Official Is Primary User Of CDC Jet."
"Prison For Ex-Mayor."
"$752 – It's A Lot For Some 'People.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"Bush Offers Reassurance In A Surprise Visit To Iraq."
"Super-Secret 'Googleplex.'"
"More City Parking Tickets Are Sticking."
"With Cloud Of Indictment Past, Rove Free To Strategize."
"Risky Acts In Spotlight After Steeler QB's Injury."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Trip; Baghdad Security Plan; Zarqawi Successor-Threats; Israel-Gaza Explosion; Rove-No Indictment; Tropical Storm Alberto; FEMA-Katrina Fraud; Electronic Stability Control; Pittsburgh QB Recovery; KFC-Transfat Lawsuit; Woodruff Recovery.
CBS: Bush-Iraq Trip; Iraq Visit-Secrecy; Rove-No Indictment; Tropical Storm Alberto; FEMA-Katrina Fraud; NIH-Tissue Sample Fraud; Stock Markets; Type 2 Diabetes Drug; Darfur-Funding Shortage; Funeral-CBS Soundman.
NBC: Bush-Iraq Trip; Iraq Trip-Political Strategy; Iraq Violence; Rove-No Indictment; Tropical Storm Alberto; FEMA-Katrina Fraud; Patrick Kennedy-Guilty Plea; Foster Care-Abuse Allegations; Stock Markets; USS New York.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Baghdad Visit; Rove-CIA Leak; Tropical Storm Alberto; House-Minimum Wage.
NPR: Iraq-Security Crackdown; Bush-Baghdad Visit; Pentagon-Interrogation Techniques; Conway Nomination; Wall Street; Tropical Storm Alberto; House-Cost Of Living Raise; Primary Elections.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the President of Colombia; meets with members of the Iraq Study Group, Roosevelt Room; attends the congressional picnic, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Participates in a tour of part of the National Gallery of Art collection with Leila Castellaneta, wife of Ambassador Giovanni Castellaneta.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. SENATE FLOOR _ Meets for morning business; then resumes consideration of H.R. 4939.

9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Hearing on liability issues in the cleanup of abandoned hardrock mines. EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson; Dennis E. Ellis Executive Director, Colorado Dept. of Public Health and Environment; Velma M. Smith, National Environmental Trust; John Gioia, Chair, Board of Supervisors, Contra Costa Public Works; Terry Harwood, former Executive Director Hazardous Material Policy Council, USDA; Scott A. Lewis, Director, Environmental and Governmental Affairs, AngloGold Ashanti North America Inc. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee hearing on S. 374, the Tribal Parity Act, and S. 1535, the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe Equitable Compensation Amendments Act. Testimony from the Lower Brule Sioux Tribe; Crow Creek Sioux Tribe; Morgan, Angel & Associates; Great Plains Tribal Chairmans Association; Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe. Location: Room 485, Russell.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on communications laws. FTC Commissioner William Kovacic; Vinton Cerf - Vice President and chief Internet evangelist, Google Inc.; David L. Cohen, Comcast Corp., Philadelphia; Walter McCormick, president and CEO, U.S. Telecom Association; Christopher Putala, Earthlink Inc.; Blair Levin, Stifel, Nicolaus and Co. Inc., St. Louis; Paul T. Morris, Utah Telecommunication Open Infrastructure Agency; John Kuhns, Pennsylvania State University. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and votes on nominations, followed by a hearing on proposed changes in the Federal Accounting Standards Board rules on retirement plans. Chairman Robert Herz, David Tweedie of the International Accounty Standards Board. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Technology, Innovation and Competitiveness Subcommittee. Hearing on alternative energy technologies. Alan Gotcher, Altair Nanotechnologies, Inc.; Francis Preli, Jr., UTC Power; K.R. Sridhar, Ion America Corp.; Thomas Werner, SunPower Corp.; Peter Corsell, GridPoint, Inc.; George Taylor, Ocean Power Technologies, Inc.; Daniel Raudebaugh, Center for Transportation and the Environment. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on extension of the Mark-to-Market program of HUD that helps to provide affordable housing. Deputy Assistant HUD Secretary Ted Toon; Chris Foster, President, National Leased Housing Association. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed meeting on pending business. Location: Room 219, Hart.

DOJ_NMG_0033637

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 5576 - Transportation, Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, the Judiciary, the District of Columbia, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on NIH research policies regarding human tissue samples. Thomas Insel, Director, National Institute of Mental Health, NIH; Dr. David L. Friedman, Madison, Conn.; Trey Sunderland, Geriatric Psychiatry Branch, National Institute of Mental Health, NIH; Karen Putman, formerly with the NIMH, Wyoming, OH; Michael Gottesman, Intramural Research, NIH. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R.5450 - National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Act. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 4890 - Line Item Veto Act of 2006. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Workforce Protections Subcommittee. Hearing on Labor Department's use of non-consensus standards for workplace health and safety. Assistant Labor Secretary Edwin Foulke; Joseph Casper, Brick Industry Association; others. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on implementation of the Medicare prescription drug benefit, beneficiary enrollment and lessons learned. Testimony tentatively scheduled from HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt; HHS Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Administrator Mark McClellan; Connecticut Dept. of Social Services; Pharmaceutical Care Management Association; Families USA; American Health Insurance Plans; National Council on Aging; National Association of Insurance Commissioners. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

11 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on waste and fraud following Hurricane Katrina. Testimony from Donna Daniels, FEMA, Dept. of Homeland Security; Joseph Becker, American Red Cross; GAO. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

11 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Subcommittee Oversight Hearing on ``Modern-Day Slavery: Spotlight on the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, Forced Labor, and Sex Trafficking at the World Cup." Briefing by Julia Ormond, UN Goodwill Ambassador; testimony from Department of State; International Justice Mission; as well as two Russian trafficking victims. Location: 2172 Rayburn House Office Bldg.

11 a.m. RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on H.R. 4761 - Domestic Energy Production through Offshore Exploration and Equitable Threatment of State holds Act of 2006. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

1 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on Deepwater implementation. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on how to inform parents and protect children from violent and explicit video games. Testimony from the FTC, Wal-Mart, Entertainment Software Association, Entertainment Software Rating Board, Kids Risk Project, Children's Technology Review, and the National Institute on Media and the Family. Location: 2123 Rayburn.

2 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Intelligence, Information Sharing and Terrorism Risk Assessment Subcommittee. Hearing on TSA's Office of Intelligence. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

3 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Terrorism/Human Intelligence, Analysis and Counterintelligence Subcommittee. Closed briefing on Title 50 and Title 10. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

Other: PRESIDENT ALVARO URIBE VELEZ OF COLOMBIA _ Highlights: 11 a.m. Meets with President Bush, White House; 12 p.m. Photo op of meeting with USTR Susan Schwab. 600 17th St. NW.

REGIONAL LEADERS _ Rep. Ruben Hinojosa hosts the 5th Regional Leaders Conference for local elected officials, education administrators, municipal representatives others. Highlights: 8:15 a.m. Deputy Agriculture Secretary Chuck Connor. 8:45 a.m. Sen. Robert Menendez. 9 a.m. NIH Director Elias Zerhouni and CMMS Administrator Mark McClellan. 10 a.m. Rep. Steny Hoyer. 11:15 a.m. Reps. Luis Gutierrez and Silvestre Reyes on immigration reform and border security. 11:45 a.m. Rep. George Miller. Location: Jefferson Building, Library of Congress.

ENERGY CONFERENCE _ The U.S. Energy Association holds its 17th annual Energy Efficiency Forum. Highlights: 8:55 a.m. Cheng Lianyuan, Director, Beijing Municipal Bureau of Industrial Development. 10 a.m. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. 10:30 a.m. Timothy Wirth, President UN Foundation and Better World Fund. 11 a.m. Pennyslvania Gov. Ed Rendell. 11:30 a.m. Panel discussion on balancing energy supply and demand, with President Red Cavaney of the American Petroleum Institute, Edison Electric Institute President Thomas Kuhn, American Gas Association

DOJ_NMG_0033638

President David Parker. 1 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman. Location: National Press Club.

TAKE BACK AMERICA _ Speakers at today's Campaign for America's Future meeting include: Sens. Russ Feingold and Barack Obama, Reps. Lynn Woolsey, Bernie Saunders and others. Highlights: 9 a.m. Russ Feingold. 11:15 a.m. Reps. Lynn Woolsey and Bernie Saunders and former Ambassador and author Joe Wilson. 12:45 p.m. Sen. Barack Obama and Rep. Jan Schakowsky. Location: Washington Hilton.

GLOBAL DEVELOPMENT _ The Initiative for Global Development holds its National Summit. Speakers include Bill Gates, Sr., former EPA Administrator Bill Ruckelshaus, retired Gen. John Shalikashvili, former Secretaries of State Madeleine Albright and Colin Powell. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SENATE-FLAG AMENDMENT _ 8:45 a.m. Senate Majority Leader Frist and other members of the Senate join Maj. Gen. Patrick Brady, U.S. Army (Ret.) and Chicago Cubs great Rick Monday and former Miss America Heather French at news conference on the Flag Protection Amendment. Location: Russell Senate Park.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 9 a.m. House Democratic Caucus meets, followed by stakeout. Location: 345 Cannon House Office Bldg.

HOUSE GOP _ 9 a.m. House Republicans meet, followed by stakeout. Location: Capitol Hill Club.

DEMOCRATS-ACCOUNTABILITY _ 10 a.m. House Democrats hold a news conference on oversight and accountability, with Reps. Nancy Pelosi, Steny Hoyer, others. Location: Cannon Rotunda, outside 345 Cannon. Notes: Follows 9 a.m. closed House Democratic Caucus meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 10 a.m. The House Republican leadership holds a media availability on supporting the troops in Iraq. Location: Stakeout area, outside the Capitol Hill Club. Notes: Follows closed 9 a.m. House GOP Conference meeting.

RUMSFELD _ 10 a.m. Defense Secretary Rumsfeld hosts honor cordon to welcome Ecuador's Minister of National Defense Oswaldo Jarrin. Location: Steps of Pentagon Mall Entrance.

EMERGENCY HEALTH CARE _ 11 a.m. The Institute of Medicine (IOM) hosts a briefing, ``Improving Emergency Care in the United States." The event, part of an IOM series, describes in detail the current state of the emergency medical system and recommends ways to end overcrowding and ambulance diversions, overcome financial problems, achieve better preparedness for disasters, and provide suitable care for pediatric patients. Briefers include: Gail L. Warden (chair), president emeritus, Henry Ford Health System, Detroit; Benjamin K. Chu, regional president, Southern California Kaiser Foundation Health Plan and Hospital, Pasadena, Calif.; A. Brent Eastman, chief medical officer, Scripps Health, San Diego; Shirley Gamble, consultant, Austin, Texas; and Marianne Gausche-Hill, clinical professor of medicine and director of pre-hospital care, Harbor-UCLA Medical Center, Torrance, Calif. Location: Room 100, National Academies' Keck Center, 500 Fifth St. NW.

IRAN-NEIGHBORS _ 11 a.m. Release of a public opinion survey by Terror Free Tomorrow in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey on Iran's nuclear weapons program. Notes: For details, contact Tracy Zimmerman, 202-518-8047.

DEMOCRATS-FLAG AMENDMENT _ 11:30 a.m. Sens. Patrick Leahy, Russ Feingold and Edward Kennedy hold news conference with members of veterans opposed to a Constitutional amendment on flag desecration. Location: Senate Swamp.

IRAQ-DEMOCRATS _ 11:30 a.m. Democratic members of the House Armed Services Committee hold a news conference on Iraq. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

LATINO LUNCHEON _ 11:30 a.m. Texas State Sen. Leticia Van de Putte gives the keynote speech at the Latino Leaders Luncheon. Location: St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K Sts. NW.

NICARAGUA _ 11:30 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a discussion with Nicaraguan presidential candidate Eduardo Montealegre. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

US ENERGY POLICY _ 12:30 a.m. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman addresses Johnson Controls 17th Annual Energy Efficiency Forum in Washington, DC. He's expected to discuss the administration's Advanced Energy Initiative and the importance of renewable energy. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

DEMOCRATS-AGENDA _ 12 p.m. The 21st Century Democrats organization holds a roundtable discussion with Democratic candidates from around the country about the challenges and promises facing the Democratic Party and the progressive movement. Location: National Press Club.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE _ 12:30 p.m. Supporters of the Pledge Protection Act, to keep the words ``under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, hold a news conference. Congressional sponsors of the legislation will attend. Location: Russell Senate Park.

DEMOCRATS-CONFERENCE CALL _ 1 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Reps. Charles Rangel, George Miller, Collin Peterson and Rosa DeLauro hold conference call to discuss Democrats' commitment to fight for a New Direction for America. Contacts: Brendan Daly, 202-226-7616. Notes: call 888-283-1645; code 061406.

IRAQ _ 1 p.m. Reps. Martin Meehan, Neil Abercrombie, Walter Jones and Ron Paul hold a news conference to discuss the House leaderhip's unwillingness to hold a full debate on the Iraq war. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

DOJ_NMG_0033639

JOHANNS _ 1:15 p.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks to the Nebraska Bankers Association meeting. Location: Beacon Hotel, 1615 Rhode Island Ave. NW.

INTERNET FREEDOM _ 1:45 p.m. Sens. Olympia Snowe (R-ME) and Byron Dorgan (D-ND) hold news conference along with the Christian Coalition, Moveon.org and other groups. They're supporting the Internet Freedom Preservation Act. Location: Russeell Senate Park.

NEW ORLEANS HOUSING-HUD _ 2 p.m. US Housing Secretary Alphonso Jackson holds teleconference to announce HUD's plan to reopen and redevelop New Orleans public housing. Contacts: Donna White, 202-708-0685. Notes: Call 800-377-4872; ask for chairperson Alphonso Jackson.

SENATE-BUDGET _ 2 p.m. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist hold press conference to discuss improvements to the budget process. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

VETERANS-ID THEFT _ 2:30 p.m. Senators Akaka, Murray, Clinton, Salazar hold news conference on Veterans ID theft. Location: Senate Studio.

IRAQ-DEATHS _ 3 p.m. Take Back America organization holds a silent walk with banners, signs and flag-draped coffins in response to the U.S. military deaths in Iraq. Location: Starts at the Washington Hilton and proceeds to the White House.

THEOCRACY-ELECTIONS _ 3:30 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion on ``American Theocracy: Comments on the Forthcoming 2006 Elections,'' with author Kevin Phillips, others. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CULTURAL AWARENESS _ 5:30 p.m. Sens. Edward Kennedy and Richard Lugar, others, meet more than 250 high school students from the Islamic world who are participating in the Cultural Bridges program. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

ARMED FORCES _ 6 p.m. Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England addresses Armed Forces Foundation 2nd annual gala. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, June 14, 2006 8:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, June 14, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060614.pdf; dojclips060614.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Pentagon To Disclose Interrogation Tactics (AP) 4
Pentagon Rethinking Manual With Interrogation Methods (NYT). 5
Defense Claims Case Based On Misunderstandings (SPRINGMN) 6
Professors Testify About Defendant's Demeanor (AP)..... 6
Family Of Guantanamo Detainee Doubts He Took His Own Life (WP) 7
A Prison We Need To Escape (WP) 8
Detainees In Despair (NYT)..... 9
Indonesia Frees Cleric Linked To Bali Bombings (FT) 10
Indonesia Releases Militant Cleric (WT/AP) 11
Once Free, Indonesian Cleric Could "Revitalize" Radicals (CSM)..... 11
Cleric Linked To 2002 Bali Nightclub Bombings Is Released (NYT) 12
Man Tells Of London Police Raid (WP) 13
Muslim Shot In London Terror Case Says Police Offered No ID Or Warning (NYT)..... 14

Homeland Response:

U.S. Counterterrorism Agencies Finding Potential Homegrown Extremists In U.S. (SDUT/AP)..... 15
Al Qaeda Remains Threat, Officials Warn (WT) 16
Appeals Court Hears Arguments On Proposed Biodefense Lab (AP) 17
U.S. To Review Proposals To Shield Commercial Planes From Missiles (WSJ) 17
Worse Than Nothing (NYT) 18
FEMA Lost $1B To Fraud, Errors (USAT)..... 18
Fraudulent Katrina And Rita Claims Top $1 Billion (WP)..... 19
Study Finds Huge Fraud In The Wake Of Hurricanes (NYT) 20
Lives Suspended On Gulf Coast, Crammed Into 240 Square Feet (NYT) 21
How Fla. Spells Relief: A-l-b-e-r-t-o (USAT)..... 22
Tropical Storm Weakens Before Hitting Florida (NYT) 23
Alberto Turns Out To Be Splash In The Panhandle (WP) 24

War News:

Bush Tells Iraq Leader U.S. Will Back Him (AP)..... 25
Bush's Visit To Baghdad Signifies Upturn In His Political Fortunes (WSJ)..... 26
Spate Of Good News Gives White House A Chance To Regroup (WP) 28
A Lift In Iraq And A Bump Back Home (CSM)..... 29
Bush Is On A Bit Of A Roll After Months Of Unrelenting Bad News (KRT) 30
Bush In Iraq Fans An Uptick In Polls (CHIT)..... 31
In Iraq Visit, Bush Seizes On A Step Forward (NYT)..... 33
Bush Tells Iraq: Your Future "is In Your Hands" (USAT)..... 34
Bush Drops By Baghdad (WT) 35
Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Iraq To Press Leadership (NYT) 36
Trip To Iraq Was Shrouded In Secrecy (WT)..... 38
Surprise Visit To Baghdad Follows Month Of Planning (USAT). 38
In Baghdad, Bush Pledges Support To Iraqi Leader (WP)..... 39
A Boost From Mr. Bush (WP) 41
Too Soon To Cheer In Baghdad (NYT)..... 41
Bush's Iraq Drop-in Builds Support, But What's Next? (USAT) .. 42
Bush In Baghdad (WSJ) 42
Crackdown In Baghdad Set To Begin (LAT)..... 43
PM Announces Sweeping Security Crackdown In Baghdad (USAT) 45
Crackdown Announced For Baghdad (WP)..... 45
Operation To Show Insurgents "No Mercy" (WT) 46
Iraq Mulls Amnesty Offer To Insurgents (FT)..... 47
Dozens Die In Timed Attacks Aimed At Top Kirkuk Officials (NYT) 48
Bush Flies To Iraq To Pledge Support For Premier (FT)..... 48
Defense Phase Of Hussein Trial Ends (NYT/AP)..... 49
Marines To Investigate Internet Video (LAT) 50
For Iraqis, Exodus To Syria And Jordan Continues (NYT)..... 50
11,000 Troops Readied For Afghan Offensive (USAT) 51
New Leader For Marines Is Picked (WSJ) 51
Veteran Of War In Iraq Named To Oversee Marine Corps (NYT)52

Corporate Scandals:

A Crackdown On 'Perfect' Timing (WP) 52
SEC Steps Up Effort To Curb Options Dating In Rule On Executive Pay (WSJ)..... 54
Senate Chairman Asks Prosecutors To Act On Options (Update2) (BLOOM) 55

Probe Into US Stock Option Claims Grows (FT) ... 55
Grassley: Deal With Backdating (MRKTWTCH) ... 56
Pension Funds Sue Companies, Cite Backdated Stock Options (USAT) ... 56
Some Enron Broadband Jurors Say They Felt Pressured To Convict (AP) ... 57
2 Utilities To Pay Enron $50 Million In Settlement (NYT) ... 57
White House Weighs Move To Rein In Fannie And Freddie (WSJ) ... 58
Pressure On Fannie, Freddie Increases (WP) ... 59
U.S. Government Starting Special Reviews Of Mortgage Giants (FINDLAW/AP) ... 60
Memo To Fannie (WSJ) ... 61
S.E.C. Opens Fund Rules For Comment (NYT/BLOOM) ... 61
New Chief For Accounting-Oversight Board Is Near (WSJ) ... 62
Taking An Audit Of Regulatory Cooperation (WSJ) ... 63

Criminal Law:

Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case, Lawyer Says (WP) ... 64
No Rove Charges Over Testimony On C.I.A. Leak (NYT) ... 65
Rove Won't Be Charged In CIA Leak Case (AP) ... 67
Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case (WT) ... 68
Rove Won't Face Criminal Charges In CIA Case (USAT) ... 69
Prosecutors Say Rove Won't Be Indicted In Leak Case (LAT) ... 70
Maybe Not Morning In America, But At Least Out Of The Dark (WP) ... 70
Rove Won't Be Charged In CIA Leak Probe, Lawyer Says (Update4) (BLOOM) ... 71
Nonindictment Of Rove Owes Much To Tactics (WSJ) ... 73
Analysis: Telling FBI The Truth Saved Rove (AP) ... 74
No Charges Against Rove In CIA Leak Case (LAW) ... 75
Frogs Aren't Marching (WSJ) ... 76
U.S. Challenges House Leaders On Searches (AP-Y2) ... 77
Deliberations In Safavian Trial Postponed (AP) ... 77
Two Ex-cops Who Moonlighted As Mob Hit Men Turn Against Their Lawyers (FINDLAW/AP) ... 78
Laski Sentenced To 24 Months In Chicago Corruption Case (CHIT) ... 79
Ex-city Clerk Gets 2 Years In Jail (CHIST) ... 80
City Hall Lawyer: I Was Unaware Of Hiring 'Irregularities' Before April 2005 (CHIT) ... 80
Suspended Bolivar Official Enters Pleas To Felony Charges (BSH) ... 81
California Man Charged As Enforcer For Israeli Cartel Pleads Guilty (FINDLAW/AP) ... 82
Duke's Redick Charged With DWI, Cancels Orlando Workout (WP) ... 82
Antigua Hits Back At US Gaming Laws (FT) ... 83
Rep. Kennedy Gets Probation After Guilty Plea (WP) ... 83
Representative Kennedy Reaches Deal (NYT) ... 85
Kennedy Sentenced After Guilty Plea To DUI (AP-Y2) ... 85
Kennedy Pleads Guilty To DUI, Gets Probation (RC) ... 86
Rep. Kennedy Cops A Plea For May DUI (HILL) ... 88
Rep. Kennedy Gets Probation In DUI Plea Deal (LAT) ... 89
Rep. Kennedy Gets Supervised Probation For DUI (CHIT) ... 90
FBI Web Site Attracts Tipsters, Whistleblowers Against Public Corruption (FOX) ... 90
'Suspicious Box' Blown Up Near Courthouse May Have Contained Criminal Evidence (LAW) ... 93

Civil Rights:

In Harm's Way At Hospital? (WP) ... 93
Justice Department Looks Into Deaths Of People Subdued By Stun Guns (USAT) ... 95
City Attorney Will Get Little Earth Case (MINNST) ... 96
Officers Accused In Little Earth Incident Could Face Charges (STPPP) ... 96
Smuggling Suspects Face New Charges (WT) ... 97
EEOC Is Hobbled, Groups Contend (WP) ... 97
Some Muslims Press Public Spaces To Make Room For Women's Modesty (USAT) ... 98
Muzzled At The ACLU (USAT) ... 99

Antitrust:

Blockbuster Retaliates Against Netflix (AP) ... 100
Net Neutrality Fight Returns To Senate (CNET) ... 100
Brussels Regulators Sharpened Their Teeth On Microsoft (FT) 102
EU Accelerates Deadline On Suez-GDF (AP) ... 102
Mittal Issues Growth Outlook To Raise Bid Pressure On Arcelor (WSJ) ... 103
Tech World Worries As Company's Patent Stockpile Grows (LAW) ... 103

Environment:

Judge Drops Part Of Charge Against Company (AP) ... 106
Land-use Suit Becomes Federal Fight (LONGDTC) ... 107
No Vote On Mine Safety Nominee (NYT/AP) ... 108
G.M. — Again (NYT) ... 108
Warming At The Court (WP) ... 109

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Transfers Wales Slaying Case To Portland (SEATIMES) . 110
FBI Shakes Up Management Of Wales Investigation (AP) ... 111
Grand Jury Indicts 6 Men On Drug Trafficking Charges (PROJO) ... 111
Convictions Upheld In Boxed Bodies Case (DA) ... 112
WADA Calls NHL Doping Test Meaningless (AP) ... 112
Steroids Inquiry Must Start With Old Scars (NYT) ... 112
UK Fears Record Afghan Heroin Output (GUA) ... 114
Chateaugay Native Selected To Head U.S. Marshals Service (PLATTSPR) ... 114
Fugitive Gunman Makes Appearance In Federal Court (GBPG) 116

Immigration:

Bail Set At $340,000 For Customs Officer (SDUT) ... 116
High-Tech Titans Unite On Lifting Visa Caps (WSJ) ... 117
Spitting Into The Wind On Immigration (WSJ) ... 118

DOJ_NMG_0033643

Tax:

Campbell Gets 30 Months In Prison Sentence Is An 'Abomination,' Former Atlanta Mayor Says (AJC) 119
Ex-Atlanta Mayor Given 30-Month Term And Financial Penalty In Tax Case (NYT)..... 121

Congress-Administration:

House Approves Funds For Wars And Hurricane Aid (NYT) ... 122
Reassessing Rehnquist (LAW) 123
New GC Appointed To The Department Of Agriculture (LAW) 125
Progress Noted In Welfare Reform (WT) 125
Meal Plan For Hungry Kids, 'Backpack Clubs' Try To Fill A Gap (WSJ) 126
Lawmakers Send Mixed Signals On Timing Of Medicare Bill (HILL) 128
Minimum-Wage Boost Wins Support (WSJ) 130
House Lawmakers Accept $3,300 Pay Hike (AP)..... 131
House Accepts $3,300 Raise (NYT/AP) 131
COLA Survives Matheson's Challenge (RC) 131
Murtha Halts Bid For Leader (RC)..... 132
Rep. Murtha Abandons Leadership Bid — For Now (HILL)..... 134
McConnell Prepares For Top Job (HILL) 135
McConnell Bides His Time (RC)..... 136
Congressman Offers Papers To Rebut Claims (AP) 138
Mollohan Reveals Finances (CHGAZ) 139
Rep. Mollohan Admits Errors In Disclosure (WP) 139
Rep. Mollohan Restates Filings On Disclosures (WSJ)..... 140
Congressman In F.B.I. Inquiry Corrects Errors In Financial Disclosure Forms (NYT)..... 141
Mollohan Amends Finance Reports (WHINT)..... 142
Former Clients Fueled Firm (RC) 143
'New Direction' Is New Theme For Democratic Plan (USAT)... 144
'Serious Misconduct' By NIH Expert Found (WP) 145
NIH Researcher Gave Samples To Pfizer, Pocketed $600,000 (LAT) 146
Newbie Local Political Activist (RC)..... 147
Bill Would Limit Consumers' Credit Rights (USAT)..... 148
Give Judges A Peek At Secrets (LAT) 148
Wrenching Changes On The Line (NYT) 149

Other News:

May Retail Sales Rose 0.1%, Signaling A Slowing Economy (WSJ) 150
Retail Sales Fall Flat; Inflation News Mixed (USAT)..... 150
Core Producer Prices Rise A Little More Than Forecast (NYT) 151
The Mark Of The Bust (NYT)..... 152
From Sizzle To Fizzle For Investors (USAT)..... 153
Tumbling Markets May Be Reflection Of Strong Growth (WSJ) 153
The 'Noisy Market' Hypothesis (WSJ) 155
Global Capital On The Run (WP) 157
Former Reagan Aide Wins Va. Senate Primary (AP-Y2) 158
Webb Wins Democratic Primary For Senate (WT) 159
Virginia Democrats Back Ex-Navy Secretary In Senate Race (NYT) 160
Webb Wins Democratic Nomination In Virginia (WP)..... 161
Webb Will Try To Turn Past GOP Loyalty Into Advantage (WP) 162
Clinton Booed On Iraq (HILL) 164
Anti-war Activists Jeer Hillary Clinton (AP-Y2) 165
Clinton And Kerry Show Democratic Divide On Troop Withdrawal (NYT) 166
Liberal Activists Boo Clinton (WP)..... 167
Democrats Are Still Divided Over The War In Iraq (KRT)..... 168
Liberal Groups Treat Hillary To Jeers, Cheers (WT) 169
Democrats Not Finding Unity On Iraq Party Leaders Offer Markedly Different Visions On How To End War (SFC).. 170
Clinton Opens Debate On Family Planning (NYT)..... 171
Rove Rallies NH GOP Before Midterm Election (MUL) 172
For The GOP, A Base Hit Isn't Enough (WP)..... 173
Laura Bush Stumps For Kean, And Things Go Smoothly (NYT) 174
In N.Va., Chance Help From DeLay (WP) 174
Giuliani Lays Out Energy Strategy In N.Y. (AP-Y2) 175
Giuliani Says Nation Lacks Energy Policy (NYT)..... 175
The Reliable Source (WP)..... 176
Strapped States Try New Route, Lease Toll Roads To Foreign Firms (WP)..... 177
Israeli Missiles Kill 10 In Gaza (NYT) 179
Israeli Airstrike Kills 11 Palestinians (WP)..... 181
Gaza Conflicts Gain Deadly Momentum (CSM) 182
The Abbas-Hamas Problem (LAT) 183
U.S. Sanctions 4 Chinese Firms For Aiding Iran (WSJ) 184
Some Democrats See A Political Motivation In Bush Focus On Iran (HILL)..... 185
Global Image Of The U.S. Is Worsening, Survey Finds (NYT). 186
U.S. Warms To Hague Tribunal (WSJ) 187
U.S. Military Broke Law By Transporting Convicted Marine Through Irish Airport (AP)..... 188
US "not Ready" For Chávez Oil Ban Threat (FT)..... 189
Report Cites U.S. Vulnerability To Venezuela Oil-Flow Disruption (WSJ)..... 190
Crude Calculations In Oil's New Era, Power Shifts To Countries With Reserves (WSJ) 191
Canada Conservative Gets Aggressive With Big Oil (NYT) 194
Bush To Take No. 1 Elvis Fan On Tour Of Graceland (USAT) 195
Somalia's Islamic Militias Reaching Out To The West (WP) 196
US Trading Hostilities For Talk In Somalia? (CSM)..... 197
Uribe Faces Scandal On Eve Of U.S. Visit (WT) 198
Ratifying Death In Colombia (WP)..... 199
U.N. Prepares To Start A New Peacekeeping Mission In East Timor (NYT/AP) 200
U.N. Plans To Send Troops To E. Timor (WP) 201
AIDS Incentives Costly To Agencies (WT)..... 202
Trial For Jailed Times Researcher To Start Friday In A Beijing Court (NYT)..... 203
U.S. Mission In Cuba Gets Power Back (USAT/AP)..... 203
Power Returned To U.S. Mission Building (WT/AP) 204
Phone Seizure Seen As Example Of Russian Corruption (NYT) 204
Rethinking Nuclear Safeguards (WP) 206

DOJ_NMG_0033644

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon To Disclose Interrogation Tactics (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

The Associated Press, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - In the face of growing criticism over the treatment of detainees, Pentagon officials have decided to make public all of the military's interrogation techniques.

The decision, which comes after months of internal debate and pressure from members of Congress, would reveal interrogation tactics in a long-awaited revision of the Army Field Manual, despite arguments that it could allow enemy prisoners to better resist questioning.

Defense officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision is not public yet, said Tuesday that the Pentagon had dropped plans to keep some interrogation techniques secret by putting them in a classified section of the military manual.

The two senior officials said there will not be a classified section in the manual. One of the officials said descriptions of interrogation techniques initially planned for the classified section are either being made public or are being eliminated as tactics that can be used against prisoners.

One human rights group hailed the decision as a welcome victory.

"I think this is huge - it's a very significant step toward creating the kind of clarity in the rules that military personnel have said that they lack, and that led to a lot of the abuses," said Elisa Massimino, Washington Director for Human Rights First.

Military leaders had argued that making all of the interrogation tactics public would allow enemy combatants to train and prepare for specific techniques.

The military's treatment of detainees has been under increased scrutiny since the Abu Ghraib prisoner scandal in Iraq became known two years ago. Photographs that surfaced at the time showed U.S. troops beating, intimidating and sexually abusing prisoners.

Human rights groups have also called for the Bush administration to close the detention center at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where three detainees committed suicide late last week.

Last month, several members of Congress privately cautioned the Pentagon against including a classified section for interrogation details. The debate has contributed to the long delay in releasing the manual, which has been in the works for more than a year.

Lawmakers argued that including a secret section that would detail what interrogators can and can't do to prisoners could fuel concerns both at home and abroad that the U.S. military was hiding torture techniques that violate the law or rules governing detainee treatment.

In a letter last week to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., said the U.S. could suffer if the manual did not reflect the Geneva Conventions requirement for human treatment of detainees.

"By perpetrating human rights abuses in the name of the Global War on Terror we are in fact fueling a worldwide wave of hatred and violence against the United States," said Meehan. "To regain credibility in the world we need to act in the same manner that we speak."

As originally planned, the classified section would have included details such as how long prisoners can be forced to sit or stand in certain positions or how hot or cold their holding areas can be kept. The defense officials did not say which interrogation techniques would be included in the manual.

Opponents said greater transparency would dispel suspicions that the military was trying to exploit legal loopholes.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said for the first time last month that officials were at odds over whether the manual should endorse different interrogation techniques for enemy insurgents than are allowed for regular prisoners of war.

There are concerns such a distinction could violate a law enacted last year that explicitly banned cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners by U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0033645

Massimino, of Human Rights First, said that the new law, pressed by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., would ensure that any interrogation technique not included in the manual would be considered illegal. She said it also would help clear up any confusion troops may have had over what tactics are allowed.

ON THE NET

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Pentagon Rethinking Manual With Interrogation Methods (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — Under pressure from Congress and some of its own senior generals, the Pentagon is backing away from including a classified set of interrogation techniques in a new Army field manual, Pentagon and Senate officials said Tuesday.

The Defense Department is also expected to drop a plan to have one set of interrogation methods for detainees that the military considers "unlawful combatants," like detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and another set for traditional prisoners of war captured on the battlefield, the officials said.

Some military officials and top aides to Vice President Dick Cheney have insisted it is essential to have a secret set of techniques and to leave ambiguous just how far American interrogators could go to extract information from terror suspects.

But lawmakers from both parties, State Department officials and human rights organizations argued that detainees would eventually disclose the secret interrogation techniques and that keeping them secret would only reinforce the perception abroad that the United States condoned torture as an interrogation method.

The Associated Press first reported the change on Tuesday.

Senior Pentagon and State Department officials warned Tuesday that while the administration was moving in the direction of making public all interrogation techniques or removing some completely from the manual, a final policy had not yet been set and further changes could be made.

"I think we are getting close to a resolution," Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England said in a brief interview on Tuesday.

The Bush administration has held that many captives in the campaign against terrorism are not entitled to the same protections as prisoners of war. And that seemed to be an underlying principle of revisions to a long-delayed Army field manual, used by commanders, interrogators and military lawyers, that has been the subject of an internal administration debate for more than a year.

Advocates of the classified techniques, which would be in an annex of the manual, and of two sets of methods for different types of prisoners said they were all valuable tools against a variety of detainees trained in Qaeda camps on how to resist allied interrogations.

The Pentagon began reversing course last month, after three senior Republican senators, John McCain of Arizona, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, expressed strong reservations about the draft field manual in meetings with Mr. England and letters to him.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham said having two sets of interrogation techniques would violate the legislation that Mr. McCain sponsored and that was enacted last December to bar cruel and inhumane treatment of American detainees. The measure requires that only interrogation techniques authorized by the new Army field manual be used on prisoners.

Mr. Warner argued against publishing a classified annex to the field manual with exacting details about which procedures may or may not be used, and in what circumstances. The entire manual should be open to public review, he said.

"I asked them to weigh carefully the need for the classified version because it could begin to undermine what I anticipate and hope will be a strong acceptance for an open revision to the field manual," Mr. Warner said in an interview Tuesday.

In addition to the lawmakers' complaints, some senior generals also objected. At a recent meeting of the nation's top worldwide commanders, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the Central Command, and Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said the new interrogation techniques had to be clear and unambiguous "so our corporals in the field can understand them," said a military officer briefed on the remarks.

A senior Defense Department official, who was granted anonymity because the new field manual has not yet been approved, said: "If this debate were limited to what's best for interrogation purposes, the decision would be pretty easy. But then you have to look at what you lose diplomatically."

Human rights groups applauded the apparent shift in the Pentagon's position.

DOJ_NMG_0033646

"If the Pentagon is stepping back from that, it's a welcome sign that they now understand the need for transparency and clarity," said Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First.

Defense Claims Case Based On Misunderstandings (SPRINGMN)

By Ron Wood, The Morning News

Springdale (AR) Morning News, June 14, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE Lawyers for a Fayetteville man accused of trying to help the Palestinian Islamic Jihad told jurors Tuesday morning the government's whole case is based on a series of misunderstandings.

Arwah Jaber is charged with knowingly attempting to provide material support to a government-recognized, foreign terrorist organization. His trial began Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Fayetteville.

Attorneys for Jaber said he was frustrated by a professor who was not allowing him to graduate with his doctorate degree. They admit he made statements he shouldn't have made but he had no intention of violating the law.

"What is this case really about? It's about him saying something he shouldn't have said," defense attorney John Wesley Hall, Jr., said. "He was frustrated."

Jaber also faces a number of minor charges related to immigration statements and credit card applications.

Federal prosecutors said Tuesday that making false statements, using multiple names and someone else's social security number was an indication that Jaber intended to become a martyr for the Palestinian cause against Israel. They say he also made small amounts of an explosive, had Palestinian propaganda and he told numerous people he intended to go fight the Israelis and might not return.

The case is set for two weeks.

Also Tuesday, a juror was released and an alternate assigned to take his place. The man worked at night and was having trouble staying awake and alert.

Professors Testify About Defendant's Demeanor (AP)

AP, June 14, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. - A University of Arkansas professor said Tuesday he told investigators he didn't think graduate student Arwah Jaber had any terroristic inclinations. Jaber is accused of trying to help a Palestinian group labeled by U.S. authorities as a terrorist organization.

Another professor says he noticed a change in Jaber's attitude toward his work after Jaber talked with a friend in Palestine about materialism and the meaning of life.

Jaber, 34, completed his doctorate in chemistry at the university while he was free on bond, facing a charge of trying to provide material support to a group the United States considers a terrorist organization.

A naturalized U.S. citizen born in the West Bank, Jaber was arrested June 16, 2005, as he waited to board a flight at Northwest Arkansas Regional Airport at Highfill. His trial on the terrorism-help charge, as well as other charges accusing him of lying to immigration officials and providing false information on credit card applications, began Monday in federal court.

Charles Wilkins, a professor of chemistry and Jaber's adviser, testified Tuesday that he told FBI agents he didn't see any inclination toward terrorism in the graduate student. Jaber had recently been denied his doctoral degree in chemistry when he said he was going to Palestine with his wife.

"I believed he was going to Palestine and was not coming back at that point," Wilkins said.

David Paul, an associate professor of chemistry who was on Jaber's doctoral dissertation committee, said he noticed Jaber stopped making progress toward his degree after speaking with a friend in Palestine.

Jaber became very upset with the Israelis, Paul said.

"He needed to go home and make the Israelis sorry," Paul said.

Both said professors tried to convince Jaber to stay and complete his degree.

Defense attorneys said in their opening statement that Jaber was not acting like a potential terrorist or suicide bomber. He was trying to finish his doctoral degree, he had a job lined up at American University in Kuwait, and he bought tickets for the trip to Palestine four months in advance.

The case against Jaber resulted from his frustration and saying something he shouldn't have, his lawyer told jurors Tuesday. His lawyers said he was frustrated with a professor who was not allowing him to graduate, and they admit he made statements he shouldn't have made. But they said he had no intention of violating the law.

"What is this case really about? It's about him saying something he shouldn't have said," defense attorney John Wesley Hall Jr. of Little Rock said. "He was frustrated."

DOJ_NMG_0033647

Prosecutors, however, said that making false statements, and using multiple names and someone else's Social Security number indicated that Jaber intended to become a martyr for the Palestinian cause against Israel.

Prosecutors say he tried to join the group Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

They said he also made small amounts of an explosive, had Palestinian propaganda and told numerous people, including a professor, that he intended to go fight the Israelis. Jaber allegedly told a professor who was supervising Jaber's work toward his doctorate that he was going to Palestine to "fight for freedom, peace and justice."

Family Of Guantanamo Detainee Doubts He Took His Own Life (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

MEDINA, Saudi Arabia, June 13 -- Yassar Talal al-Zharani's life began on the Red Sea coast 21 years ago, included a stint as a Taliban fighter in Afghanistan, and ended on Saturday in a reported suicide in the U.S.-run prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The death united his friends and family here in grief and disbelief at the Pentagon's version of events.

They described a man who was optimistic, stubborn and too devout to have taken his own life. "He had memorized the Koran by heart. He was a strong believer. How could he take his own life and spend eternity in hell?" asked his sister Sohayla, alluding to Islam's punishment for suicide.

The death of Zharani and two other detainees last week has reignited resentment in the Arab world over the prison that holds more than 450 people, mainly Arab and Muslim men, almost all without charge.

The U.S. administration says most of the facility's detainees are hardened al-Qaeda radicals caught on the battlefields of Afghanistan who must remain incarcerated so as not to stage new attacks on Americans.

Zharani's father, Talal, a fit, bearded 52-year-old retired police colonel, said he believes his son was either hanged by guards or beaten to death by them. The body has not been returned; the father has asked the Saudi government to demand an independent autopsy and investigation.

Sitting with his youngest son and son-in-law in his third-floor apartment Tuesday, Zharani said that when the truth is revealed, it could lead to the closure of the detention facility. "When we expose their crime to the world, then the price for my son's life will have been the freedom of the other prisoners," he said. "I want Yassar to be the last person to die in Guantanamo."

Yassar Zharani was born in the coastal city of Yanbu, the third of nine children. He was the second of three boys, and he spent a lot of time with his mother and sisters and enjoyed amusing them. "He used to sing children's songs to make us laugh," recalled his mother, Umm-Muhammed, 43.

She wore mourning clothes Tuesday, a long-sleeved black shirt and long brown skirt, her hair in a ponytail.

She's not sure why Zharani went to Afghanistan, she said, adjusting her silver glasses. In the summer of 2001, he had just finished 11th grade, and he got permission from his father to go to the United Arab Emirates to take English-language and computer courses. The next thing she knew, he was in Afghanistan.

Zharani's father said he believes his son was working for a relief organization there and got dragged into the war after the U.S.-led invasion that October toppled the ruling Taliban.

But a young man who was recently released from Guantanamo said he had met Zharani several times in northern Afghanistan before the invasion and knew him as a Taliban foot soldier fighting against the Northern Alliance, the country's main anti-Taliban group at the time. The young man, speaking on condition of anonymity, said he was captured with Zharani in Mazar-e-Sharif in post-invasion hostilities and took part in a prison uprising there with him.

Saad al-Azmi, a Kuwaiti man who was freed from Guantanamo last year, said in an interview that he spent about a week in a cell next to Zharani's. "He used to be gone for hours," he said. "He told me they used to strip him to his underwear, bind his hands and feet together with iron shackles, and pour cold water on him. He said they wanted to know things about Afghanistan."

Azmi said he didn't get a chance to learn more because Zharani was moved. But right before Azmi's release last November, Zharani was still being interrogated, he said. "Word went around the prison blocks to pray for Yassar, among a group of others who were being pushed hard, because he was being interrogated through the night," Azmi said.

Azmi dissents from the common view here that Yassar did not kill himself. "His body was a bit frail, he was young. It wasn't just a short period of torture, it was years of torture. It's very possible he wanted to end it," he said.

Zharani was 17 when he arrived at Guantanamo, making him one of the youngest prisoners. Azmi and others who knew him there said that despite his youth he was always trying to cheer the others up, saying that it was God who was putting them through this ordeal and that He would end it soon. Because of the location of his cell, and his extensive knowledge of the Koran, he also often led them in prayers.

DOJ_NMG_0033648

He spoke constantly about his mother, how much she must be missing him, and boasted often that his father treated him like a man despite his age, taking him out with him to adult gatherings and relying on him to drive his mother around in the pickup truck he'd bought him when he turned 16.

But he also had a temper. One former detainee recalls that Zharani returned his Koran to the facility's imam because he was disturbed that soldiers had searched or moved it, in his mind a desecration, while he was out during prison walks or in interrogation. When guards tried to return it, he refused to take the book back. Finally, half a dozen guards in riot gear entered his cell, shackled him and returned the Koran by force, the detainee recalled.

Zharani's letters from prison did not mention any of this. On Tuesday, his mother picked up a ream of letters scrawled in spidery Arabic writing. One letter, dated Dec. 30, 2002, contained these words: "And don't be sad if you are believers. God's deliverance is near." She read from another sheet. "Don't worry. God will unite us. I will be home soon."

Last month, with the release of 15 Saudi prisoners from Guantanamo, his family's hopes were also raised. Zharani's mother recalled that she was seated on the floor Saturday, praying in one of her daughter's rooms, when her husband came home from a trip to Mecca unexpectedly. "I told my daughter, 'Go see your father -- he's home. I hope that soon Yassar will walk in on us, just like that, unexpectedly.' "

But her husband walked into the room, knelt down beside her and hugged her. "He kept saying, 'Be patient, let your faith in God be strong, be patient, let your faith in God be strong.' "

She recounted the story calmly. "Then he told me that Yassar had been killed by the Americans in Guantanamo during a brawl over the Koran."

Her son was a young boy, she said. Why didn't the Americans just see what he had to say and release him? Why didn't they at least let her hear his voice on the phone or visit him? "Now all I want is his body back so I can hug him and say goodbye." She picked up a photo of her son in a skullcap and orange jumpsuit, kissed it and put it back down.

In the men's section of the apartment Tuesday, Zharani's father stood greeting the men dressed in the traditional Saudi robes who streamed in to offer condolences. Each kissed him on both cheeks.

"May God grant you patience," they said. "Our prayers are with you." Then they left. As soon as he sat back down, a high-ranking Interior Ministry official returned his call. The father was agitated but very respectful.

"Sir, how can we allow the Americans to conduct the autopsy when they are themselves under suspicion?" he asked. After a few moments of listening, he relaxed and smiled. "Yes, and an independent investigation into the matter by an objective third party." He hung up.

"The Americans can't be both judge and jury in this matter," he said. "We have to have justice."

A Prison We Need To Escape (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

When I hear U.S. officials describe the suicides of three Muslim prisoners at Guantanamo Bay last Saturday as "asymmetric warfare" and "a good PR move," I know it's time to close that camp -- not just because of what it's doing to the prisoners but because of how it is dehumanizing the American captors.

The American officials spoke of the dead prisoners as if they inhabited a different moral universe. That's what war does: People stop seeing their enemies as human beings and consign them to a different category. It was discomfiting to see this indifference stated so bluntly, and subsequent U.S. statements tactfully disavowed the initial ones.

We might call it the Guantanamo syndrome -- this process of mutual corrosion and dehumanization. The antidote is to get inside Guantanamo, to see the prisoners as individuals and begin to make distinctions. That's why due process for the detainees is so important -- because it will allow courts to distinguish between prisoners who are vicious killers and deserve the harshest punishment, and those who may be innocent of any terrorist crimes. We need to stop seeing everyone in the same orange suits.

A start in re-humanizing these prisoners is a remarkable book called "Enemy Combatant" by Moazzam Begg, a British-born prisoner who was released in 2005 after nearly two years in solitary confinement at Guantanamo. The book appeared this year in Britain, and an American edition will be published in September by the New Press. It came to my attention because the publisher asked me to write a brief foreword.

Begg is a radical Muslim, but there is no evidence he was an active member of al-Qaeda or that he engaged in terrorist operations. He grew up in a Pakistani family in Birmingham, England, attended a Jewish primary school and as a kid listened to UB40. He drifted toward radical Islam as a young man and began raising money for Muslim fighters in Bosnia, Chechnya and Afghanistan. In 1998 he traveled to Pakistan, and in 2001 he moved his family to Kabul, where he supported the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0033649

Begg was seized in Islamabad in January 2002. Though he was never charged with any crime, he was held for three years -- at Kandahar and Bagram in Afghanistan and then at Guantanamo. In one early interrogation at Bagram, he says, an FBI agent told him: "After 9/11, Moazzam, the rules changed. We have new laws, and according to them, you're already convicted." What's chilling about that line is that it was essentially true.

"It is considered a sin in Islam to despair," he writes, but after he was transferred to a solitary cell at Guantanamo in 2003, Begg began to crack. The guards seemed obsessed with preventing suicide. Begg received an odd plastic blanket, for example, and later learned that it was a "suicide blanket" that couldn't be torn up to make a noose. When guards found paint chipped in his cell, they worried that he was trying to poison himself.

A prison psychiatrist explained to Begg that there had indeed been suicide attempts: "She told me there were people who'd lost all sense of time, reason, reality; people who had been kept in a solitary cell, completely blocked off with no window, eight foot by six, like mine, but with absolutely nobody to speak to, nobody. She said some of them just ended up talking to themselves." A despairing Begg writes at one point to his father back in England: "I still don't know what crime I am supposed to have committed. . . . I am in a state of desperation and I am beginning to lose the fight against depression and hopelessness."

What gives me hope -- not just for Begg but for all of us -- is that he never lost his humanity at Guantanamo. He talked constantly with his American guards, asking where they were from, what they wanted out of life. When guards made racist remarks, he shamed them by answering back in perfect English. He describes a guard named Jennifer from Selma, Ala., who painted her fingernails black and dressed like a Goth on weekends, and who once confided: "I don't know if they've ever accused you of anything. But I know y'all can't be guilty." Begg says of her: "She left me with a lasting impression. All Americans were not the same."

When we think about Guantanamo, we need to follow that same rule. The prisoners aren't all the same, except in one sense: They are human beings and, as such, they have basic human rights. That recognition is our own escape from Guantanamo.

Detainees In Despair (NYT)

By Mourad Benchellali

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

Lyon, France

I WAS released from the United States military's prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, in July 2004. As I was about to board a plane that would take me home to France, the last detainee I saw was a young Yemeni. He was overwhelmed by emotion.

"In your country, Mourad, there are rights, human rights, and they mean something," he said. "In mine they mean nothing, and no one cares. So when you're free, don't forget what you've been through. Tell people that we are here."

I now know that this Yemeni was not among the three prisoners who committed suicide at Guantánamo last weekend, but since then his words have been echoing in my head. Although I'm now a free man, the shared pain endlessly takes me back to the camp.

In the early summer of 2001, when I was 19, I made the mistake of listening to my older brother and going to Afghanistan on what I thought was a dream vacation. His friends, he said, were going to look after me. They did — channeling me to what turned out to be a Qaeda training camp. For two months, I was there, trapped in the middle of the desert by fear and my own stupidity.

As soon as my time was up, I headed home. I was a few miles from the Pakistani border when I learned with horror about the attacks of 9/11. Days later, the border was sealed off, and the only way through to Pakistan and a plane to Europe was across the mountains of the Hindu Kush. I was with a group of people who were all going the same way. No one was armed; most of them, like me, had been lured to Afghanistan by a misguided and mistimed sense of adventure, and were simply trying to make their way home.

I was seized by the Pakistani Army while having tea at a mosque shortly after I managed to cross the border. A few days later I was delivered to the United States Army: although I didn't know it at the time, I was now labeled an "enemy combatant." It did not matter that I was no one's enemy and had never been on a battlefield, let alone fought or aimed a weapon at anyone.

After two weeks in the American military base in Kandahar, Afghanistan, I was sent to Guantánamo, where I spent two and a half years. I cannot describe in just a few lines the suffering and the torture; but the worst aspect of being at the camp was the despair, the feeling that whatever you say, it will never make a difference.

DOJ_NMG_0033650

You repeat yourself over and over again to interrogators from the military intelligence, the F.B.I., the C.I.A. The first time you hear "Your case is being processed," your heart, seizing on the hopeful possibilities in those words, skips a beat. After months of disappointment, you try to develop an immunity to hope, but hope is an incurable disease.

I remember once an interrogator warming me up during several sessions for a polygraph test I was going to take, that was, according to him, infallible. After I took the test, I was left alone in the interrogation room; an hour later, the interrogator returned. "Congratulations," he said grimly. "You have passed the test." And he gave me a box of candy.

In the outside world, I thought, the difference between telling the truth and lying, between committing a crime and not committing it, is the difference between being in jail and being free. In Guantánamo, it is a box of candy.

I was eventually released and I will go on trial next month in Paris to face charges that I've never denied, that I spent two months in the Qaeda camp. I have a court date, I'm facing a judge, and I have a lawyer, unimaginable luxuries in Guantánamo. I didn't know the three detainees who died, but it is easy for me to see how this daily despair and uncertainty could lead to suicide.

During my captivity, I saw many acts of individual rebellion, from screaming to hunger strikes and suicide attempts. "They are smart, they are creative, they are committed," said Rear Adm. Harry Harris, who commands the camp. "They have no regard for life, neither ours nor their own. I believe this was not an act of desperation, but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us."

I am a quiet Muslim — I've never waged war, let alone an asymmetrical one. I wasn't anti-American before and, miraculously, I haven't become anti-American since. In Guantánamo, I did see some people for whom jihad is life itself, people whose minds are distorted by extremism and whose souls are full of hatred. But the huge majority of the faces I remember — the ones that haunt my nights — are of desperation, suffering, incomprehension turned into silent madness.

I believe that a small number of the detainees at Guantánamo are guilty of criminal acts, but as analysis of the military's documents on the prisoners has shown, there is no evidence that most of the 465 or so men there have committed hostile acts against the United States or its allies. Even so, what I heard so many times resounding from cage to cage, what I said myself so many times in my moments of complete despondency, was not, "Free us, we are innocent!" but "Judge us for whatever we've done!" There is unlimited cruelty in a system that seems to be unable to free the innocent and unable to punish the guilty.

Mourad Benchellali has written a book about his experience in a Qaeda camp andat Guantánamo Bay, with Antoine Audouard, who assisted in the writing of this article andtranslated it from the French.

Indonesia Frees Cleric Linked To Bali Bombings (FT)

By Shawn Donnan

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

Indonesia on Wednesday released radical cleric Abu Bakar Bashir from prison where he finished serving a 30-month sentence for giving his blessing to plans for the 2002 Bali bombings.

...

Supporters have said that the 68-year-old cleric would be returning home to central Java on Wednesday where he is expected to meet with reporters and distribute aid to survivors of last month's earthquake in the area.

Mr Bashir has been in detention almost continuously since October 2002, when authorities arrested him shortly after the Bali bombings, which left 202 people dead and brought Jemaah Islamiyah to international prominence.

He initially served an 18-month sentence on immigration charges before being rearrested and put on trial for his alleged role in what authorities called the "sinister conspiracy" behind the Bali attacks. A panel of judges last year sentenced him to 30 months in prison, which with time served and deducted for good behaviour expired on Wednesday.

The cleric's release has already drawn an angry reaction from the United States, which has long seen him as a key figure in terrorism in south-east Asia. A spokesman for the US embassy in Jakarta said US officials were disappointed by the move.

"The possibility that a person responsible for such a terrible crime could go free after serving a light sentence … is cause for concern," the spokesman said.

Indonesian officials, however, argue that Mr Bashir has lost credibility with many of his one-time supporters and is viewed by many in the world's largest Muslim nation as an oddity, albeit one who gains strength whenever the US and other western governments apply pressure.

Mr Bashir is "a spent force best deprived of oxygen and publicity," one senior Indonesian security official told the Financial Times on Tuesday. He warned that the "exaggerated attention" given to the cleric internationally would only elevate his status with the Indonesian public.

Mr Bashir, who has always denied the existence of Jemaah Islamiyah and any wrongdoing, has never been accused of either planning or executing terrorist attacks in Indonesia.

DOJ_NMG_0033651

Supporters and family members said the cleric wanted to return to live and teach at his boarding school near the central Java town of Solo.

"We are very happy to welcome his liberation day," said his son, Abdul Rahman, a teacher at the al-Mukmin school, from which a number of key figures involved in bombings in Indonesia in recent years have graduated.

But his son said Mr Bashir might have to take a quieter approach to life than he once had.

"The intensity of his propagation might have to be reduced," Abdul Rahman said in an interview with the Financial Times. "But that is because of health reasons and his age, not because of the pressure and black propaganda from those that consider Islam to be their enemy."

He was also unlikely to get a rowdy or prolonged welcome back to his boarding school, insisted Irsyad Fikri, a spokesman for the school.

"We haven't made any special preparations because the students here have their mid-term exams," Mr Fikri said. "We have instructed all the students to focus on their school exams rather than welcoming Ustad (Teacher) Bashir back."

Indonesia Releases Militant Cleric (WT/AP)

By Zakki Hakim, The Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 13, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- Authorities released militant cleric Abu Bakar Bashir from prison today, and about 150 of his supporters jubilantly greeted him with shouts of "God is great."

The 68-year-old cleric, who is accused of being a key leader of the al Qaeda-linked Southeast Asian militant group Jemaah Islamiyah, had served 26 months in prison for extending his blessing to the 2002 Bali nightclub bombings, which killed 202 persons, most of them foreign tourists.

Bashir's supporters gathered at Jakarta's Cipinang prison for his release, which came about 45 minutes earlier than expected.," they shouted.

His release raised concerns among Indonesian officials that he could energize the country's small, Islamic radical fringe.

Bashir, who has maintained that he is not guilty, plans to return to his school and retake his position at the head of his legal hard-line Islamic organization, the Council of Mujahedeen for Islamic Law Enforcement.

Indonesia's intelligence chief said he hoped that Bashir would cooperate with counterterrorism investigators now that he is a free man.

But the Bush administration criticized the release. It also sparked disapproval by Australia.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States was "deeply disappointed by what we consider a light sentence handed out to this individual."

Mr. McCormack said the decision to release Bashir was up to the Indonesian courts, but added that the sentence did not match the severity of the crime as described by Indonesian officials themselves.

In Sydney, Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said today that he was disappointed by Bashir's release and was concerned that he could advocate further violence.

"I have some concerns about his advocacy; there's no question of that. This is somebody who believes in the jihadist principles, if I could put it that way," Mr. Downer said in an interview with Sky News.

Indonesia's State Intelligence Agency chief Syamsir Siregar said the Council of Mujahedeen for Islamic Law Enforcement was used by militants linked to Jemaah Islamiyah as a "place for their struggle."

"We hope Bashir, after he has been jailed, will regain his self-awareness and be willing to cooperate with us," Mr. Siregar told lawmakers.

Jemaah Islamiyah is accused of carrying out church bombings across Indonesia in 2000, the 2002 Bali bombings, attacks in the Indonesian capital in 2003 and 2004, and a triple suicide bombing on Bali in October. The attacks killed more than 260 people.

Bashir has little active support in Indonesia, where most people follow a moderate form of Islam.

But some mainstream clerics and government officials have expressed sympathy for him, saying he is a victim of foreign meddling. Domestic press outlets often play down his suspected links to Jemaah Islamiyah.

Once Free, Indonesian Cleric Could "Revitalize" Radicals (CSM)

By Tom McCawley

The Christian Science Monitor, June 14, 2006

JAKARTA, INDONESIA

DOJ_NMG_0033652

A forthcoming prison diary by Islamist preacher Abu Bakar Bashir, who is due to be released Wednesday, shows his 25-month sentence has not tamed his jihadist fire. In the diary, he calls US President George Bush "evil" and claims the "infidel" Australian Prime Minster John Howard bullied a weak Indonesia to imprison him on trumped-up charges pertaining to the Bali bombings in 2002.

Upon release, Mr. Bashir is expected to return home to his Islamist boarding school, Ngruki, which schooled dozens of Indonesia's most prominent terrorists.

Yet analysts are downplaying fears that Bashir, accused of being the "emir" or leader of the militant group Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), will begin ordering bombings. Rather, Bashir is more likely to use his celebrity to preach fire and brimstone and bolster the cause of hard-line Islam.

Sidney Jones, a leading JI analyst with the International Crisis Group in Jakarta, argues that dozens of arrests have left the organization fragmented and damaged but still dangerous. Ms. Jones says that Bashir is likely to be become a "media star" and rallying symbol of Indonesia's Islamist fringe.

Indeed, the cleric plans to travel across Indonesia speaking of his experiences, says Muhyidin Djunaedi, a Bashir aide. On the itinerary are religious flashpoints such as Sulawesi and Ambon island, where Christian and Muslim groups have clashed in recent years.

Australia, a country that has suffered heavily from JI attacks, expressed concern last week that Bashir's release could "revitalize" JI. "We would have liked to have see him spend more time in jail," said Foreign Minister Alexander Downer. The US and the UN have listed JI as a terrorist organization and both Singapore and Malaysia have banned it. Indonesian officials say there is little they can do as he has served his sentence.

Bashir was sentenced in March last year to two-and-a-half years in jail on charges of conspiracy in JI-linked bomb attacks in Jakarta, but saw his sentence reduced. Bashir continues to deny his guilt and dismiss claims he was involved in terrorism.

Despite the denials, Bashir and his school are likely to be tightly monitored. Syamsir Siregar, Indonesia's intelligence chief, told Parliament on Monday that he "hoped Bashir would come to his senses and work with us."

Indonesian intelligence officials say that JI has evolved since Bashir's imprisonment, led by different men and with a more decentralized structure. Nasir Abbas, a former JI operative now working with police, says that the loose, cell-based structure meant that operatives were often working independently and may not be in touch with one another. He says Bashir played more of an "inspirational" than "operational" role.

"He will help boost the spirit of the faithful," says Habib Rizieq, head of the Islamic Defenders Front (FPI), a hard-line vigilante group known for its violent street rallies. Mr. Rizieq, who founded a school with Bashir, pledged to welcome him upon his release.

Bashir's freedom comes at a time of rising tensions between hard-line and moderate Islam. Leaders from Indonesia's largest Muslim organization, the 40-million strong Nahdlatul Ulama (NU), in June called for the banning of the FPI and of Bashir's official organization, the Indonesian Mujahidin Council.

The NU has long championed a secular over an Islamic state and defended the rights of Christian minorities. In recent months, the NU has opposed the FPI's attempts to support a radical anti-porn bill that would outlaw kissing in public and women exposing their navels. Verbal clashes between the groups escalated after FPI gangs forced former President Abdurrahman Wahid to leave a stage. Parliament and the government agreed last week to change a 1985 freedom of assembly law to allow them to disband groups deemed to be a threat to public order.

Cleric Linked To 2002 Bali Nightclub Bombings Is Released (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, Wednesday, June 14 — A radical Islamic cleric, whom the Bush administration has portrayed as an important operative for Al Qaeda in Southeast Asia, walked out of prison on Wednesday morning, after serving just over a year for criminal conspiracy, his lawyers and Indonesian officials said Tuesday.

American officials, who had long pressed Indonesia to prosecute the cleric, Abu Bakar Bashir, expressed disappointment over the release, as did officials in Australia, which lost 88 citizens in the bombings of two Bali nightclubs that killed 202 people in October 2002.

The release is also sure to raise questions about Indonesia's commitment to combating terrorism, even though the government has prosecuted and imposed harsh sentences, including death, on many of the people involved in the major terrorist attacks here in the last four years. Most of the military leaders of Jemaah Islamiyah, Mr. Bashir's organization, have been arrested or killed.

DOJ_NMG_0033653

A spokesman for the American Embassy in Jakarta said Tuesday that the United States was "deeply disappointed" that Mr. Bashir, 67, had been sentenced to only 30 months in prison after a court found him guilty of a "sinister conspiracy" in connection with the bombings, but acquitted him of seven terrorism charges, in March 2005. The judges said then that Mr. Bashir "knew the perpetrators," and that his words might have encouraged them.

"The possibility that a person responsible for such a terrible crime could go free after a light sentence of 30 months is cause for concern," said the spokesman, Max Kwak.

The actual time served was reduced to just over a year, because he was given credit for previous time served and for good behavior.

Officials in the United States and Australia have contended that Mr. Bashir, the spiritual leader of Jemaah Islamiyah, had a direct role in the bombings of the Bali nightclubs in October 2002, and of the bombing of the Marriott Hotel in Jakarta that killed 12 people in August 2003.

In a 2003 trial he was acquitted of terrorism charges, but convicted on a passport violation. After serving that sentence, he was released, but not for long, as the United States and Australia pressured Indonesia to file the new charges. Legal observers here said the case against Mr. Bashir was weak. The strongest evidence linking him to the Bali terrorist attacks was never heard by the five-judge panel because of a decision by the Bush administration that the Indonesian government would not be allowed to interview two senior Qaeda operatives, Riudan Isamuddin, better known as Hambali, and Omar al-Faruq. The two men are in the hands of the C.I.A. at undisclosed locations.

Hambali, who was one of the few non-Arabs close to Osama bin Laden, told his interrogators that he had been the link between Jemaah Islamiyah and Al Qaeda, according to the report of the 9/11 Commission. Mr. Faruq told the C.I.A. that Mr. Bashir had provided logistical and financial support for several terrorist attacks.

It is not known under what conditions Hambali and Mr. Faruq made these statements, and they were not admissible in the Indonesian court.

Mr. Bashir has steadfastly denied any involvement in terrorist activities, but has been equally firm in his admiration for Mr. bin Laden, and in his loathing of Jews and the United States.

Until Mr. Bashir made common cause with Al Qaeda sometime in the 1990's, the primary goal of Jemaah Islamiyah was the establishment of an Islamic state in Indonesia. Mr. Bashir is expected to return to proselytizing for that cause.

Jemaah Islamiyah has been severely weakened by the Indonesian police and intelligence services, terrorism experts here say. Sidney Jones, an authority on Jemaah Islamiyah and the director of the Jakarta office of the International Crisis Group, an organization that studies violent conflicts, said that releasing Mr. Bashir was not likely to increase the threat of terrorism.

"He's got adoring supporters, no question," she said. "But while he will probably be able to draw thousands of fans to lectures in favor of Islamic law or against the U.S., those crowds should not be seen as all terrorists in the making."

Man Tells Of London Police Raid (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

LONDON, June 13 -- A 23-year-old Muslim man who was shot during a massive police raid on his house earlier this month, then released without charge, said Tuesday that an officer fired at him without warning.

In his first public statements since the raid early this month, Mohammed Abdul Kahar described himself as a law-abiding man who loved London, his birthplace. His emotional words, delivered at a news conference here, added to the embarrassment that the anti-terrorism raid has caused Scotland Yard.

When 250 police officers swarmed Kahar's modest rowhouse in east London on June 2, the postal service employee said, he initially thought burglars had come in. Awakened at 4 a.m. by a commotion downstairs, he said, he took a few steps in a hallway. Then, he said, "I saw an orange spark and a big bang."

He said he saw blood coming down his chest after being hit by a bullet that exited his shoulder. "It seemed like fire," he said. "I was burning."

"I was begging the police, 'Please, I can't breathe,' " Kahar said at the news conference with his brother, Abul Koyair, 20, a supermarket employee. But he said an officer kicked him in the face, telling him in rough language to shut up, before dragging him down the stairs and outside.

Police Commissioner Ian Blair has come under heavy criticism because of this and other missteps since four suicide bombers killed 52 people in London's transit system last July. Shortly after those attacks, the police mistook a 27-year-old Brazilian electrician, Jean Charles de Menezes, for a terrorist on the subway and shot him seven times in the head.

DOJ_NMG_0033654

Prime Minister Tony Blair defended the police commissioner's handling of the raid, at a time of calls for the head officer's resignation. "There is no doubt at all if they received information that there was a possible terrorist attack and did not act on that information and such an attack then took place, you can just imagine the outcry, the justifiable outcry, there would be," the prime minister said.

The raid, which took place in Forest Gate, a neighborhood where many Pakistani and Bangladeshi shopkeepers, cabdrivers and others live alongside other working-class Britons, drew widespread public attention in a country where memories of the bombings last summer remain fresh.

During the raid, many of the officers wore hazardous-materials gear, leading to speculation that they had intelligence that some type of chemical bomb was inside. But no such device was found, and the men were released late Friday.

"This has dented the trust between the community and its security services," said Jamal El-Shayal, a spokesman for the Muslim Association of Britain. "Police are there to protect people, not target them."

On Sunday, several hundred Muslims staged a protest outside Scotland Yard headquarters.

Gareth Peirce, a prominent human rights lawyer representing the brothers, said in an interview that "one suspects it is not the only wrong information that is being acted on" by police. What is different about this case, she said, is that it was so visible. Television cameras and reporters were on the scene for days.

The raid shows the "danger of relying on information considered in secret," Peirce said.

Peirce said that because police took over the house and damaged it during the search, the family had had to leave its home of 20 years.

Asked at the news conference whether they would seek compensation, the brothers said they wanted an apology first.

A senior police officer later offered an apology. "In mounting this operation, we have caused disruption and inconvenience to many residents" in the neighborhood, particularly those in Kahar's house on Lansdowne Road and one next door, Assistant Commissioner Andy Hayman said. "I apologize for the hurt that we may have caused."

Kahar, of Bangladeshi descent, was at times tearful during the news conference. "The only crime I have done in their eyes is being Asian and with a long length of beard."

He said that since the raid, "I can't sleep. . . . I feel fear when the room is dark."

Muslim Shot In London Terror Case Says Police Offered No ID Or Warning (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

LONDON, June 13 — A 23-year-old Muslim man who was shot and wounded during what the police have described as a counterterrorism operation said Tuesday that the officers had not identified themselves and had given no warning before opening fire at close range and beating him.

The account of the raid by the man, Muhammed Abdul Kahar, was the first detailed version of events offered to the public since officers on June 2 burst into the East London row house he shares with his family. Some 250 officers had surrounded the house, and the police operation was presented by the authorities as a major strike against terrorism suspects thought to be building some form of chemical bomb.

Mr. Kahar and his 20-year-old brother, Abul Koyair, were arrested and held for a week. But their release without charge further dented confidence in the police among some British Muslims and prompted fresh calls for the London police commissioner, Sir Ian Blair, to resign.

"I apologize for the hurt we have caused," Andy Hayman, a Metropolitan Police assistant commissioner, said in a statement.

"Given the nature of the threat, I understand that some communities may be feeling confused, or indeed angry, with how the police are trying to ensure all our safety," he said, but insisted, "We had no choice but to mount a robust operation, which required a fast armed response."

In the shooting, Mr. Kahar said at a news conference near his home in Forest Gate, his brother's screams woke him at 4 a.m. and he assumed the house was being robbed. He and his brother descended the stairs and came upon intruders, one of whom opened fire.

"He looked at me straight away and shot me," Mr. Kahar said. "We both had eye contact. He shot me straight away," he said, estimating that the officer fired from two to three feet away. Mr. Kahar said he had looked at his chest and "saw blood coming down my chest and saw the hole in my chest."

"At that moment I knew I was shot," he continued. "But the first thing I was thinking was an armed robbery was taking place."

DOJ_NMG_0033655

"At that moment I still did not know they were the police," Mr. Kahar said. "They never said a word about police. I just thought they were going to kill us."

During the news conference, he denied being a supporter of violence or terrorism, describing himself as a postal van driver and part-time supermarket worker who "just wanted to work to please my family, to support my mum and dad."

His account could add to sentiment among some of Britain's 1.6 million Muslims that, in the words of Massoud Shajareh of the Islamic Human Rights Commission last weekend, "they were shot because they were Muslim or perceived to be Muslim."

"There is a huge amount of fear and anxiety now in the community," Mr. Shajareh said. "People are feeling they are going to be next."

Coming after the fatal shooting of a Brazilian electrician mistaken for a suicide bomber after last July's London bombings, the episode has prompted questions anew about the demarcation between counterterrorism and heavy-handedness.

Last weekend, Damian Hockney, a member of the Metropolitan Police Authority, a police oversight agency, said Sir Ian was "the wrong person" in charge. "We need courageous and strong leadership at the moment, and he might have been the person to provide it some time ago, but not now," Mr. Hockney told BBC radio.

Since then, both Prime Minister Tony Blair and Mayor Ken Livingstone have said they support Sir Ian.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Counterterrorism Agencies Finding Potential Homegrown Extremists In U.S. (SDUT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON – U.S. counterterrorism officials say they are uncovering homegrown Islamic radicals inside the United States who lack formal ties to al-Qaeda and operate independently.

Those independent qualities – combined with the radicals' ability to organize and plot on the Internet – make them particularly difficult to disrupt, retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, director of the National Counterterrorism Center, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Tuesday.

In a hearing on the changing face of terror, Redd said the threat from homegrown extremism is a recent trend that was seen in successful transit attacks in Madrid in 2004 and London in 2005.

One alleged homegrown North American plot has been disrupted: This month, Canadian authorities arrested 17 men and juveniles who are accused of planning attacks in southern Ontario. They are said to have obtained three times the amount of explosives used in the Oklahoma City bombing.

Redd pointed to what he said were three potential homegrown organizations that have been disrupted in the U.S. in just over a year:

Two Atlanta-area men, charged earlier this year in a terrorism case, have been publicly linked to some of the Canadian suspects. Prosecutors have said the two traveled to Washington to shoot “casing videos” of the Capitol and other potential targets. The lawyer for one suspect has insisted it wasn't part of any terrorism plot.

In Torrance, Calif., the head of a radical Islamic prison gang and three others were indicted last year on federal charges of planning terrorist attacks against U.S. military facilities, the Israeli Consulate and other Los Angeles-area targets.

In the farming town of Lodi, Calif., a young Pakistani man faces at least 30 years in prison for supporting terrorism by attending an al-Qaeda training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and lying to the FBI. His father pleaded guilty to trying to smuggle $28,000 in cash to Pakistan.

Showing how the government's mission has changed, Redd said that before 9/11 the FBI wrote 25 intelligence-information reports a year, but now the bureau produces more than 1,000 annually.

Still, Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, the committee's top Democrat, called it “on the verge of criminal” that the government is not fully funding the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission, estimated at $42 billion over five years.

The hearing came less than a week after the U.S. military and intelligence agencies killed one of the world's top terror leaders in an airstrike, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Redd said the merger between al-Zarqawi's group and al-Qaeda's central organization gives terror leaders a more diverse pool of “battle-hardened” operatives from which to draw. Intelligence officials, he said, are also seeing signs that al-Zarqawi's group was hatching plots outside Iraq. But he did not elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0033656

Redd and Henry Crumpton, the State Department's counterterrorism coordinator, agreed that al-Qaeda remains the pre-eminent concern of counterterror agencies. But they are also worried about other threats, including the Shiite extremist group, Hezbollah, which is closely allied with Iran.

Senators were particularly concerned about a fundamentalist Islamic militia that took over the Somali capital of Mogadishu last week.

Crumpton conceded that his department didn't anticipate the events. He said the U.S. government has three objectives in Somalia: to deny al-Qaeda safe haven to organize; to support the weak, transitional government that is backed by the U.N., and to provide humanitarian aid.

Al-Qaeda has existed in Somalia since the early 1990s. At least one key operative behind the 1998 East Africa bombings may be in Mogadishu, as well as a cell behind a 2002 attack in Mombasa, Kenya.

Crumpton said the U.S. has an "imperfect understanding" of the fundamentalist group, the Islamic Courts Union, that seized control of the capital.

It sent a letter proclaiming it was not an enemy of the United States. "Our response has been very clear: We expect them to work with the transitional government, and we also expect them to work with us to hand over al-Qaeda and foreign fighters," Crumpton said.

Al Qaeda Remains Threat, Officials Warn (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

Al Qaeda remains a major threat despite the death last week of the terrorist group's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, U.S. counterterrorism officials told the Senate yesterday.

"Eliminating Zarqawi is clearly a major step forward, but both al Qaeda and [al Qaeda in Iraq] will continue with their deadly work," said retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, director of the National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC).

Adm. Redd also said other Sunni extremist groups inspired by al Qaeda are expanding from regional organizations into a global network that may target U.S. interests.

Adm. Redd, noting that Osama bin Laden has been able to stay alive by hiding in a remote region of the world, said al Qaeda's central leadership has been dealt "very serious blows" that have diminished its operations significantly.

Asked about the effect of stopping bin Laden, Adm. Redd said: "I think if he were to be taken out, we would see a very strong effect in terms of the symbolic effect. ...

"But also it would be significant, I think, in terms of the effect on jihadists worldwide, but it probably would not have a major effect on operations," he told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Henry Crumpton, the State Department's coordinator for counterterrorism, said the death of Zarqawi, who was killed in a U.S. bombing raid in Iraq on June 7, does not lessen the threat of al Qaeda in Iraq and regionally.

Asked by Committee Chairman Sen. Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, about a recent terrorist attempt to bomb Saudi Arabian oil fields, Mr. Crumpton said terrorists are trying to attack such economic targets to "disrupt the oil supplies."

There is still "a long way to go" before oil fields in Saudi Arabia, West Africa and other parts of the world are secure from terrorist attacks, Mr. Crumpton said.

On whether Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence is continuing to support the ousted Islamist Taliban regime and al Qaeda in Afghanistan, he said that there are indications that some provincial governments in Pakistan are providing backing, but that there is no "hard intelligence" linking Islamabad to such efforts.

"I am not confirming that ISI is clean," he said. "I am saying that we don't have any compelling evidence right now that points to this."

Mr. Crumpton said there also is concern about Islamists taking control of some parts of Mogadishu, Somalia, a country largely without a central government.

Adm. Redd said the recent arrests in Canada of 17 persons suspected of plotting a major terrorist attack highlight the "home-grown" terrorist problem.

Additionally, the Iranian-backed terrorist group Hezbollah remains a potent threat, he said. Direct Iranian terrorism, he noted, also is a major concern.

Adm. Redd said he is "guardedly optimistic" about the long-term outlook of battling Islamic extremists.

"I believe it's no accident that we have not been attacked since 9/11 here at home," he said, noting, "We certainly cannot assume that we won't be attacked again."

DOJ_NMG_0033657

Appeals Court Hears Arguments On Proposed Biodefense Lab (AP)

By Scott Lindlaw, The Associated Press

AP, June 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal appeals court judge said Tuesday she found it "troublesome" that the Bush administration wants to open a lab for testing lethal agents including HIV, plague and anthrax in the densely populated San Francisco Bay Area.

But a U.S. Department of Justice lawyer told the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the administration had thoroughly researched its plans for a biodefense lab at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and concluded there was little risk of a disaster.

If pathogens were to seep from the proposed lab and reach the public, they would have dispersed into such low concentrations they would be unlikely to injure anyone, Justice Department attorney Todd Aagaard said.

A lawyer for the lab's opponents sharply disagreed, saying even a small release could kill thousands.

The government also failed to consider the possibility that a plane or truck could be deliberately crashed into the site 50 miles east of San Francisco, said Stephan Volker, the lab opponents' lead attorney.

Instead, the administration used "a one-size-fits-all scenario, borrowed from another agency" when it studied the possible risks, he told the judges.

According to Volker, that scenario involved a lab worker failing to properly screw on the top of a centrifuge containing the biological agent Q fever. And it hypothesized that all the Q fever would twice pass through high-technology filters what Volker called "the killer" assumption, because those so-called HEPA filters are highly prone to failure. In a fire they could become disabled by sprinklers, Volker said.

The Bush adminstration has been preparing the biodefense lab for years, and said this week it plans to open the facility by August. But local residents have been fighting it in the courts. A lower federal court said in September 2004 that it could proceed, and the opponents appealed. The appeals court did not rule on Tuesday.

Volker said his clients want a new, thorough environmental assessment report that would supplant the one the Department of Energy conducted in 2002, or an even broader environmental impact review.

The Bush administration says the facility to be jointly used by the Departments of Energy and Homeland Security is vital to national security.

The facility "will significantly improve the nation's ability to detect and respond to the threat of terrorism using biological agents," the Department of Energy said in its court brief. A court order blocking it "would directly and adversely impact the national security," the administration said.

The facility would test airborne agents, which could also include hantavirus, influenza, hepatitis, Q fever, brucellis, herpes and salmonella, among others, on live animals.

The opponents have several concerns about the project, and they want to see the government reconsider it.

It sits in a region under which several faults lurk, and the lawsuit warns an earthquake could trigger the release of potentially deadly agents in the densely populated East Bay region near San Francisco. Some 7 million people live in the broader bay area.

The Energy Department says that in 2002 it "thoroughly evaluated" the potential impacts of an earthquake, accident or attack on the site, and it found those fears were unwarranted.

"The department's analysis concluded that such a release was highly unlikely and that, if a release occurred, it would not pose a danger to the public," the agency said in its court filing.

Because of its own findings, the department concluded a more sweeping environmental impact review was not required under the National Environmental Policy Act.

Chief Judge Mary Schroeder questioned the wisdom of locating the facility in the Bay Area, a region where some 7 million people live.

"I don't see in the analysis any discussion anywhere of what is the most troublesome thing," she told Aagaard. "this is being built in a very highly populated area of northern California." New Mexico, where a similar facility was contemplated, has a much lower population, she said.

Aagaard replied that the population-density question was taken into account in the government's "catastrophic release scenario." The most dangerous pathogens are not "durable" or "dangerous," and thus are unlikely to hurt people, he said.

U.S. To Review Proposals To Shield Commercial Planes From Missiles (WSJ)

By Ann Keeton

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033658

The Department of Homeland Security this month will review proposals from defense contractors for protecting commercial aircraft from shoulder-fired missiles.

Officials have asked for proposals for both ground-based and aircraft-based defense systems. Two of the biggest defense contractors, Raytheon Co. and Northrop Grumman Corp., are competing for possible contract awards and are testing several new antimissile systems.

The Department of Homeland Security, which reviews potential candidates for contracts during three stages of development, notified Raytheon June 5 that it would evaluate later this month a full proposal to fund development of a ground-based system.

A study by Rand Corp., a U.S. think tank, has said an attack from a shoulder-fired missile represents a real threat to aircraft in the U.S., and there have been such terrorist attempts elsewhere. After a failed shoulder-fired missile attack on an Israeli charter aircraft flying over Kenya in 2002, Israel put antimissile devices on all its commercial aircraft, using military technology.

Rand estimated that the initial cost for putting laser jammers on 6,800 commercial planes in the U.S. would be about $11 billion, ballooning to $40 billion over a 10-year period. Rand concluded that a program made economic sense, estimating a single incident of a terrorist downing a commercial airplane could cause $15 billion in damage to the U.S. economy.

Raytheon and Northrop say the cost of any of the programs would be substantially less than the projections in the Rand study, which used a military-based budget furnished more than two years ago by Northrop Grumman.

Mark Slivinski, marketing head for the Vigilant Eagle program at Raytheon, said the Waltham, Mass., company's ground-based system could be installed at 35 major U.S. airports for $25 million at each facility.

The three-part system includes stationary infrared cameras on the ground that can detect a shoulder-fired missile almost instantly. The cameras would be arranged so that a missile sighting could be verified separately by two cameras. That would substantially cut false alarms to about one a year at each facility. One of the biggest problems with missile detection is that birds or debris are regularly targeted.

To deter the missile, the system would send a narrowly focused radio wave. That wave, while harmless to people, would confuse the missile-guidance system, pulling it off course. The Raytheon system also would connect to a computer on the ground that would reveal the terrorist's location.

Northrop Grumman, of Los Angeles, has taken another path, developing the Guardian system with a pod that fits on the belly of a commercial aircraft. Northrop is using its Nemesis infrared detection system, already in use on hundreds of military aircraft. A commercial version is being tested this year. It would cost $1 million per aircraft, or $5.2 billion over 20 years, according to Jack Pledger, director of business development for infrared-countermeasures programs.

At the same time, another division at Northrop is developing a ground-based system using laser technology that could destroy a shoulder-fired missile.

Worse Than Nothing (NYT)

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

The fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks is drawing near, and Congress still has not passed a law to improve chemical plant safety. The Senate is scheduled to hold important negotiations today on a chemical plant bill, but the bill could actually make the country less safe. If senators are afraid to stand up to the chemical industry and pass a good bill, they should at least have the courage to do nothing.

A terrorist attack on a single chemical plant in a densely populated area could kill tens — or even hundreds — of thousands of Americans. Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, have drawn up a security bill that, in its current form, is barely better than nothing. It needs tough language added requiring chemical plants to replace dangerous chemicals with safer alternatives. The chemical industry is resisting.

An even bigger disgrace is that the industry is pushing hard to get "pre-emption" language added to the bill. That would prevent states from imposing their own tougher rules. New Jersey has begun to do so, and now that Jon Corzine, a strong proponent of chemical plant safety, is governor, it could adopt even stricter rules. A pre-emption provision could wipe away New Jersey's laws, and prevent other states from protecting themselves.

George Voinovich, Republican of Ohio, is taking the lead on pushing pre-emption. It is important that Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, and Mark Pryor, Democrat of Arkansas, who could be the swing votes, resist along with Senator Collins, the committee chairwoman. If the final bill pre-empts state laws, it should be killed or at least be renamed, to make clear what it is: a chemical plant antisecurity bill.

FEMA Lost $1B To Fraud, Errors (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0033659

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sloppy mistakes and con artists cost FEMA at least $1 billion in questionable disaster-relief claims in the six months after last year's devastating Gulf Coast hurricanes, according to a report by government investigators due out today.

The government sent checks to thousands of people who registered with FEMA using information belonging to prison inmates or who provided only a post office box as the address of their damaged home, according to the Government Accountability Office, the watchdog agency of Congress.

The investigation found that the Federal Emergency Management Agency, harshly criticized for its poor response to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, lacked basic mechanisms to discourage rampant fraud. FEMA, the accountability office said, needs to immediately put "adequate safeguards" in place to "build the American taxpayers' confidence that federal disaster assistance only goes to those in need."

Among the many examples of waste and fraud cited in the report:

•Roughly $5.3 million was paid to people who gave only post office boxes as their address. In one case, FEMA sent $2,358 to someone who claimed a damaged house in a New Orleans cemetery; in another, FEMA sent $4,358 to someone who listed his residence as a UPS store.

•Millions more was sent to more than 1,000 people who used names and Social Security numbers of inmates in prisons along the Gulf Coast and across the country. In one case, FEMA sent $4,358 to a Mississippi prisoner who gave officials his correct mailing address — at the prison where he'd been locked up since 2004.

•FEMA reimbursed people for rent at the same time it was paying for them to stay in a hotel. For example, the agency paid $8,000 for someone to stay in a California hotel for five months and also sent that person $6,700 in rental assistance for the same period.

•One person received 26 FEMA payments totaling $139,000 using 13 different Social Security numbers and 13 addresses, eight of which did not exist.

FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said the agency has already made some reforms to cut down on fraud this hurricane season.

"FEMA's highest priority during a disaster is to get help quickly to those in desperate need," Walker said. But "even as we put victims first, we take very seriously our responsibility to be outstanding stewards of taxpayer dollars."

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, called the fraud and abuse "symptoms of a much larger illness" at FEMA, which also has been criticized for spending hundreds of millions of dollars on trailers that were never used and other waste.

"Fraud, no matter the amount, is unacceptable," Thompson said. But "the disease is an administration that shortchanged FEMA and shortchanged catastrophic planning" for years.

Fraudulent Katrina And Rita Claims Top $1 Billion (WP)

By Larry Margasak

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

The government doled out as much as $1.4 billion in bogus assistance to victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and was hoodwinked to pay for season football tickets, a tropical vacation and even a divorce lawyer, congressional investigators have found.

Prison inmates, a supposed victim who used a New Orleans cemetery for a home address, and a person who spent 70 days at a Hawaiian hotel were able to wrongly get taxpayer help, according to the Government Accountability Office.

Agents from the investigative arm of Congress went undercover to expose the ease of receiving disaster expense checks from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The GAO concluded that as much as 16 percent of the billions of dollars in FEMA aid to individuals after the two hurricanes was unwarranted.

The findings are detailed in testimony that is scheduled to be delivered at a hearing today by the House Homeland Security subcommittee on investigations.

To dramatize the problem, the GAO provided lawmakers with a copy of a $2,358 U.S. Treasury check for rental assistance that an undercover agent got using a bogus address. The money was paid even after FEMA learned from its inspector that the undercover applicant did not live at the address.

DOJ_NMG_0033660

"This is an assault on the American taxpayer," said Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Tex.), chairman of the subcommittee that will conduct the hearing. "Prosecutors from the federal level down should be looking at prosecuting these crimes and putting the criminals who committed them in jail for a long time."

FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said yesterday that the agency, already criticized for its poor response to Katrina, makes its highest priority during a disaster "to get help quickly to those in desperate need of our assistance."

"Even as we put victims first, we take very seriously our responsibility to be outstanding stewards of taxpayer dollars, and we are careful to make sure that funds are distributed appropriately," he said.

FEMA said it has identified more than 1,500 cases of potential fraud since Katrina and Rita, and has referred those cases to the Homeland Security inspector general. The agency said it has identified $16.8 million in improperly awarded disaster relief money and has started efforts to collect the money.

The GAO said it was 95 percent confident that improper and potentially fraudulent payments were much higher: between $600 million and $1.4 billion.

The investigative agency said it found people lodged in hotels often were paid twice, because FEMA gave them individual rental assistance and paid hotels directly. FEMA paid California hotels $8,000 to house one individual -- the same person who received three rental assistance payments for both disasters.

FEMA paid another individual $2,358 in rental assistance, while at the same time paying about $8,000 for the same person to stay 70 nights at more than $100 per night in a Hawaii hotel.

FEMA also could not establish that 750 debit cards worth $1.5 million even went to Katrina victims, the auditors said.

Among the items purchased with the cards were five season tickets to New Orleans Saints professional football games and a divorce lawyer's services in Houston.

"Our forensic audit and investigative work showed that improper and potentially fraudulent payments occurred mainly because FEMA did not validate the identity of the registrant, the physical location of the damaged address, and ownership and occupancy of all registrants at the time of registration," GAO officials said.

FEMA paid millions of dollars to more than 1,000 registrants who used names and Social Security numbers belonging to state and federal prisoners for expedited housing assistance. The inmates were in Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia and Florida.

To demonstrate how easy it was to fool FEMA, the GAO told of an individual who used 13 different Social Security numbers, including the person's own, to receive $139,000 in payments on 13 separate registrations for aid. The payments were sent to one address.

Study Finds Huge Fraud In The Wake Of Hurricanes (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — As much as $1.4 billion in government disaster aid to victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita — nearly a quarter of the total — went to bogus or undeserving victims, a new Congressional investigation concludes.

It is a scale of abuse that Representative Michael McCaul, Republican of Texas and chairman of the House subcommittee leading the inquiry, said far exceeded even his worst fears, despite months of accumulating evidence that the fraud-prevention system at the Federal Emergency Management Agency was woefully inadequate.

"It is shocking and appalling," Mr. McCaul, a former federal prosecutor, said.

The improper or fraudulent payments went to a dizzying array of con artists or other undeserving recipients, according to the analysis by the Government Accountability Office, which is set to announce its findings at a hearing Wednesday.

In one case, a man stayed more than two months on the government tab at a hotel in Hawaii that cost more than $100 a night. At the same time, he was getting $2,358 in government rent assistance, even though he had not been living in the property he claimed was damaged in the storm.

Emergency aid was used to pay for football tickets, the bill at a Hooters in San Antonio, a $200 bottle of Dom Perignon, "Girls Gone Wild" videos, even an all-inclusive weeklong Caribbean vacation, the report says. More than $5 million went to people who had provided cemeteries or post office boxes as the addresses of their damaged property.

FEMA also provided cash or housing assistance to more than 1,000 prison inmates, totaling millions of dollars; one inmate used a post office box to collect $20,000. Some of the inmates may in fact have owned property that was damaged, but most should not have been eligible for the aid.

In another case, 24 payments, totaling $109,708, were sent to a single apartment, where eight people each submitted requests for aid eight times, each time using their own Social Security numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0033661

Another person collected 26 payments using 13 different Social Security numbers — a total of $139,000 — even though public records show the individual did not live at any of the addresses reported as damaged.

Aaron T. Walker, a FEMA spokesman, said the agency was moving to correct management weaknesses that might have contributed to the fraud, including establishing a system that will block multiple registrations for aid filed under a single Social Security number.

Separately, the agency has identified 1,500 cases of possible fraud, referring them for possible prosecution. It has collected $16.8 million after asking people to return money if they got more than they deserved.

Mr. Walker said the need to distribute aid rapidly after the storms made it impossible to check out claims initially. "FEMA's highest priority during a disaster is to get help quickly to those in desperate need of our assistance," he said.

The findings, which are to be released Wednesday in testimony by Gregory D. Kutz of the Government Accountability Office, follow up testimony that Mr. Kutz gave before a Senate committee in February. At the time, he refrained from giving an estimate of the total of the fraud, other than to say that perhaps millions of dollars was at stake.

The more precise estimate comes after a detailed examination of a random sample of 250 of the 2.6 million payments made as of February, which total over $6 billion. Investigators visited properties claimed as damaged and checked to see if the applicants had submitted multiple claims, or invalid or false Social Security numbers.

The investigators also tested the system by creating their own fake applicants, who collected a total of $6,000 in disaster assistance. (The checks were never cashed.)

Investigators concluded that fraudulent or improper payments probably ranged from $400 million to $1.4 billion, leading them to settle on $1 billion as their most likely estimate, representing about 16 percent of the distributed aid.

Families were eligible up to a total of $26,200 in aid, including $2,000 that came as emergency cash assistance right after the hurricanes passed as well as about $790 a month to rent temporary housing. They could also get free hotel rooms, although they were not supposed to stay in a hotel while getting rental assistance, as the auditors found many did.

Mr. McCaul said he was prepared to recommend legislation to mandate tougher accounting practices if the agency did not prove it had taken steps to prevent further abuses.

"When you have federal and state prisoners applying for the taxpayers' money — while they are in prison — and then the disaster aid, that is a real assault on the American taxpayer," he said. "I don't have any tolerance for that."

Lives Suspended On Gulf Coast, Crammed Into 240 Square Feet (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

LAKESHORE, Miss., June 12 — If you were to fly over rural Hancock County here, you would see more than 9,000 of them, white rectangles clumped in sun-bleached parks and scattered in piney woods like pieces of a trashed picket fence. Pick any one, and contained within that FEMA trailer are lives in claustrophobic suspension.

Paulette Shiyou invites you into her family's trailer with a natural hospitality that has remained intact. Her husband, Hugh, offers a can of beer, and her son, Cody, itching to show you his card collection, his rock collection, his pocketknife, kicks off his sneakers.

And suddenly, in this tight trailer of 240 square feet, an 11-year-old boy's shoes loom like ottomans.

"I'm constantly yelling at him because you're always tripping over him," Ms. Shiyou says, scolding but smiling. "And he yells at me to turn the lights out."

Cody defends himself by nodding toward the droning television set that sits near the only door, about five feet from his cubbyhole bunk bed. "I'll be going to bed," he says, "and she'll be watching TV and have all these lights on."

As the television set gabs and a boy complains and a mother justifies her liberal use of lights by saying she just cannot tolerate darkness, not since the storm, it seems that in a FEMA trailer even words take up space.

FEMA trailer. The phrase has nearly lost meaning, so embedded is it in the national memory of last year's crushing hurricanes, Katrina and Rita. The Federal Emergency Management Agency provided trailers to people whose homes were damaged or destroyed; got it.

But tens of thousands of people continue to live crammed in FEMA trailers, greeting this year's hurricane season the same way they said goodbye to the last one: in light-metal boxes that even a tropical storm could flip like playing cards and which seem so vulnerable alongside the brush fires crackling through some stretches of the Gulf Coast.

Ms. Shiyou hurries through her family's FEMA trailer back story, which is extraordinary, but here, mundane: Returning to a home that was miles from shore but destroyed, then moving like nomads, from a gymnasium to a warehouse to a tent to a FEMA trailer encampment for five months. Then, finally, back to their property, into this FEMA trailer on their former front lawn, where they have lived since March.

DOJ_NMG_0033662

She takes you on a tour.

To keep from tracking mud into the trailer, the Shiyous have placed a recovered piece of their old deck on the ground. "This was the color of my house," Ms. Shiyou says, walking on it. "A country blue."

She takes one step into the trailer, and the initial urge is to hunch. Mr. Shiyou, a gangly 6-foot-2, stretches out his arms to demonstrate how he can simultaneously touch the ceiling with one hand and the floor with the other.

His wife slides open a door to her immediate right, revealing a room taken up almost entirely by the master bed. "You just crawl in from the foot and pull the blankets up as you go," she says.

The hangers in the small closet have to be tilted sideways to fit, and the space-eating fan is necessary because you lose the air-conditioning if you slide the door shut for privacy. Mr. Shiyou says he sleeps less than five hours a night because that is all he can take of this confinement.

Moving left, the kitchen, with the bread and cookies stored in the microwave, paper plates and plastic cups from Wal-Mart in the cabinet and a couple of Reed & Barton silver coffeepots the family found in the woods after the waters receded.

"I'm going to put them in my china closet when I get one," Ms. Shiyou says, talking over the television set, which is blaring MTV beside her. "He usually always watches cartoons," she says of Cody. "And it drives me crazy."

Take one step off the small stretch of tan linoleum, which she keeps clean with the mop at the door, and onto the patch of worn dun-colored carpet, which she keeps clean with the carpet sweeper beside the mop, and you are now in the dining room, living room, and practically into Cody's bed.

A small, hard couch. A small booth with a small table, under which are stored a blue suitcase, Cody's book bag, Cody's suddenly massive sneakers and shoes and his father's even larger shoes. Cody's bed, where he stashes Doritos, and the bed above, used for storing blankets and winter clothes.

Finally, the bathroom, whose door, when opened, blocks Cody's bed. You have to lean over the toilet to see yourself in the mirror. Mr. Shiyou practically kneels to fit into the shower.

This, then, is the home where the Shiyous had family over for an Easter barbecue.

"There was Vanessa and Joe, Jessica, Tim, Raegan and Kiley," Ms. Shiyou says. "And then Heather and Jasper, and then my niece Mindy her boyfriend, Josh, and their two kids, John and Jared. And wasn't David and Regina here? Yes, they were."

Mr. Shiyou, 43, is a welder, and Ms. Shiyou, 40, runs a check-cashing store. When they look out from their FEMA trailer, they see two other FEMA trailers, occupied by two of her daughters and their families. They can also see the raised dirt foundation where they plan to build a home at a higher level, even though the land is well beyond the flood zone.

Insurance paid off the note on their old home, and nothing more. They have secured another loan, but have yet to hear whether they will receive any federal grant to ease their financial burden. Either way, they plan to start building next month, and with luck will be out of the trailer by Christmas.

Dusk has descended; a full moon is rising over the gulf. Mr. Shiyou returns to working on the all-but-destroyed house of a beloved 89-year-old neighbor. Ms. Shiyou, meanwhile, recreates in her mind the home they shared for 10 years and lost nine months ago.

The Kia Sephia and the Dodge pickup in the driveway. The curio cabinet, with all those angels collected by her late mother. The framed family photographs. The children's encyclopedias. Her set of dishes, whose pattern was, was —

"God, what color was my kitchen set?" Ms. Shiyou asks, her voice breaking. She says it will come to her, but it doesn't.

How Fla. Spells Relief: A-l-b-e-r-t-o (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, June 14, 2006

OCALA, Fla. — The first tropical storm of the hurricane season landed Tuesday with a whimper, but it ratcheted up tension for residents after two years of record storms.

The Ocala Star-Banner captured the weariness with its headline: “Here we go again.”

Tropical Storm Alberto is expected to diminish to a tropical depression as it moves into Georgia and then into South Carolina today. Bands of rain that reached hundreds of miles drenched some parts of Florida with as much as 8 inches.

Some low-lying coastal areas and city streets flooded, but the rain was a welcome soaking for Florida's parched pastures, farms and groves in the center of the state.

While damage from Alberto appeared minor, residents remain wary. Florida weathered five major hurricanes in 19 months, and forecasters predict another active season this year.

DOJ_NMG_0033663

Alberto caught Megan Tearle a little off guard.

Tearle, 27, a mortgage broker who grew up in Miami and now lives in Ocala, picked up batteries and water the night before Alberto arrived.

"It was so soon, the first week of hurricane season," Tearle said Tuesday. "I thought, 'Oh, it's a tropical storm.' For a tropical storm, I don't panic."

Residents in central Florida sometimes have a false sense of security, figuring a hurricane will lose strength as it crosses the state, she said. But Tearle said Tropical Storm Alberto's unexpected arrival has her thinking about the rest of the season, which began June 1.

When she was a child in Miami, Hurricane Andrew blew out the windows and ripped the roof off of her family's home in 1992. Two summers ago, Hurricane Frances flooded her Ocala home.

"I'm a little apprehensive, truthfully," she said. "Doesn't it seem like there's more and more? Don't they seem worse?"

At Romero's produce stand here, huge watermelons and ripe tomatoes were displayed on wooden stands beneath a tarp despite hovering black clouds and gusts that could blow off a hat.

Reina Rodriguez, 18, who was running the register at the stand owned by her aunt, said they didn't expect the storm would get bad enough to justify closing for the day.

"I've experienced this before, so we know how to handle it now," she said.

"This one, we didn't do much. But there's more coming up. This is the first of the season, but you never know what's going to happen next."

Norman Tank, 61, of Dunnellon, shopped for tomatoes at the stand as the storm rolled in. He said he was prepared for the worst, although he didn't expect much more than a few squalls from Alberto.

"We're lucky this time," said Tank, who has lived in Florida for 32 years. "It'll be a nice rain, a good soaker."

He said Alberto's lackluster showing won't make him complacent. "I say, 'Be prepared.' It's kind of crazy not to have water for flushing your toilets and drinking," Tank said. "If I were told to evacuate, believe me, I will."

Marie Richards, 49, of Ocala, is spending her first hurricane season in Florida after moving from New Jersey. She said she figured being inland would keep her safe.

"Yeah, right, it turns out," she said. "I'm not looking forward to the rest of the season."

Richards and her husband stocked up on batteries, water and canned goods. They moved the patio furniture indoors. And then, the storm amounted to nothing — not that she's complaining. The weather looked good enough Tuesday morning that she went to work at a downtown furniture store.

"I was tense. I was expecting lots of rain and strong winds," she said. "If they're all like this, I'm fine."

However, she figures it's just a matter of time before a bigger storm hits. "I'm terrified," she said. "If they say get out, I'll get out."

More than 20,000 people were ordered to evacuate before Alberto made landfall, but it was unclear how many actually left their homes.

Alberto's winds weakened to 40 mph as its center came ashore around noon near Adams Beach, about 50 miles southeast of Tallahassee. The National Weather Service said total rainfall could reach 8-10 inches in central Florida and southeastern Georgia over the next few days.

Earlier Tuesday, Alberto had winds of 65 mph, well below the 74 mph needed to become a hurricane.

If it had become a hurricane, as forecasters warned, it would have been an early start on the hurricane season. It's been 40 years since a hurricane struck the USA this early.

Storm surges of 4 to 5 feet were reported in Citrus, Levy, Taylor and Dixie counties, according to the weather service.

Cedar Key in Levy County reported flooding to its main road that goes in and out of the island of 940 residents. County residents in low-lying areas had been urged to evacuate.

Tropical Storm Weakens Before Hitting Florida (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

MIAMI, June 13 — Tropical Storm Alberto weakened Tuesday before hitting the Florida Gulf Coast with heavy rain and high winds, but it did not pose the threat that forecasters had initially feared.

The storm made landfall early Tuesday afternoon near Adams Beach, about 50 miles southeast of Tallahassee, with winds of 50 miles per hour, well below the 70 m.p.h. winds it carried Monday that caused forecasters to fear that it would strengthen into a hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0033664

"It lost its chance to become a hurricane because it ran out of time," said Jack Beven at the National Hurricane Center.

A tropical storm warning was in effect for the Atlantic Coast from South Santee River in South Carolina southward to north of Altamaha Sound in Georgia. The storm was expected to continue moving inland and weaken further, reaching the Atlantic Ocean near the North Carolina-Virginia border as a tropical depression on Thursday.

The storm brought down tree limbs and caused flooding along parts of the coast, but no serious injuries were reported.

More than six inches of rain fell during the storm in some areas, and more than 11,000 households and businesses were without power, and more than 4,000 were without phone service Tuesday afternoon, state officials said. "I think we are on top of this, and this is a good lesson, I think, in preparedness," Gov. Jeb Bush said in Tallahassee. "I can assure you that if a stronger storm comes our way, we have a great team locally and at the state level."

In Sunset Beach, just north of St. Pete Beach, Rob Porter and his daughters, Priscilla, 9, and Mattie, 11, surfed and body boarded in the large waves just after the storm made landfall.

"This is everything we love," Mr. Porter said. "On the Gulf Coast we hardly ever get days for this."

Alberto Turns Out To Be Splash In The Panhandle (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

HORSESHOE BEACH, To live in the path of a forecast hurricane these days is to be bombarded by dire Katrina-inspired exhortations, and as Tropical Storm Alberto moved toward this small, low-lying town of shrimpers and crabbers, there was the usual ominous noise.

The National Hurricane Center issued a hurricane warning, which echoed ceaselessly from televisions. Gov. Jeb Bush urged caution, the county ordered an evacuation and emergency management leaders convened a City Hall meeting to encourage people to leave.

And after all the scary buildup, many and maybe most of the people here said: Nah, we're staying.

The center of Alberto made landfall in the Big Bend area about noon on Tuesday, bearing winds of about 50 mph. The rain came in lashes, and gusts swayed the Spanish moss that drapes the cypress trees. A few power lines were toppled. Water surging in from the Gulf of Mexico made several streets impassable.

But the storm, which never reached hurricane strength, proved to be no more than a mild inconvenience for most people in its way, and the holdouts savored their instincts for survival.

"Well, I got faith in God, and I looked to God to see me through," said Marjorie Neeley, 79. She spoke from her front porch as the floodwaters, which had reached some nearby yards but never hers, began to recede.

She had rejected not only the official evacuation pleas, but those of her daughter, Sandra Mills, 47; great-grandson Justin, 8; and a Dixie County emergency official who turned up on her porch as the water was rising Tuesday morning

"Grandma said she wasn't going nowhere," Justin said.

"I tried to get her to leave, but she said no, so we just rode it out together," Mills said. But before they did, "I told her to think about my life and Justin's life."

Scott Garner, chief of emergency management for the county, estimated that only 30 percent of residents in Dixie's coastal communities, which include Horseshoe Beach, complied with the evacuation order. About 50 people went to shelters.

"All we can do is get the word out there and let them make their own decisions," he said.

Despite the scientific authority of the forecasters and the sway of state and local leaders who have made hurricane preparation a priority, many in this enclave, as well as elsewhere along the nation's hurricane-threatened coasts, prefer to make the evacuation decision based on personal storm experience and meteorological insight.

"I don't think I could be considered a foolish person or one to take chances," said Daphine Spivey, 66, a native of the area who stayed home with her husband, a building official. "If it had been a bad one, we would have left."

She said the predicted storm surge of eight to 10 feet was less than what her house withstood in the "No Name" storm of 1993. So the couple thought they could ride out Alberto, too, and they did.

"I think you have to use common sense," she said, noting that her grandfather used to get a sense of storms by observing cows, pigs and other animals.

"I guess the Lord gives them the sense to know," she said.

Michael Webster, 35, his wife and two kids didn't evacuate for Alberto, either.

Webster said he has new respect for hurricanes, having worked a front-end loader during Katrina cleanup in Bay St. Louis, Miss. But he said he would leave Horseshoe Beach only if the storm winds exceeded 100 mph.

"This is nothing," he said after lunch with his family at a restaurant.

DOJ_NMG_0033665

Outside, college students were checking a wind gauge built atop a 30-foot orange crane they had deployed. One of them said the strongest sustained winds measured were 30 mph.

Experts, nevertheless, say that defying evacuation orders and hurricane warnings is risky.

"When people try to gauge their actions on what happened in the past, disastrous things can happen," said Eric Blake, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center.

The trouble is that most people's storm experience is limited, he said.

"There hasn't been a major hurricane there in most people's lifetimes," Blake said, referring to the Big Bend area. "There are always uncertainties in the forecast. People are taking a chance with their lives, and we'd like to discourage that."

But Billy Rollison, 74, a Navy veteran who was out watching the tides as the storm passed Tuesday, questioned whether people who don't know the area can judge.

"They sit up there with their computers and checking the winds and all that," he said of the county's emergency managers as he watched Gulf waters cover part of the road. "Ain't none of them have been down here for a storm."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Tells Iraq Leader U.S. Will Back Him (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, June 14, 2006

President Bush told Iraq's new leader in a surprise face-to-face visit on Tuesday that the fate of his war-scarred country was in Iraq's own hands. Bush was pressed in turn not to withdraw U.S. troops too quickly.

"There's a worry almost to a person that we will leave before they are capable of defending themselves," Bush said as he flew back to the United States after his lightning, long-distance trip to meet with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Bush spent over 5 1/2 hours in Baghdad in his second visit of the three-year war, both kept secret until he had safely arrived. He met with American troops at Thanksgiving 2003 in a visit confined to the airport and limited to several hours.

This time, he traveled to the city's heavily fortified Green Zone.

In a mission designed to both showcase U.S. support for the new unity government and to ease war concerns at home, the president told the Iraqi prime minister the United States would stand by the new government as it works to achieve stability.

"When America gives its word, it keeps its word," Bush said.

At the same time, he emphasized that Iraq must control its own destiny.

"The decisions you and your cabinet make will be determinate as to whether or not a country succeeds that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself," he told al-Maliki.

Bush slipped away from what had been billed as a two-day meeting at Camp David, Md., for the 11-hour overnight flight that brought him to his first direct talks with al-Maliki and members of the new government.

His visit was accompanied by incredibly tight security. Leaving Baghdad, lights were turned off both on the helicopters that took Bush and his entourage to the airport and on Air Force One itself.

Only a handful of close aides knew about the trip in advance.

Later, speaking with reporters on the flight home, Bush said he assured the Iraqi leaders "they didn't need to worry" about U.S. troops withdrawing too soon and too quickly.

"They are counting on us to continue to take the lead until such time as they are ready to take the lead," Bush said.

Bush said that top U.S. military and policy officials would sit down with Iraqi officials in the days ahead "and devise a way forward." The president also said he would step up pressure on other world leaders to do more to help Iraq.

"I am going to call these leaders again and remind them that a stable and secure Iraq is part of a stable and secure Middle East," Bush said.

Bush's trip comes at a time when many Democrats — and some in his own party — are calling for a substantial number of American troops to be brought home by the end of this year.

War anxiety has been the driving force behind Bush's plunge in the polls and a cause of Republican distress about holding control of Congress in the November mid-tem elections.

Al-Maliki himself did not know the president was in Baghdad until five minutes before they met in the blue-domed palace once used by Saddam Hussein but which now houses part of the U.S. Embassy in the heavily fortified Green Zone.

The Iraqi prime minister had come to the embassy expecting to participate in a satellite video conference with Bush and aides from the presidential mountain retreat in Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0033666

Instead, Bush sat beside him. The video conference went on as scheduled with the U.S. officials still at Camp David.

"I've come to not only look you in the eye. I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it keeps its word — that it's in our interest that Iraq succeed," Bush told al-Maliki.

Bush didn't say whether he and the prime minister had discussed the timing or scope of a possible U.S. military withdrawal. There are now about 130,000 U.S. troops in the country and Bush faces increasing pressure at home to begin bringing many of them home.

Al-Maliki, speaking in Arabic, thanked Bush for U.S. protection, but expressed a general hope for the day when American troops would be gone.

"God willing, all of the suffering will be over, and all of the soldiers will be able to return to their countries with our gratitude for what they have offered," al-Maliki said.

Before leaving Baghdad, Bush addressed a group of about 300 cheering U.S. troops assigned in supporting roles to the U.S. Embassy. He thanked them for their work and said a top U.S. priority was now to support the new government.

"Our job is to help them succeed and we will," Bush said.

Several U.S. lawmakers briefed on Bush's trip predicted that a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops might be accelerated following the presidential visit.

This time, Bush flew by helicopter from Baghdad International Airport to and from the Green Zone, where Iraq's government meets and the U.S. and British embassies are based.

Bush also met with other Iraqi leaders before leaving the country.

Later, speaking with reporters for about 35 minutes on Air Force One, Bush said one of the Iraqi cabinet ministers asked him about the U.S. military's conduct in terms of human rights of Iraqis.

"I assured her any complaints she had, the ambassador is more than willing to listen and there will be full investigations." He said he reminded the Iraqi officials that mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners by Americans at Abu Ghraib prison "is a sorry chapter in the Iraqi experience."

The U.S. troops cheered loudly and raised cameras high as Bush visited them.

"Thought I'd stop by to say hello," Bush said, to laughter. "I bring greetings from a grateful nation. And I thank you for your sacrifice."

Bush's visit came as his administration attempted to regain the initiative after months of increasingly deadly violence in Iraq and flagging support for the war among Americans.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld gave a classified briefing on Bush's trip to selected senators.

Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record) of Michigan, senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, told reporters afterward that Bush's trip "is likely to lead to phased redeployments this year and continuing in the next year."

Rumsfeld said that many U.S. troops have already been brought home. He said officials would meet with Iraqi leaders "in the weeks ahead discussing at what pace we're going to be able to draw down our forces and it will all be done in a very orderly way."

Bush's visit came six days after a U.S. air strike killed terror chief Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and five days after al-Maliki completed his cabinet by naming the ministers of Defense and Interior — events the president's advisers hoped would lead to political progress.

But underscoring the dangers that remain, a series of explosions struck the northern city of Kirkuk on Tuesday, killing at least 16 people. And the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq pledged to avenge predecessor al-Zarqawi's death with horrific attacks, according to a statement posted on the Web.

Al-Maliki has won U.S. admiration by promising to crack down on militias and sectarian violence, promote national reconciliation, accelerate reconstruction efforts and restore essential services such as electricity.

Bush's Visit To Baghdad Signifies Upturn In His Political Fortunes (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

President Bush, caught for months in a losing battle for public approval, suddenly is scoring gains on several fronts, raising a far-reaching question: Is he setting the stage for a political recovery?

Mr. Bush Tuesday sought to capitalize on progress on the most vital front of all, Iraq, making an unannounced visit to Baghdad to hail the formation of a new government there. At the same time, another cloud lifted in Washington as defense lawyers announced that top White House political adviser Karl Rove won't be indicted in an investigation into the leaking of a Central Intelligence Agency agent's identity. (See related article1.)

DOJ_NMG_0033667

Along with other recent good news, the developments hold at least the prospect that Mr. Bush's political slide has hit bottom. The president has pulled himself off the mat before, in 2002, when Democrats expecting to score the usual midterm election gains against the president's party actually lost seats, and in 2004, when he trailed Democrat John Kerry by a significant margin only to roar back and win re-election.

It is too early, of course, to know whether the positive news will be sustained enough to help him improve his standing, as well as the Republican Party's endangered majorities in Congress. Mr. Bush has the lowest job-approval ratings of his presidency; while showing modest upticks in recent days, they continue to hover below 40%. At a comparable time in 2002, he had a rating of 74%, and in 2004 of 47%.

Moreover, a number of potential pitfalls for the White House remain, including stubbornly high energy prices and growing unease in financial markets, underscored again Tuesday as the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 86.44 points to erase its gains for the year.

Still, Republicans are relieved to hear good news after months of bad news. Besides Tuesday's developments, the administration has seen the death of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, a Republican win in a hotly contested California congressional race, strong economic growth and employment and confidence among White House personnel after a second-term shakeup.

"We've been hoping and praying for good news for months, since Katrina hit," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, a North Carolina Republican. "I don't want to dance the jig too soon, but it's at least good news so we can get our footing and get back to where we need to be going."

Late Tuesday, some lawmakers even were suggesting Mr. Bush's meeting with the new Iraqi government could pave the way for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops in coming months. But in later comments to reporters during the trip home, Mr. Bush said he reassured nervous Iraqi leaders the U.S. wouldn't pull out prematurely. "There's a worry almost to a person that we will leave before they are capable of defending themselves," said Mr. Bush, who said he had assured Iraqis he wouldn't let a "vacuum" develop. The question of how fast to begin a troop drawdown, in fact, could become a point of tension between Mr. Bush and Republican lawmakers, who may be eager to welcome soldiers home before the fall congressional elections.

In political terms, the turnaround comes at an especially opportune time, less than five months before elections in which, polls show, Republican control of Congress is in serious jeopardy. Some analysts believe voter impressions of political fundamentals -- particularly of the economy, but also of how parties and leaders are forming -- begin to harden months ahead of Election Day.

The visit to Iraq was designed to help Mr. Bush get better acquainted with the country's new leaders, especially Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. But it also served as a kind of public-relations coup for the White House, which planned the trip with a mix of secrecy, security and subterfuge.

The trip began unfolding Monday night at Camp David, after Mr. Bush spent an exhausting day of intensive meetings with aides and Cabinet members discussing Iraq. At about 7:45 p.m., Mr. Bush excused himself from a postdinner discussion, saying he was "losing altitude" and in need of a rest.

The president didn't head to bed, however. Instead, he and a small number of aides made their way to an idling helicopter -- a different one than the easily identifiable green helicopter the president usually uses -- and flew to Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington. Within minutes, he was en route to Baghdad on Air Force One, which had been parked on a distant runway not visible from the road or from a nearby terminal building.

At Camp David, all but Vice President Cheney and two members of the Cabinet -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- were unaware the president had left until Tuesday morning, when he failed to show up for a bagel breakfast in the dining room, which was supposed to kick off another day of discussions about Iraq.

Mr. Bush had told his staff a month ago that he wanted to travel to Iraq as soon as a new government was completely in place, a process that took months as Iraq's political leaders argued over filling three final, key, Cabinet posts. The trip was planned by a small group of aides, some of whom couldn't tell family members.

The small number of reporters included in the trip each were told in person with little more than 24 hours' notice. All were required to keep the trip secret from colleagues and even spouses and to surrender cellphones and BlackBerry devices before they boarded the plane.

Even the Iraqis weren't told in advance. Prime Minister Maliki woke up expecting to speak to the president by a secure videolink while the president sat at Camp David. He didn't find out Mr. Bush was there in person until the president's helicopter landed in a secure airfield in the heavily fortified Green Zone.

DOJ_NMG_0033668

"Obviously, when you're entering into a situation where the enemy is so active, we have to be extra cautious," White House counselor Dan Bartlett told reporters traveling with Mr. Bush.

In the end, while the trip provided an opportunity to accentuate the positive in Iraq after months of bad news, the continuing turmoil there could rob the White House of long-term benefits. Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg noted that Mr. Bush gained a few points in his standing on Iraq late last fall, amid good news about Iraqi elections and a flurry of speeches. But that evaporated in the face of steady bad news on the ground.

The economic risks at home also appear to be significant. Growth has been strong for the past year, with the economy expanding at a 5.3% annual rate in the first quarter and the unemployment rate falling in May to a five-year low of 4.6%. But high gasoline prices have squeezed workers. High energy costs also fueled inflation pressure, which may lead the Federal Reserve to continue raising interest rates, a key factor in the stock-market drop of recent weeks.

Moreover, there are signs growth already is cooling in response to earlier interest-rate increases and energy costs. Some economists expect it to fall below 3% in the current quarter.

Nevertheless, the respite from the second term's bad news has lifted spirits among Republicans. "He's showing dynamic leadership now," said Sen. Trent Lott (R., Miss.), who has clashed with Mr. Bush in the past.

Sara Taylor, the White House political director, said positive developments in different areas are combining to give Mr. Bush a bounce. "I think there's a cumulative effect, with the president showing leadership in Iraq, on immigration and other issues," she said.

Perhaps in a sign of renewed confidence, Mr. Rove said in a speech Monday night in New Hampshire that Republicans "have no excuses to make" for the Iraq war, and should use the issue as a weapon against Democrats who want to withdraw. "They are profoundly wrong," he said.

Spate Of Good News Gives White House A Chance To Regroup (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

In a White House that had virtually forgotten what good news looks like, the past few weeks have been refreshing. A Republican won a much-watched special congressional election. President Bush recruited a Wall Street heavy hitter as Treasury secretary. U.S. forces killed the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq. And now the architect of the Bush presidency has avoided criminal charges.

The question is whether this latest updraft in Bush's fortunes will last much longer than the president's surprise trip yesterday to Iraq. Bush took full command of the political stage with his five-hour appearance in Baghdad, just days after the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and used it to showcase a new Iraqi government he hopes to turn the war over to eventually. Yet in the end, some analysts noted, it will matter only if this new government can heal societal schisms and stand up effective security forces.

For Bush, any progress at the moment is critical. Iraq has been at the heart of his political troubles, alienating voters weary of the war, unsettling congressional allies facing reelection this fall, and souring the public mood toward other initiatives by the administration. Even Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove's legal problems stemmed from Iraq and the initial White House effort to justify the decision to invade.

With Zarqawi dead, a new Baghdad government in place and Rove freed from prosecutor's cross hairs, the White House hopes it can pivot to a new stage in which it is no longer on the defensive. In recent weeks, under new Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, the White House has tried to do more to set an agenda, moving aggressively into the immigration debate and agreeing to join direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program under certain conditions.

"There's a sense of motion and energy and progress on different fronts," said Peter H. Wehner, White House director of strategic initiatives. "There's more of a sense that we're shaping events, rather than being controlled by them."

The spate of positive developments may have arrested the president's months-long slide in opinion polls, at least for now. Bush's approval rating has risen from a low of 31 percent in May to 38 percent this week, according to a USA Today-Gallup poll. Zarqawi's death seems to have somewhat shored up confidence in the prospects for victory in Iraq, with 48 percent now believing the United States will win, compared with 39 percent in April. Still, a CBS News weekend poll with a smaller sample showed Bush's approval rating slipping in the past month from 35 percent to 33 percent.

"When you get into these ruts, you're always looking for anything to bounce you out and get you back on track," said Joel P. Johnson, a White House adviser to President Bill Clinton during difficult times. "They've been in a rut for so long that anything that serves to pull them back onto the road has got to feel pretty good for them. The real question is, does it last a week or is it a real sign of some sort of steadying of the process?"

DOJ_NMG_0033669

The aftermath of the capture of Saddam Hussein demonstrated how transitory a single moment of victory can be. Bush got a four-point bump in Washington Post-ABC News polling after Hussein was found in December 2003, but it lasted about two months. Recognizing that, Bush orchestrated a flurry of activity on Iraq in the past few days -- including his secret trip, a Camp David war cabinet meeting and a briefing blitz on Capitol Hill -- to demonstrate that progress in Iraq means more than Zarqawi's death.

Analysts agree that after two weak Iraqi prime ministers, Bush finally has a potentially strong partner in the newly installed Nouri al-Maliki, whom he met for the first time yesterday. But the list of challenges still confronting them is daunting: sectarian strife, inadequate electricity, private militias, slow police training and so on.

"Is the insurgency defeated? No. Has it had a great reversal? Yes," said Anthony Cordesman, who studies Iraq at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "When you talk to people in Iraq on a background basis, U.S. or Iraqi, they always tell you this is going to take at least two more years to play out. That doesn't mean there isn't progress, but progress is relative."

Bush has been careful to highlight publicly the hurdles ahead and to warn that the war is nowhere near over. But for the first time this year, aides sound more upbeat about their chances of reassuring the public about the future and reversing the trajectory of the problem-plagued White House. The sight of Bush in Baghdad twinned with the news that Rove had been cleared shot a jolt of relief and optimism through the building.

"This is not a crowd that rides the highs and lows. This is a team that has been through extraordinary moments of history," said White House communications director Nicolle Wallace. "Having said that, it certainly creates momentum and enhances the confidence of the team when you can point to" examples of progress.

Rove's legal jeopardy had hung over the White House for many months as his colleagues contemplated life in the West Wing without him. Some Republican advisers outside the White House had long worried that Rove's problems were distracting him and had led to setbacks that might have been avoided if he were more fully engaged, such as the failed Supreme Court nomination of Harriet Miers or the battle over the Dubai port deal.

As part of Bolten's White House shakeup, Rove was relieved of day-to-day policy management duties to enable him to focus more on broader strategy and the midterm congressional elections.

Fellow Bush aides vigorously denied for months that Rove was distracted or was in any way responsible for the president's rocky road. But yesterday, they said he will clearly be more valuable now that the legal cloud has lifted.

"The other team thought they'd sacked the quarterback, and even if he came back he'd limp anyway," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a Rove confidant, who had lunch with him yesterday. "Now he's back -- no limp." Switching metaphors, Norquist compared Rove to a bull that has been poked but not killed. "Not only is he in fine fettle, not only is he not wounded, he's pricked enough to be angry."

Rove tried to play down his own development. Having flown back to Washington on Monday night from a New Hampshire speech accusing Democrats of wanting to cut and run in Iraq, he showed up at the White House in time to run yesterday's 7:30 a.m. senior staff meeting, since Bolten was in Iraq with Bush.

As he went around the table soliciting updates on various issues, he made no mention of his legal case, nor did anyone else, according to several people in the room. Norquist said it did not come up during their lunch in the West Wing mess, either, as they discussed property rights. But Norquist said he did notice aides offering congratulations to Rove as they walked through the halls of the building.

Whether or not he had been distracted before, Rove can focus his attention entirely on the fall midterm elections, which are critical to the remainder of Bush's presidency. Norquist said he believes that after beating his legal woes, Rove will want to demonstrate that he is still "the toughest guy on the block."

If Republicans hold onto both houses, then Bush aides figure they have another chance to advance key priorities and shape his legacy. If Democrats win the House, then the final two years of Bush's administration could be spent fighting rear-guard actions.

The White House took heart from the narrow victory of Brian Bilbray in a California special election to fill the House seat of fellow Republican Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who resigned after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes. But it required enormous resources in a traditionally GOP-friendly district, and Republicans presumably need Bush to be performing better with the public to avoid significant losses. Even with his latest bounce, a standard-bearer in the high thirties is not much of an asset.

So the White House is taking a long view, both at home and in Iraq, betting that improvement will continue and trying not to get lost in the news of the moment, good or bad.

A Lift In Iraq And A Bump Back Home (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

DOJ_NMG_0033670

The Christian Science Monitor, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

The pictures out of Baghdad Tuesday morning spoke volumes. George W. Bush is beaming, the new Iraqi leader at his side, after pulling off a secret flight to the country that is the make-or-break project of his presidency. On his five-hour visit, President Bush met with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, other top Iraqis, and US troops, in a show of resolve aimed at war-weary audiences in Iraq, America, and the rest of the world.

But Mr. Bush has more to smile about than recent successes in Iraq, foremost the completion of the new government and elimination of terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, has learned he won't be indicted in the CIA leak case. And the latest Gallup poll shows Bush at his highest job approval - 38 percent of the public - since February.

Not only has Bush been edging steadily upward in overall job performance, after hitting bottom in early May at 31 percent, by Gallup's measure, his approval ratings on individual issues - from Iraq and energy to the economy and immigration - have bumped up as well.

"In general, we're seeing a rising tide lifting all boats," says Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll.

Mr. Newport cautions that it's impossible to know for sure why poll numbers go up or down, and notes that Bush's job approval number went up only two points after Zarqawi's death compared with the poll taken the week before. And, he adds, Bush was already on an upward trajectory before last week.

Still, for a president who seemed for months unable to catch a break, the new sense of momentum could have a spillover effect in his dealing with Congress, where he has struggled to demonstrate much political capital.

Bush still faces a steep climb on Capitol Hill in his effort to pass comprehensive immigration reform - enhanced border security plus a guest-worker program that critics call "amnesty" - but at least he is making headway in public opinion: Gallup shows public approval of his handling of immigration at 38 percent, up from 26 percent in late April. When Gallup polls directly on Bush's plan, a majority of the public is supportive.

Some of Bush's good news comes under the column labeled "Bullets Dodged." Last week, in a special congressional election to fill out the term of imprisoned former Rep. Randy Cunningham (R) of California, the Republican candidate eked out a narrow victory. If the Democrat had won - in a solidly GOP district - the Republican Party would have had cause for panic heading into a hard-fought race this fall to keep control of Congress. But that didn't happen.

The second dodged bullet - the announcement Monday night that Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald does not intend to indict Mr. Rove - means the GOP's political mastermind is free to focus on the midterm elections.

In addition, the Democrats have lost the hoped-for image of a Rove perp walk in their argument that the Bush White House, and Republican Party, is consumed by a "culture of corruption."

On Monday night, as prosecutors were informing Rove's lawyer that there would be no indictment, Rove was in New Hampshire attacking Democrats before a Republican audience. He accused the Democrats of wanting to "cut and run" from Iraq, according to wire reports.

The White House, of course, is not out of the woods legally. Former top aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby remains under indictment on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice related to the case of the blown identity of CIA agent Valerie Plame. His case goes to trial in January, and Vice President Cheney may be called to testify.

The news on Rove, revealed Tuesday morning, was immediately overtaken by Bush's sudden appearance in Baghdad's Green Zone, on a day when he was scheduled to remain at Camp David with his war cabinet and meet with the new Iraqi government by videoconference. The last time Bush visited Baghdad, also unannounced in advance for security reasons, was on Thanksgiving Day 2003, eight months after the US-led invasion of Iraq. The primary image was of him serving turkey dinner to US troops.

This time, Bush kept his plan for a videoconference, but appeared on the Baghdad screen rather than the Camp David one. Bush spoke first: "I've come to not only look you in the eye; I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it will keep its word - that it's in our interest that Iraq succeed," he said.

According to a White House press corps pool report, Prime Minister Maliki expressed his country's appreciation for US efforts in Iraq. Then he closed by conveying the hope that US troops could soon withdraw from Iraq, but offered no detail on when that could begin.

"Maliki has emerged as a serious potential leader with a serious cabinet," wrote Anthony Cordesman, an expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, after news broke of Bush's trip to Baghdad.

Bush Is On A Bit Of A Roll After Months Of Unrelenting Bad News (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And William Douglas

DOJ_NMG_0033671

Knight Ridder, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - Tuesday's news that presidential adviser Karl Rove won't face prosecution lifted a cloud over the White House and gave President Bush another reason to hope that his worst days are behind him.

As Bush basked in cheers from U.S. troops during a secret visit to Baghdad, his closest adviser was back at work in the White House free from worry about a possible indictment in the CIA leak case. All in all, it was another good day for the president, who finally has a few reasons to celebrate after a long string of setbacks that battered his popularity.

The developments added to the optimism that swept through the White House after last week's slaying of terrorist chief Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq and the completion of a new Iraqi government.

In addition, a Republican won the June 6 special election to fill the San Diego congressional seat left vacant by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's bribery conviction, reviving hope among Republicans that congressional elections in November may not doom them. Bush's recent appointments of Josh Bolten as White House chief of staff and Henry Paulson as treasury secretary also won widespread praise.

"All of a sudden the clouds broke and the sun started to shine," said Ed Gillespie, a former Republican Party chairman. "After six months of thunderstorms and rain it feels pretty good."

How long the good days will last for the president is another question.

"He's had a spate of good news," said Paul Light, a public policy professor at New York University. "But there has to be the recognition that time is running out. That's the nature of the political clock."

Democrats scoffed at suggestions that Bush was rebounding.

"These few developments - and for instance, the Zarqawi one is one I welcome - don't remove the cloud of incompetence that is over the administration's head," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "I don't think the administration can really recover until they change their entire way of operating, bring in people who are not ideologues or cronies but rather care about competently running the government; begin to reach out in a bipartisan way."

The resolution of Rove's legal troubles means that the president's top political operative is now free to focus on retaining Republican control of Congress in November's elections. Rove, the architect of Bush's rise from baseball executive to governor of Texas to president, has broad influence over the Republican Party and serves as its chief strategist.

Rumors of his possible indictment swirled for months after he testified five times before a federal grand jury that's investigating the leak of a CIA officer's name to the news media. On Tuesday, Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, said special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had "formally advised" him that the prosecutor "does not anticipate seeking charges" against the White House aide.

Friends and associates said the announcement removed a personal burden that Rove had done a good job of concealing. "You know what you did or didn't do, but until the prosecutor agrees, it's on your mind," former White House spokesman Trent Duffy said. "You'd be crazy if you didn't think about it."

Republicans said Fitzgerald's decision showed the viciousness of Democrats' attacks on Rove. Democrats questioned the prosecutor's decision to forgo prosecution.

Yet Rove's clearance deprived Democrats of a chance to use him as the poster boy for their efforts to convince voters that Republicans have fostered a "culture of corruption" in Washington, although some Democrats seemed reluctant to accept the loss.

"If the president valued America more than he valued his connection with Karl Rove, Karl Rove would have been fired a long time ago," Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean said.

Duffy, who recently left the White House, said the recent developments had given Republicans "a much-needed morale boost at precisely the right time." Still, he conceded that Bush has a long way to go to restore his standing with voters.

A new Gallup poll, conducted last weekend, offered encouraging news for Bush but also highlighted the hurdles he faces in trying to ease doubts about his leadership. Although his approval rating climbed to its highest level since February, it was still only 38 percent.

And while 53 percent of Americans hailed al-Zarqawi's death as a major achievement, only 20 percent thought it would mean fewer insurgent attacks. Most Americans - 51 percent in the poll - remain convinced that the Iraq invasion was a mistake.

The poll was taken June 9-11 of 1,002 people and had an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Gillespie, who has close ties to Rove and the White House, said Bush couldn't expect to regain his popularity overnight.

"These things turn slowly," he said, "but it does seem to a lot of us that the aircraft carrier is slowly turning."

Bush In Iraq Fans An Uptick In Polls (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

DOJ_NMG_0033672

Chicago Tribune, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Carried out with all the stealth and swagger of a military mission, a surprise visit to Baghdad by President Bush on Tuesday was intended to catch two waves of success: formation of a tough new government in Iraq and the killing of a reviled insurgent leader.

For the moment, at least, Bush appeared to be riding those waves with a gradual improvement in the public's opinion of the president's performance in the past month and an additional slight uptick since last week's killing of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq.

After unremitting bad news from Iraq that dragged Bush's approval ratings to an all-time low this spring, the president has caught a few breaks that could offer his administration hope.

The convergence of positive signs Tuesday included word that his chief political adviser, Karl Rove, would not be indicted in an investigation of who leaked the identity of a CIA agent.

Bush's appearance in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone on Tuesday—which came as a surprise even to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki—marked the first grand statement the president has attempted to make about the prospects for success in Iraq since he spent Thanksgiving with American troops in Baghdad in 2003.

"My message to the Iraqi people is this: Seize the moment," Bush told U.S. troops assembled for a brief but spirited address by the commander in chief on his way out of Baghdad. "I also have a message to the Iraqi people that when America gives a commitment, America will keep its commitment."

That steadfastness in Iraq has injured Bush politically as public support for the war has fallen dramatically since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Even now, with public support for the president's performance showing signs of rebounding somewhat in recent weeks, opposition to the war remains entrenched.

Bush's numbers rising

Public approval of Bush's performance climbed to 38 percent in a new Gallup Poll taken June 9-11, after the U.S. raid that killed al-Zarqawi, the most wanted man in Iraq. That is only a marginal gain from the 36 percent approval recorded before the raid but a notable boost from 31 percent in early May, the low point in Gallup's polling of Bush's presidency.

Nevertheless, because of lingering public opposition to a costly war in its fourth year, analysts suggest that the president and his party could be riding only a passing wave of success. The same Gallup survey shows Americans more likely to support Democrats than Republicans in November's midterm elections.

The president's appearance in Baghdad, unannounced to the Iraqi prime minister until just minutes before Bush's arrival out of concern for the president's security, risked undermining the Iraqi leader's stature as head of a sovereign nation, analysts said. It made "kind of a sad statement" about the U.S.-Iraqi relationship, according to Peter Singer, a senior fellow in foreign policy at The Brookings Institution.

"As for the Iraqi public, they couldn't care less" about the Bush appearance with al-Maliki, said Singer, director of Brookings' Project on U.S. Relations with the Islamic World. "They are more concerned about what life is like from day to day for them. … They are worried about the massive crime wave and whether their children are safe on the streets, not whether Bush showed up or not."

Any political benefits of the Baghdad visit for Bush back home also could be undone if the war continues to go badly.

"Theater sometimes works politically," said John Mueller, a professor of political science at Ohio State University who has tracked declining public support for wars as casualties increase. "If it has a positive impact for him, it will be extremely temporary. The reality is that the war is a mess, the killings continue and the insurgency continues."

On the way home from Baghdad, Bush made an unusual appearance with reporters aboard Air Force One. He dismissed the impact of the war on election-year politics in the U.S.

The president said success is what voters care about. "They don't really care about politics," Bush said. "What they care about is success, succeeding in Iraq."

And he insisted that any decisions about American troop levels are in the hands of U.S. military commanders.

If Bush's journey to Baghdad was theater, the president clearly was relishing his role.

Wearing a navy blue baseball cap as he boarded Air Force One at Andrews Air Force Base on Monday night, Bush yelled to reporters, "The POTUS is on board." POTUS is an acronym for President of the United States.

The small number of "pool" reporters who accompanied Bush to Baghdad were summoned in secrecy. They assembled at a Washington-area hotel and were forced to surrender cell phones as Bush secretly slipped away from a Camp David retreat, where he was meeting with advisers about Iraq.

Monday, the first day of the Camp David session, came off as advertised. On Tuesday, Bush and several senior Cabinet members were supposed to consult via videoconference with the Iraqi prime minister and his new Cabinet in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0033673

Few knew

Instead, Bush showed up at al-Maliki's conference table in person. Only a few of Bush's closest aides and First Lady Laura Bush knew of Bush's true plans in advance of the visit.

The Bush administration has voiced great confidence in al-Maliki and his new government, with one senior aide calling this juncture a window of opportunity that must succeed.

And Bush, as he often does with world leaders, is seeking to personalize that relationship.

"I've come not just to look you in the eye but to tell you that when America gives its word, it keeps its word," Bush told al-Maliki during a segment of their meeting that was made public.

"These are historic times," Bush said in Baghdad. "This government is just getting started. … There are going to be tough days ahead, and more sacrifice for Americans as well as Iraqis."

In Iraq Visit, Bush Seizes On A Step Forward (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — In visiting Baghdad on Tuesday, President Bush was trying to deliver a carefully calibrated message to Americans: that Iraq and the administration's strategy there appear to be turning a corner, but troops will not be withdrawn anytime soon.

Mr. Bush could have spoken with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki by secure videoconference from Camp David. Instead, he embraced Mr. Maliki both figuratively and literally — at the same time embracing the political reality that Iraq is so central to his presidency that he cannot escape developments there, and must try instead to make the most of any good news.

"I'm impressed by the strength of your character and your desire to succeed," the president told the new prime minister, as the officials he left behind — Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice — watched via remote video link. "And I'm impressed by your strategy."

It was powerful political theater, choreographed by an experienced team that played up the drama and secrecy of the moment, and were rewarded with a day of relatively unfiltered cable news coverage. The trip, including a stealthy nighttime helicopter departure from Camp David, unfolded with the precision of a campaign event, complete with the image of the commander in chief addressing cheering American troops.

But it was also a gamble. For Mr. Bush, the new Iraqi government is a life preserver, evidence of progress toward the goal of establishing democracy in a hostile environment.

Since the killing last week of the jihadist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, polls have shown some tentative signs of a reversal in the slide in public support for the war. Some foreign policy analysts, even those critical of Mr. Bush, see glimmers of hope."It's been a steady drumbeat of disastrous tactical news, so this is a very significant event," said one of those critics, Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, a retired Army commander, referring to the formation of the new government. "This is the decisive turning point, not whacking Zarqawi."

Yet experience suggests that steps forward with Iraq are often followed by more violence, which in turn erodes any surge in public support for the war.

And the fledgling Baghdad government is both fragile and untested. So the administration is putting all of its diplomatic and bureaucratic muscle behind Mr. Maliki, with the goals of turning things around in Iraq, putting a floor under the president's plummeting job approval ratings and keeping the war from leading to a Republican defeat in Congressional elections in November.

For the White House, Tuesday's visit could not have come at a more opportune time. Mr. Bush's chief political adviser, Karl Rove, learned Monday that he would not be indicted in the C.I.A. leak investigation — news that freed Mr. Rove to go on the offensive against the Democrats, as he did Monday night during a speech in New Hampshire when he derided them for what he called "that party's old pattern of cutting and running."

As Mr. Bush pledged to Iraqis in Baghdad that he would stick by them, Democrats in Washington were debating whether the United States should set a deadline for withdrawing troops, creating precisely the contrast the White House sought to establish.

"There is no stronger statement about American engagement than the president landing on Iraqi soil not only to talk with Iraqi leaders but also to spend time with U.S. troops," said Dan Senor, a former adviser to the American-led coalition in Iraq who is now a crisis management consultant in New York.

Mr. Senor, a supporter of the White House, said no other issue is as critical to the future of Mr. Bush's presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0033674

"Working on an immigration reform compromise is important, but at the end of the day, if Iraq is a failure nothing else in the Bush presidency will matter," he said. "The president isn't going to get any credit by having success on other issues, particularly on the domestic front, if in January 2009 he hands a mess to the next president of the United States on Iraq."

In a sense, Mr. Bush went to Iraq with few options. There is little evidence that security is improving, and the president has long said American soldiers will not leave until the Iraqis assume that responsibility. So instead, the White House is turning to a strategy that proved successful in the elections of 2004, insisting Mr. Bush will stay the course while at the same time making Iraq a proxy for the broader national security debate.

"I fully recognize there's people who are concerned about the really short-term history," Mr. Bush told reporters traveling with him on Air Force One. "I'm concerned about the long-term history of what we're doing. I believe what we're doing is necessary and right."

Although three recent national opinion polls suggested that Americans may be more hopeful about the long-term prospect for stability in Iraq since the death of Mr. Zarqawi, Bill McInturff, a Republican pollster, said the reversal in attitudes has been modest and the president has yet to benefit personally.

Kenneth M. Duberstein, a former chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan, said the Baghdad trip proved that the president can "dominate the agenda whenever he wants to" and that Mr. Bush is aware that "Iraq is central, not only to his presidency, but his legacy." He said it was possible for the White House, slowly but steadily, to turn public opinion around, drawing a football analogy to describe how the president might reach that goal.

He cited the strategy of the legendary football coach Woody Hayes, which was not to rely on dramatic Hail Mary passes, but to focus on winning a game bit by bit with what was known as "three yards and cloud of dust."

Mr. Duberstein went on, "What Bush is doing is not Hail Marys, but three yards and a cloud of dust. And he has to earn it every day."

Bush Tells Iraq: Your Future "is In Your Hands" (USAT)

By César G. Soriano And Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD — President Bush, on a surprise visit to Iraq, told Iraqis Tuesday that the United States stands with them but their nation's future "is in your hands."

Bush's trip, kept secret from all but his closest aides until he was safely on the ground in Iraq, came as his administration tries to build support for Iraq's new government in the wake of the death of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi last week.

"I've come to not only look you in the eye," Bush told Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it keeps its word."

Bush made clear that there are no immediate plans to dramatically reduce the 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. "There's a worry, almost to a person, that we will leave before they are capable of defending themselves," Bush said on the way back to Washington. "And I assured them they didn't need to worry. I also made it clear that we want to work with their government on a way forward on all fronts."

He met with about 300 cheering U.S. troops, who gave him repeated ovations. "Thought I'd stop by to say hello," Bush said to laughter. "I bring greetings from a grateful nation. And I thank you for your sacrifice."

Bush said, "My message to the Iraqi people is this: Seize the moment, seize this opportunity to develop a government of and by and for the people."

"God willing, all the suffering will be over," al-Maliki said. "And all the soldiers will return to their country with our gratitude."

Bush said he was briefed by al-Maliki and some of his key Cabinet members, as members of Bush's Cabinet watched at Camp David via videoconference.

"I came away with the feeling that they're plenty capable people … from different backgrounds dedicated to the success of their country," Bush said.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll released Monday showed a rise in American confidence that the Iraq war is winnable. Political analysts said Bush's trip could capitalize on a rare moment of good news.

"He's trying to build on the two recent successes — the death of Zarqawi and the completion of the new Iraqi government,' said Merle Black, a political scientist at Emory University in Atlanta. "He's barely had a chance to call attention to anything successful for a long time."

Critics of Bush were not persuaded. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said, "I don't know what the purpose of the president's trip is, but then again, I don't know what the purpose of the war is."

Bush was in Iraq for about five hours, marking his first visit since Thanksgiving 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0033675

Al-Maliki was told about the trip five minutes before meeting Bush. “Good to see you,” he told the president. “Thanks for having me,” Bush replied.

Bush told reporters on Air Force One that top U.S. military and policy officials would sit down with Iraqi officials in the days ahead “and devise a way forward.” The president also said he would step up pressure on other world leaders to do more to help Iraq.

“I am going to call these leaders again and remind them that a stable and secure Iraq is part of a stable and secure Middle East,” he said.

Bush Drops By Baghdad (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

President Bush yesterday made a surprise visit to Baghdad to tell new Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki face to face that "the future of this country is in your hands."

"When Iraq succeeds in having a government of and by and for the people of Iraq, you will have dealt a serious blow to those who have a vision of darkness, who don't believe in liberty, who are willing to kill the innocent in order to achieve a political objective," said the president, traveling to Iraq less than a week after the U.S. military killed al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi.

"I have come today to personally show our nation's commitment to a free Iraq. My message to the Iraqi people is this: Seize the moment; seize this opportunity," he said later in the day to U.S. troops in Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone.

Sneaking out of the Maryland mountain retreat of Camp David after telling his senior staff Monday night that he was tired and heading to bed, the president and a handful of top aides flew overnight and, unlike his last secret visit to Iraq's capital on Thanksgiving 2003, landed in broad daylight at just after 4 p.m. Baghdad time.

Seated next to Mr. al-Maliki in the U.S. Embassy compound for a videoconference with U.S. military and administration officials gathered at Camp David, Mr. Bush said, "The decisions you and your Cabinet make will be determinate as to whether or not a country succeeds that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

Mr. Bush told the Iraqi leader, who on Thursday completed appointments to his new government, that he had come "not only to look you in the eye, I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it keeps its word."

Mr. al-Maliki, who didn't know that Mr. Bush was coming until five minutes before they met, told Mr. Bush that the Iraqi Cabinet is determined to defeat the insurgents so U.S. and other forces can withdraw from Iraq.

"We are determined to succeed, and we have to defeat terrorists and defeat all the hardships," he said through a translator. "God willing, all the suffering will be over. And all the soldiers will return to their country with our gratitude for what they have offered, the sacrifice. We are determined to succeed, and we have to defeat terrorism. Our country will stay united; it will stay strong."

Mr. al-Maliki also expressed his country's appreciation for U.S. efforts in Iraq, where about 2,500 troops have died in the war.

"I present our gratitude for those that have sacrificed themselves for the Iraqi people," he said.

Despite the killing of Zarqawi, al Qaeda in Iraq this week announced a new leader and a wave of bombings hit the oil city of Kirkuk yesterday, killing 14 persons, as the terror group sought to prove the death of its leader will not stop its campaign of violence.

The president also told Mr. al-Maliki that he had heard reports that Iran was "interfering" in Iraq and said that had to stop, said Iraqi government sources who attended the talks.

Mr. Bush spent about five hours in Baghdad, and also met with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, Parliament Speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, other national political leaders and U.S. troops.

Mr. Bush was to have been in Camp David for the videoconference with Mr. al-Maliki, but wanted to go to Iraq as soon as the final positions in Mr. al-Maliki's government -- the ministers of defense and interior -- were chosen, said White House communications director Dan Bartlett. But the two-day meeting at Camp David was part of an elaborate ruse to conceal Mr. Bush's Baghdad trip and a trick to bring Mr. al-Maliki and his Cabinet to the Green Zone.

On Capitol Hill yesterday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and top generals yesterday briefed about 60 senators on the progress being made in Iraq and the president's surprise visit. They also held a separate House briefing.

After the briefing, Mr. Rumsfeld said the senators did not discuss moving troops out of Iraq and repeated claims by Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki that the United States is "there to complete the mission."

DOJ_NMG_0033676

"The Iraqi government is improving and strengthening their security forces, and as they do so, we will continue to pass off responsibility to them," Mr. Rumsfeld said, adding that he will meet with generals and Iraqi officials "to discuss at what pace we will be able to draw down our forces, and it will all be done in a very orderly way."

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said the president's trip "is likely to lead to phased redeployments this year and continuing in the next year."

Democratic senators are working on several proposals to begin withdrawing troops, but senators leaving the Rice-Rumsfeld briefing stopped short of endorsing an amendment by Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, to withdraw troops by the end of this year.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, said he hadn't seen the amendment, but wasn't sure it was the right idea.

"Just to make a date without it being attached to what our plan is as to how you would succeed in leaving something better would not be the most appropriate way to go," he said after leaving the briefing.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, said after the briefing that he would like to see a "sensible" withdrawal of troops, but noted that "it's irresponsible to demand a timetable for drawing down our forces, because it must be based on the reality of what's happening."

Democratic leaders are working with Mr. Kerry to draft another amendment that calls for the "responsible redeployment" of troops starting this year. Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, one of the Democrats working on the amendment, said she thought "the time has come for the Congress to express its will."

Bush Makes Surprise Visit To Iraq To Press Leadership (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 13 — President Bush used a surprise visit to Baghdad on Tuesday to tell the country's new leaders that "the fate and future of Iraq is in your hands" and that the time had come for Iraqis to pull together to save the faltering American-sponsored democracy here.

"My message to the Iraqi people is this: seize the moment," Mr. Bush said in a speech to American troops and embassy employees who gave him a rapturous reception in one of the marbled halls of Saddam Hussein's old Republican Palace, now the main American command center in the Green Zone. "Seize the opportunity to develop a government of, by and for the people."

On a six-hour visit that only a handful of Mr. Bush's closest aides knew about before he departed from Washington on Monday night, Mr. Bush seemed intent on pressing home a message that American military commanders and embassy officials have been urging on the new government since it took office three weeks ago: time for Iraq's politicians to develop an effective government, and a common front against the insurgents, is running out.

Seated beside Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in a meeting that included American officials and 17 members of the Iraq cabinet, Mr. Bush told the prime minister that he had come "to look you in the eye." He repeated the phrase later at the palace, when he told troops and other Americans he had come "to look at Prime Minister Maliki in the eyes and determine whether or not he is as dedicated to a free Iraq as you are."

Mr. Bush added, "And I believe he is."

Mr. Bush also gave Mr. Maliki a renewed assurance that the United States would not abandon the new government as it struggles to curb the spiraling violence, rebuild the country's shattered infrastructure and put Iraqis back to work in a reviving economy.

"I also have a message to the Iraqi people: that when America gives a commitment, America will keep its commitment," he said, to wild cheers from the 300 American soldiers and civilians gathered in the palace hall.

The trip was Mr. Bush's second to Iraq following his trip here at Thanksgiving in 2003, when he remained at an American military base at the Baghdad airport, and arrived and departed under cover of darkness. This time, he landed in midafternoon and left the safety of the airport for the 10-mile journey by helicopter over some of the most dangerous neighborhoods in Baghdad, including predominantly Sunni Arab districts on the city's western edge that have been a haven for insurgents.

In 2003, Mr. Bush's visit was kept secret until he left. On Tuesday, Mr. Bush left the palace at 9.20 p.m. and boarded an American military helicopter for Baghdad's international airport and Air Force One, which had carried the president and a small party of White House aides from Washington on Monday night. Aides said the return journey would involve a refueling stop at an American air base in Mildenhall in Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0033677

Security for the visit on Tuesday was extraordinarily tight, exceeding anything previously experienced in a city that has become a byword for suicide bombings, ambushes and kidnappings. The airport was closed for at least an hour before Air Force One spiraled steeply down onto the runway, following procedures aimed at foiling insurgents' missiles.

American officers said Mr. Bush had flown into the city on a heavily armed Nighthawk helicopter, forsaking the distinctive Marine One helicopter that the president traditionally uses in the United States and abroad.

Bridges across the Tigris River in the city's heart were closed, and American attack helicopters circled low over the Green Zone during the visit. Additional Humvees with turret gunners were stationed on approaches to the palace inside the Green Zone, and hundreds of Americans working in the building were told to pack up for the day and leave several hours before Mr. Bush arrived, leaving him to enter a nearly empty building.

American officials said Mr. Maliki was told that Mr. Bush was coming only shortly before the president arrived, after the Iraqi leader joined American officials at the palace in preparation for what had been announced late last week as a video-conference meeting involving Mr. Bush and members of his cabinet at Camp David and the Maliki cabinet in Baghdad.

The president's promise that the United States would stand by its Iraqi allies appeared aimed not only at Mr. Maliki and his cabinet, but also at other critical audiences: Iraqi insurgent groups whose Web sites have noted increasing popular discontent in the United States with the war, and politicians in the United States who see the American effort in Iraq as doomed and favor an early end to the military commitment.

The rebuttal to his critics came as Mr. Bush, meeting with the American soldiers and civilians as he wrapped up his visit, rehearsed the themes that have been hallmarks of his presidency — America's role in widening liberty in the world, and its tradition of steadfastness under challenge.

After a minute's ovation, the audience repeatedly interrupted the president with wild cheering and whoops, and crowded around him for 10 minutes afterward as he strode in among them and chatted about their families and their war experiences.

The cheering was loudest when Mr. Bush, flanked by the two top Americans in Baghdad, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the overall military commander, and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, spoke of Saddam Hussein as a "selfish, brutal leader" who had humiliated Iraqis and denied them freedom, and when he invoked the bombing strike last week that killed America's most wanted man in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

"Our military will stay on the offensive," Mr. Bush said. "We will continue to hunt down people like Mr. Zarqawi and bring them to justice."

"You know," he said, "right after September the 11th, I knew that some would forget the dangers we face, some would hope that the world would be what it's not: a peaceful place where people wouldn't want to do harm to those of us who love freedom. I vowed that day, after September the 11th, to do everything I could to protect the American people. And I was able to make that claim because there were people such as yourselves, who are willing to be on the front line in the war on terror."

Mr. Maliki, at 56 a newcomer to government office, appeared uneasy at times during the visit, smiling when he greeted Mr. Bush on his arrival in the palace rotunda, but otherwise looking mostly somber. One Iraqi official said the visit was a double-edged sword for Mr. Maliki — allowing Iraq's 25 million people to see that he enjoyed the personal backing of the American leader, but also inviting criticism from Iraqis who regard most of the politicians who have run for office under the American-sponsored elections as American stooges.

Mr. Maliki's remarks when reporters were ushered into the conference room where he and his cabinet colleagues were meeting with Mr. Bush and other American officials were brief, and seemed aimed at echoing Mr. Bush's themes without adding any of his own.

He thanked Mr. Bush for the American role in overthrowing Mr. Hussein, saying that Iraqis had freedom "for the first time" in their history, and vowed that Iraq would "stay united and strong." He added: "God willing, all the suffering will soon be over and all the coalition soldiers can return to their countries."

American officials in Baghdad, who asked not to be identified because they were not authorized to discuss details of the trip, said advance work for the journey went into high gear last week when Mr. Maliki finally won approval from feuding Sunni and Shiite political groups on nominees to the crucial war-related posts in the cabinet.

A member of the American advance party said the decision to make the journey had been made by the time that Mr. Zarqawi, Al Qaeda's leader in Iraq, was killed by two 500-pound bombs that struck the safe house where he was hiding at Hibhib, 35 miles north of Baghdad, last Wednesday evening.

The strike provided the 135,000 American troops here with their biggest morale boost since the capture of Mr. Hussein in December 2003, and set off a series of raids, mostly around Baghdad, in which the American command has said it killed or captured dozens of other Qaeda-linked terrorists and seized a trove of new intelligence about the Qaeda role in the war.

DOJ_NMG_0033678

Once the decision to make the trip was made, said officials quoted in pool reports filed by reporters traveling on Air Force One, the White House went to extraordinary lengths to keep the trip secret, even by the strict standards usually applied for the president's overseas visits. Only six White House officials knew that Mr. Bush was making the trip, they said.

Trip To Iraq Was Shrouded In Secrecy (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

"The POTUS is on board!" yelled a man of nearly 60 wearing a Navy baseball cap, dark pants and no tie, who had just climbed the drop-down backstairs of Air Force One in the dark and slipped into the rearmost cabin, crammed full with reporters and photographers.

It was, in fact, not just the customary announcement made when the president of the United States (POTUS) boards his plane. This was, in fact, the POTUS himself, minutes before Monday night's secret trip to Baghdad, one so elaborately planned that it included the president lying to his closest aides and the White House duping reporters.

At 7:45 p.m. Monday, Mr. Bush, nearing the end of the first of two days of meetings on Iraq at Camp David, sought his leave from his top military and intelligence advisers, including National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte, CIA Director Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden and Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"I'm losing altitude -- I'm going to read," Mr. Bush told the group, ostensibly heading to bed. But he did not. Instead, he slipped out of the fortified presidential retreat and into an unmarked helicopter, not his normal Marine One chopper, for a quick ride to Andrews Air Force Base and an 11-hour flight to Baghdad.

Vice President Dick Cheney was about the only one at the nighttime Camp David gathering who knew that the president was headed to Iraq.

"Our Cabinet is not completely aware," senior Bush aide Dan Bartlett later told reporters on Air Force One en route. "They all expected him to show up at breakfast with the ambassador of Iraq."

The president was to host a videoconference yesterday morning with members of his Cabinet and the new leaders of Iraq. Instead, Mr. Bush appeared on the televisions in Camp David from Baghdad, seated next to new Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Even Mr. al-Maliki didn't know about the meeting until five minutes before the president arrived; he, too, was tricked, showing up at the U.S. Embassy's quarters expecting merely the announced videoconference.

The trip was the brainchild of the president himself, who told his staff that he wanted to travel to Baghdad as soon as Mr. al-Maliki filled the final positions in his government, which occurred Thursday. The White House set up a strange series of movements for the president: He went to Camp David on Thursday and then returned to the White House on Sunday, only to leave again for his retreat early the next morning. Reporters were lulled.

In addition, just an hour before the president sneaked onto a helicopter at Camp David, the White House e-mailed reporters the next day's schedule for the president, which included a 2:30 p.m. press conference in the Rose Garden. No one suspected that the president would be halfway around the world at that time.

Secrecy was also tight surrounding the gathering of the small pool of reporters and photographers who went on the trip. Some were called to mysterious meetings at restaurants and cafes in Washington in the 24 hours before the trip. One radio reporter discovered his pool assignment with only a couple of hours' notice, but made it just in time.

The reporters were told to keep the plan secret, even from spouses and editors, and had to surrender their cellular phones and BlackBerrys before boarding Air Force One.

Like in a spy movie, the pool gathered outside an Arlington hotel, then drove the back roads of Andrews Air Force Base to the president's plane, which was parked out of sight of the terminal, far from its usual spot near the runway. With reporters on board, Mr. Bush bounded up the small set of backstairs, and the odyssey began.

The ruse -- or at least the president's attire -- was somewhat similar to that of the last time the president sneaked off to Baghdad -- Thanksgiving Day 2003. On that trip, the president, spending the holiday at his Crawford, Texas, ranch, was driven to a Waco airstrip in an unmarked vehicle along with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was then his national security adviser.

"I slipped on a baseball cap, pulled 'er down -- as did Condi. We looked like a normal couple," Mr. Bush told reporters after he returned from that trip.

Surprise Visit To Baghdad Follows Month Of Planning (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033679

WASHINGTON — President Bush, known for going to bed early, retired especially early Monday night.

After a long day of Iraq meetings at Camp David, Bush told Cabinet members and other aides around 7:45 p.m. that he was "losing altitude" and headed off for a little reading before bedtime.

Instead, he ducked out of the presidential retreat in the Catoctin Mountains and boarded a helicopter for the roughly 60-mile trip to Andrews Air Force Base in suburban Maryland.

By 9:07 p.m., Bush was aboard Air Force One, and the jet was airborne, bound for Iraq.

Less than a dozen hours later, as cameras whirred and flashed, Bush strolled into an ornate ceremonial room in Baghdad to shake hands with new Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The two leaders met at the seat of the Iraqi government, the domed Republican Presidential Palace, once the main office of Saddam Hussein.

After meeting with al-Maliki, Bush went before a cheering throng of about 300 U.S. troops and embassy workers who jammed the palace's marble-clad, red-carpeted ballroom. He said their work in Iraq would make history in the struggle for freedom.

"I understand long deployments are tough … on you and they're tough on your families," he said. "And so the first thing I want to tell you is the American people are incredibly grateful for what you do, and I bring their greetings and their thanks for the sacrifices you and your family make."

The visit came on what had been scheduled to be the second day of a two-day Iraq summit at Camp David.

Tuesday's agenda called for a meeting with al-Maliki and members of the Iraqi Cabinet — via teleconference.

Instead, Bush flew to Iraq with counselor Dan Bartlett and a select retinue, including national security adviser Stephen Hadley, chief of staff Joshua Bolten, spokesman Tony Snow, several Secret Service agents and a small pool of reporters. Bush was heading back late Tuesday.

The planning took place over the past month. Bush has been wanting to return to Baghdad to visit the new prime minister, Bartlett said. He was waiting for the new government to fill the positions of Defense, Interior and National Security ministers.

That happened last week, about the same time an airstrike killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, leader of the terrorist organization al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Bartlett said many of Bush's closest aides did not know about the secret trip.

"Obviously, when you're entering into a situation where the enemy is so active, we have to be extra cautious," he said.

Those in the dark included Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, who were at Camp David and learned about the president's trip Tuesday.

Those in the know included Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. They stayed behind.

Members of the Iraqi government also didn't know about the Bush visit. They had gathered in Baghdad for the expected videoconference.

This is Bush's second surprise trip to Iraq — the first was a Thanksgiving visit to U.S. troops in 2003.

This second visit follows a recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in which slightly more than half of those surveyed said invading Iraq was a mistake.

In the aftermath of Zarqawi's killing and the almost simultaneous completion of a government in Iraq, the White House is trying to make the case to the American people that the war is worth fighting, and to call for support and patience.

"When Iraq succeeds in having a government of and by and for the people of Iraq," Bush told al-Maliki, "you will have dealt a serious blow to those who have a vision of darkness."

In Baghdad, Bush Pledges Support To Iraqi Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Visit Aimed at Buttressing Newly Formed Government

BAGHDAD, June 13 -- President Bush told Iraq's prime minister and his cabinet Tuesday that "we'll keep our commitment" not to withdraw troops from the country until the new government is capable of defending itself.

During an unannounced visit to Baghdad aimed at buttressing the newly formed government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush pledged his support for the country's new leader and declared that "the fate of the Iraqi people is in their hands, and our job is to help them succeed."

Bush, making his first appearance here since serving Thanksgiving turkey to U.S. troops in 2003, greeted Maliki under the cupola of a marble-walled chamber in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces, now serving as the U.S. Embassy. Afterward, the president told reporters that Iraq's leaders were "deeply concerned that the stability provided by the coalition forces will be removed and there'll be a vacuum. And they're concerned about what goes into the vacuum, and I can understand that concern."

DOJ_NMG_0033680

"I assured them that we'll keep our commitment," Bush said during his flight home. "I also made it clear to them that in order for us to keep our commitment and be successful, they themselves have to do some hard things. They themselves have to set an agenda. They themselves have to get some things accomplished."

The visit, shrouded in such secrecy that much of Bush's Cabinet and senior White House staff did not know about it, came as there are mounting U.S. and Iraqi military operations aimed at further disrupting Iraq's insurgency, and defiant promises from insurgents of more violence after the killing last week of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of the group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett told reporters on the 11-hour flight to Baghdad from Andrews Air Force Base that Bush had planned the trip for months with a "very, very close circle" of about six White House staff members.

Administration officials went to extraordinary lengths to keep their plans secret, including issuing a false press statement Monday night saying the president would be having a press availability in the Rose Garden on Tuesday. White House communications director Nicolle Wallace said: "Nothing was done with the goal of duping anyone. . . . The purpose of the secrecy was security."

Arriving along with several staff members just after 4 p.m., Bush spent about five hours in Iraq's fortified Green Zone -- the only place he visited besides Baghdad's international airport. Joined by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and U.S. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., he met first with Maliki and his cabinet, which was completed last week after months of wrangling, and later with about 400 American troops and civilian workers in the palace's sprawling cafeteria.

The president wanted to meet face-to-face with Maliki to offer support and get a better sense of his personality and priorities, Bartlett said. Relations between the Iraqi government and U.S. officials in Iraq had been strained in recent weeks by allegations that Marines in the western city of Haditha killed 24 unarmed civilians, after which the Iraqi prime minister called for more clearly defined rules regarding the use of force by foreign troops.

"Good to see you," said Maliki, who had arrived expecting a videoconference with Bush speaking from Camp David and learned the president was in Baghdad only minutes before he entered the room.

"Thank you for having me," Bush replied, as the two men shook hands and beamed for cameras.

"I appreciate that you recognize the fact that the future of your country is in your hands," Bush said during a second photo session with Maliki, a member of a leading Shiite Muslim religious party who worked for months to build a cabinet that represents each of Iraq's main factions.

During brief and somewhat subdued remarks, the prime minister responded: "God willing, all of the suffering will be over, and all of the soldiers will be able to return to their countries with our gratitude for what they have offered."

Bush said later that "I came away with a very positive impression" of Maliki. "He was a serious-minded fellow who recognized that there had to be progress in order for the Iraqi people to believe the unity government will make a difference in their lives."

An adviser to Maliki, Adnan Ali al-Kadhimi, said Bush's visit "showed that after the killing of Zarqawi, the Americans are not just going to rest, and that he is still in touch with Iraq."

But Sahib al-Amery, a political ally of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who issues frequent calls for the United States to withdraw from Iraq, called Bush "an unwelcome guest."

"He is the president of a country which is occupying our country," Amery said in a telephone interview from the southern city of Najaf.

Later, in a more raucous session with U.S. soldiers just before he departed, Bush received long ovations when he referred to two vanquished adversaries in the ongoing conflict: Hussein, the deposed Iraqi president who is standing trial about a mile from where Bush spoke, and Zarqawi, who was killed last Wednesday by two 500-pound bombs dropped by a U.S. warplane.

"Our military will continue to hunt people like Mr. Zarqawi and bring them to justice," he said, as the crowd cheered wildly for 30 seconds or more and waved hats before him. Hussein, he said, was "a selfish, brutal leader."

"Your sacrifice is noble. Your sacrifice is important," he told the soldiers, adding that he was aware of the strain that their service in Iraq placed on families. "I truly believe the work that you are doing is laying the foundations of peace for generations to come."

The Bush trip, the latest element of an unfolding presidential effort to regain the initiative in Iraq, was timed to the completion of Maliki's government but received a boost with the killing of Zarqawi, the most wanted leader of the insurgency.

Bush administration officials said that high-level discussions at Camp David on Monday and Tuesday dealt with potential initiatives to help the Iraqis develop better security for Baghdad, improve electricity service, rebuild the agricultural sector and solicit more help from Iraq's neighbors. But other than more technical assistance from U.S. Cabinet agencies, officials said they did not anticipate major departures in policy, new funds for reconstruction or troop reductions.

DOJ_NMG_0033681

One general officer briefed on the Camp David sessions said no sign emerged of any shift in basic approach. "There were a lot of things affirmed at the meeting," said the officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk on the subject. "We did not get the impression coming out of there that there were any dramatic changes."

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, who attended the meetings at Camp David, said the group had an extensive discussion about oil and electricity problems, key priorities for the Iraqi government. One idea mentioned by Bush was setting up a fund with some of the country's oil revenue that could be shared with the people, perhaps as the state of Alaska does with its oil revenue, Bodman said.

But Bodman stressed: "The plan has to be the Iraqi plan. . . . The Iraqis are going to be making decisions. It is clear to everybody that the assets represented by the oil . . . are the property of the Iraqi people."

Abramowitz reported from Washington. Staff writers Bradley Graham, Ann Scott Tyson and Charles Babington in Washington and special correspondents Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

A Boost From Mr. Bush (WP)

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH delivered an important demonstration of American support for Iraq's new democratic government in his visit to Baghdad yesterday. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki represents the best and maybe last hope that a national government can stem sectarian bloodshed, defeat Islamic terrorist organizations and die-hard defenders of Saddam Hussein, and make economic recovery possible. He has formed a unity cabinet, appointed a well-qualified defense minister and spelled out the right agenda, including an imminent campaign to pacify Baghdad with tens of thousands of Iraq's newly trained troops. But Mr. Maliki desperately needs international help to turn the tide of violence and chaos. Mr. Bush's appearance, and his assurance that America "will keep its word," should reassure Iraqis who have feared that the United States would precipitously withdraw rather than defend the country's first truly democratic government.

U.S. support, of course, cannot be unqualified, and it certainly cannot ensure success: Mr. Bush rightly told Mr. Maliki that "the future of your country is in your hands." The president spoke of the decisions the Iraqi cabinet must make, which include how to neutralize the militias maintained by several of the coalition's parties and whether and how to revise the constitution so as to share oil revenue fairly and prevent Iraq's breakup into sectarian ministates. If those decisions are wrong, or don't get made in the coming months, there will be little the Bush administration can do to rescue the country or the U.S. mission.

But what Mr. Bush can do is give the government some precious time by continuing to provide American troops and aid to a regime that is nowhere near able to defend itself or rebuild the country on its own. In Baghdad yesterday and in an administration conference at Camp David on Monday, the president didn't talk about any drawdown of U.S. troops, despite long-standing Pentagon plans to cut the U.S. force from 130,000 to as few as 100,000 by the end of this year -- and mounting pressure in Congress to go through with the cut regardless of the consequences.

If Democratic leaders such as Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) had their way, almost all U.S. troops would be out of Iraq by the end of 2006 -- a blow that Mr. Maliki's government almost certainly could not survive. Mr. Bush's willingness -- at least for now -- to resist such politically expedient demands may not rescue Iraq's fledgling political system; it may be that nothing can at this point. But he is -- correctly and courageously -- using what remains of his personal political capital to give Iraqi democracy a chance.

Too Soon To Cheer In Baghdad (NYT)

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

Three years after declaring from the deck of an aircraft carrier that America had accomplished its mission in Iraq, President Bush flew to Baghdad yesterday to make much of two modest pieces of encouraging news — the belated confirmation of the last three members of the Iraqi cabinet and the death of Iraq's top terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

By now, Americans surely know the difference between a presidential publicity stunt and a true turning point in this ever-lengthening war. If they had any question about which one this was, Karl Rove provided some guidance in New Hampshire, where he delivered the campaign talking points to the Republican faithful: the Democrats could never have summoned the will to kill Mr. Zarqawi. For an administration that is supposed to be rallying a nation at war, it was a revealingly nasty, partisan and divisive moment.

It was good to see Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki finally appoint an interior minister, Jawad Kadem al-Bolani. His job is to purge the Iraqi police forces and prison staffs of the Shiite militiamen who have used them as cover for death and torture squads. That would do far more to bring stability to Iraq than the killing of Mr. Zarqawi, who has been replaced as leader of a group that was just one element of the Iraqi insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0033682

But Mr. Bolani's appointment left us apprehensive. It turns out that he was chosen in a last-minute deal between Mr. Maliki and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite party that just happens to operate one of those militias. Perhaps Mr. Bolani will demonstrate the strength, independence and patriotism to do the job. Perhaps, if he doesn't, Mr. Maliki will replace him with someone who will. Washington is hopeful. But we've seen this scene before, and it has usually ended badly.

To increase the drama of Mr. Bush's visit to Iraq, Mr. Maliki announced a large military and police operation around Baghdad, involving tens of thousands of troops, to secure roads, stage raids, seize weapons and enforce a curfew. That may look good on paper, but so did the "Mission Accomplished" banner. There are already 75,000 American and Iraqi troops deployed around Baghdad, and very few of those Iraqis can actually carry out such a mission reliably and effectively.

Beyond that, we have been repeatedly told that the already overstretched American forces will be pulled back from the cities and maybe from Iraq itself later this year. How are Americans supposed to square Mr. Maliki's grandiose announcement with Mr. Bush's message that the United States is preparing to reduce its military role?

Meanwhile, millions of Iraqis go without electricity at least part of the day, thousands of families have had to flee their homes, and Iraqi women have seen their rights to an independent life and livelihood significantly diminished.

After too many photo-ops aimed at giving Mr. Bush and his fellow Republicans a short-term lift in the domestic opinion polls at election time, Americans hunger more than ever for a realistic game plan for Iraq and some real progress.

Bush's Iraq Drop-in Builds Support, But What's Next? (USAT)

USA Today, June 14, 2006

In the three-year history of the Iraq war, the situation is never as good as it appears in its brightest moments nor as dire as it looks in its bleakest ones.

President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad on Tuesday was meant to give fresh momentum to the most upbeat story line — one that strings together major positive moments in a march from the end of tyranny to Iraqi democracy: the fall of Baghdad; the capture of Saddam Hussein; Iraqis voting in large numbers to form a national unity government; and, most recently, the demise of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Bush's visit was part of a public relations offensive designed to shore up both the fledgling Iraq government and sagging support at home for the Iraqi mission. Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, used the occasion to announce an offensive of his own: 75,000 Iraqi and U.S. forces will make a new effort to regain security control in Baghdad. And he echoed Bush's mantra that as Iraqi forces stand up, U.S. forces can stand down. "God willing," Maliki said, "all the suffering will be over, and all the soldiers will be able to return to their country with our gratitude."

Yet the circumstances of the trip itself illustrated that reality is not so simple. Amid extraordinary security, Bush dropped in on Maliki like an uninvited dinner guest and didn't even tell most White House aides ahead of time. Security remains so dicey that Bush was in and out of Baghdad in hours. An insurgency and sectarian violence rage. Deadly bombings produce daily tragedies. The government, supposedly one of national unity, is weak.

The intriguing question is what purpose Bush hoped to achieve. The cynical view would be that the trip was a stunt designed to create an illusion of victory as a prelude for troop withdrawals timed to the congressional elections. The president is under pressure from some in his party to do just that, and it would be a pitiful end to a misguided war.

But Bush has showed no sign of caving in to that pressure. While his original vision of victory is not achievable, there remains a chance to mitigate the damage by leaving behind a relatively stable country that isn't a terrorist training ground or launching pad.

As long as there's a reasonable chance of achieving that goal, the troops should stay as long as needed. And as soon as that chance disappears, they should be brought home promptly, not left to die to save face, as happened during the long Vietnam drawdown.

In the meantime, if Bush's trip helps build support for the mission and the Iraqi government, it's time well spent.

Bush In Baghdad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

President Bush's surprise trip to Baghdad yesterday was long overdue and, at five hours duration, too short. But it was still a trip worth making, if only to show both Americans and Iraqis that the U.S. remains committed to seeing this war through to victory.

DOJ_NMG_0033683

Iraqis can be forgiven if they had begun to doubt American resolve, amid all of the media devoted to falling U.S. public support for the war and to such come-home-America advocates as Senator John Kerry and Congressman Jack Murtha. "I've come to not only look you in the eye," Mr. Bush told new Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it keeps its word."

This message reminds American GIs that they're fighting in a noble cause with support on the home front. It tells the terrorists that they aren't close to the political victory they seek of driving the Coalition out of Iraq. It tells the Iraqi people that they can afford to take a risk and join the police or assist the new government with more confidence that the terrorists won't be able to exact revenge. And it gives the Maliki government more political and military options as it considers how to restore order to Baghdad, among other dangerous places.

No doubt Mr. Bush also had a chance to discuss the security options firsthand with Mr. Maliki, who has been talking up plans to secure Baghdad first. We hope Mr. Bush assured him of whatever U.S. military assets he needs, because this first project of the new government can't afford to fail. The insurgents have been operating dangerously close to the Green Zone, the area in Baghdad in which Americans and most Iraqi government officials live. And the perception of chaos in the capital city has a demoralizing effect on both Iraqis and Americans.

The last week has been the best for Free Iraq in a long time, with the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the completion of the new government, and now Mr. Bush's visit. Let's hope the President returns soon, perhaps along with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, and stays even longer the next time.

Crackdown In Baghdad Set To Begin (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

Baghdad, Iraq — American and Iraqi troops planned to launch a large-scale security sweep in Baghdad this morning after a surprise 5 1/2-hour visit to the Iraqi capital by President Bush on Tuesday.

According to the plan, which Iraqi officials had hinted at for several weeks, tens of thousands of Iraqi and U.S. troops are to flood Baghdad neighborhoods to install checkpoints and enforce a partial weapons ban, a curfew and other security measures.

Only Iraqi security forces and those with a license will be allowed to carry weapons on the street, although Iraqis will still be allowed to own one automatic weapon for their protection as long as it is kept at home, Maj. Gen. Abed Jassem of Iraq's Defense Ministry said at a news conference Tuesday.

The curfew will run from 8:30 p.m. to 6 a.m. for an indefinite period. A midday vehicle ban will be imposed from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The visit by Bush, who met with Iraqi government leaders and American troops in the tightly secured Green Zone, came at what U.S. and Iraqi officials hope is a crucial time.

In recent days, a new democratically elected government has taken shape, and the U.S. military killed Abu Musab Zarqawi, leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

But Baghdad is more violent than at any time since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled the regime of Saddam Hussein. At least 2,155 people died violently in the capital in May, government documents show. The new security plan is designed to stem the escalating shootings, bombings and kidnappings.

The plan was one of the topics discussed when Bush met with Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and his Cabinet at one of Hussein's ornate former palaces, which now serves as part of the U.S. Embassy.

"I've come not only to look you in the eye," Bush told Maliki, "I've also come to tell you that when America gives its word, it will keep its word. It's in our interest that Iraq succeeds."

"We have to defeat all the terrorists," Maliki said after the meeting. "God willing, all the suffering will be over and all the soldiers will return to their countries."

En route back to the U.S., Bush told reporters aboard Air Force One that Iraqi officials had expressed "concern about our commitment and keeping our troops there."

"There's a worry, almost to a person, that we will leave before they are capable of defending themselves," he said. "I assured them they didn't need to worry. I also made it clear that we want to work with their government on a way forward on all fronts."

On Tuesday afternoon, accompanied by his national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, and Joshua Bolten, his chief of staff, Bush touched down at Baghdad's airport after an 11-hour overnight flight from Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington. He then flew by helicopter to the Green Zone.

DOJ_NMG_0033684

The trip offered Bush an opportunity to turn attention in the United States to events that administration officials hail as signs of progress in Iraq: the first steps of a democratically elected government made up of representatives of the country's three main ethnic and sectarian groups.

He clearly relished the chance to see the new government in person, and his senior aides had for some time been preparing to launch the trip as soon as Maliki completed his Cabinet.

Beyond the political considerations, the visit allowed Bush to take his measure of Maliki in person.

The president has made it clear he prefers to deal directly with other leaders, experiencing the give-and-take of unscripted conversation that he says allows him to get to know people.

The visit, Bush's first to Iraq since Thanksgiving 2003, came as at least 37 people were killed in violence in Baghdad and to the west and north of the capital. Iraqi security forces arrested 56 suspected insurgents and killed five others during a 24-hour period ending Tuesday, the Defense Ministry said.

As Bush's trip unfolded, the ministry's Jassem outlined the security plan for Baghdad and surrounding areas. A plan is also being developed for the neighboring province of Diyala, north of Baghdad, where Zarqawi was found and killed, he said.

Concentrating first on "hot spots," security forces will conduct targeted raids, Jassem said.

"If you roam streets after curfew with weapons in your hands, you will be considered a terrorist by the security forces," he said.

All of Iraq's ministries have been involved in preparing the plan, he said, adding that a key goal is the restoration of confidence in the country's security forces.

Many Iraqis, particularly Sunni Arabs, allege that Shiite militias have infiltrated the security forces and are carrying out torture and extrajudicial killings.

In the last year, the nature of the violence in Baghdad has changed. In previous years, Shiites were the predominant victims of bombings and other attacks. This year, Sunnis have disproportionately been the victims.

Without being specific, Jassem said that "part of the plan is to [absorb] the militias within the security forces."

"The new government is serious about reestablishing the people's trust, not only in the army but also in the Ministry of Interior forces," he said.

Maj. Gen. Jawad Dayni, an Iraqi army commander in western Baghdad, said troops would step up patrols and increase the number of checkpoints. "We will arrest any civilian who carries a weapon," he said, adding that the ban applies to militia members as well as neighborhood watch groups.

In an interview this week, U.S. Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said violence between Sunnis and Shiites had eclipsed the insurgency as the biggest problem in the capital.

"And that's what concerns me," he said, adding that sectarian violence is harder to quell. "If it's an insurgency, you can go after the insurgents."

Elsewhere in Iraq, fighting intensified in and around Ramadi as rebels launched mortar rounds and attacked Iraqi military positions. The U.S. military believes many fighters loyal to Zarqawi's group, Al Qaeda in Iraq, are in the vast desert west of Baghdad.

Four Iraqi solders were killed and three were injured in a lengthy gunfight with 15 insurgents who burned several Iraqi army vehicles before fleeing, authorities said. Residents said streets were deserted as American snipers hid on rooftops throughout the city.

U.S.-led troops raided an elementary school north of Ramadi on Monday. The military said in a statement that rebels were using the classrooms to train suicide bombers and teach bomb-making. Troops killed a suspected insurgent and detained 23 others in the raid.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, 14 people were killed and 42 were injured in what appeared to be a series of coordinated bombings.

A car bomber targeted the convoy of a local police chief, killing one bodyguard and injuring the chief and two others. Another suicide attacker struck a political office in the city, killing two and injuring three.

Three other bombs hit local security forces. Police believe the bombings were carried out by a cell of Al Qaeda in Iraq in response to Zarqawi's slaying last week.

"These explosions are expected all over Iraq," said Brig. Gen. Ayad Mohammed Saleh, an Iraqi army spokesman. Iraqi reinforcements have been sent to the city, he said.

Adnan Abdalla, the driver for the police chief in Kirkuk, said he swerved to avoid the approaching suicide attacker.

"But he kept chasing us and trying to detonate," the driver said. When guards opened fire, the attacker set off his explosives.

DOJ_NMG_0033685

Abbas Qadir said his cousin, a yogurt seller, was killed by one of the blasts.

"Where are the Iraqi officials?" Qadir asked with despair. "They said that they killed Zarqawi, but it seems that there are 100 other Zarqawis in Iraq."

PM Announces Sweeping Security Crackdown In Baghdad (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government said it will deploy up to 75,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops in Baghdad today as part of an operation to contain growing violence in the nation's capital.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki vowed to show "no mercy" in dealing with insurgents.

The military operation would be the largest in Baghdad since the U.S. government handed over sovereignty to Iraq in June 2004. The government did not say how long the offensive would last.

The plan "will provide security and confront the terrorism and … enable Iraqis to live in peace in Baghdad," al-Maliki said in a statement released before his meeting with President Bush, who made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Tuesday. The security plan calls for:

•Checkpoints at roads into Baghdad.

•A ban on carrying weapons in public.

•A curfew beginning two hours earlier, to go from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m.

•Raids on suspected insurgent hide-outs.

"The raids during this plan will be very tough … because there will be no mercy toward those who show no mercy to our people," al-Maliki said.

Iraqi army and police plan to wear uniforms to distinguish them from insurgents, who have conducted attacks wearing the uniforms of security forces.

"There will be a special uniform with special badges to be put on the vehicles as a sign that it belongs to our forces," said Maj. Gen. Mahdi al-Gharrawi, an Interior Ministry commander.

The prime minister's office said more details of the plan will be announced by Thursday.

Iraq's capital has grown more dangerous in recent months. "Baghdad is the epicenter of attacks, experiencing 32%" of insurgent assaults in Iraq from February through May, according to a Defense Department report to Congress. About 6 million of Iraq's 26 million people live in the capital. The report said Baghdad province averaged about 28 attacks a day during that time period.

In the past, Iraq's government has conducted similar crackdowns. Operation Lightning in May 2005 involved the deployment of more than 40,000 Iraqi police and soldiers, backed by U.S. troops and air support. Violence continued to spike, however, and many Sunnis complained about heavy-handed tactics of security forces concentrating on their neighborhoods.

U.S. and Iraqi forces are battling insurgents for control of the capital, said Ed O'Connell of the RAND Corp., a think tank based in California. "If you clean up Baghdad, that's the end of the war," he said. "Get Baghdad under control and you've cracked this thing wide open."

A Defense Ministry spokesman, Maj. Gen. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed, said all Iraqi ministries will participate in the security crackdown. "We will concentrate on the volatile districts of Baghdad and intensify the patrols, checkpoints and raids," he said.

As early as today, Iraqi and U.S. forces could face a challenge to their ability to assert control. Anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr was planning a demonstration to protest Bush's visit. "The only one to benefit from this visit is Bush himself and his troops here, not the Iraqi people," said Hassan al-Robaie, a lawmaker loyal to al-Sadr.

Crackdown Announced For Baghdad (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Hasan Shammari

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 13 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's month-old government rolled out its first major initiative against violence on Tuesday, announcing tighter crackdowns in the capital city in an attempt to combat killings and kidnappings.

The plan imposes curfews from roughly dusk to dawn each day and prohibits cars from moving on the streets for four hours during midday on Fridays, when many Muslims attend prayers in mosques. Residents will not be allowed to carry guns outside their homes, and more patrols and checkpoints are planned to raise the visibility of the military.

"People are carrying guns in the streets. How do we know if they are terrorists?" Maj. Gen. Abdul Aziz Muhammed-Jassim, operations director of the general command of the Iraqi forces, said at a news conference at the Defense Ministry on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0033686

In the past week in Iraq, 203 civilians have been killed along with 78 insurgents, according to the Defense Ministry. In Baghdad alone, U.S.-led forces have conducted more than 1,100 patrols and set up 1,200 checkpoints to contain the violence.

Police patrols Tuesday found 16 bodies in Baghdad, evidence of the continuing sectarian violence between Shiites and Sunnis that threatens the viability of the new government, according to Col. Saad Abdul Karim of the Interior Ministry operations room. Four of the bodies, found in the eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Baladiyat, were those of men 30 to 40 years old. Some showed marks of torture and bullet holes in their skulls, Karim said. Police found five others -- handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head and chest -- near the Baghdad Gate north of the capital.

In the northern city of Kirkuk on Tuesday, a series of suicide car bombings that targeted Iraqi police killed 20 people and wounded dozens more.

The new plan, called "Advancing Forward Together," does not involve an increase in troops in the city, according to Maj. Gen. Mahmoud Wailli of the Interior Ministry. But it is intended to be more comprehensive than previous efforts, with economic incentives such as making gasoline easier to obtain and plans for "beautifying" a city full of buildings blasted by bombs and guns, officials said.

More than 61,000 members of the U.S.-led forces and the Iraqi army and national police are based in Baghdad, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a U.S. military spokesman. That number does not include local Iraqi police.

Other military officials have said recently that the current force would likely remain the same until the government begins to function.

Although some news reports trumpeted the security crackdown, it appeared the measures were a tightening and refinement of existing measures. For years, checkpoints and curfews have restricted movement in Baghdad. Many residents have welcomed a greater number of checkpoints lately for the protection they bring against the many armed men roaming the city.

Under the new plan, curfews that started at 11 p.m. or midnight will begin at 8:30 p.m. Residents may still keep as many as two weapons in their homes but cannot take them outside, Iraqi officials said.

Operation To Show Insurgents "No Mercy" (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki yesterday announced the start of a massive security campaign in Baghdad, saying security forces would show "no mercy" in their effort to wipe out insurgent strongholds and defang militias.

Some 75,000 troops -- Iraqi and American -- will carry out the operation code-named "Going Forward Together," said Gen. Abdelaziz Mohammed Jassem, Iraq's combined-forces operations chief. He said the campaign would start "very, very soon," and sources in Baghdad said they expected the crackdown to begin immediately.

Mr. al-Maliki's announcement came as al Qaeda in Iraq's new leader, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, threatened to kill those Sunnis who take part in the political process rather than work with the insurgency, which has killed and maimed thousands of security forces and civilians.

Meanwhile, radical anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a Shi'ite, planned a demonstration today in Baghdad to protest a surprise visit by President Bush to the Iraqi capital.

Violence around the country continued unabated, with 14 persons killed in a series of bombings in the northern oil-rich city of Kirkuk, adding to a death toll of more than 4,000 Iraqis this year alone.

Mr. al-Maliki told reporters that the new security plan "will provide security and confront the terrorism and ... enable Iraqis to live in peace in Baghdad."

"The raids during this plan will be very tough -- because there will be no mercy toward those who show no mercy to our people," he added.

The hours of nightly curfew banning all cars and people from the streets will be extended. Driving will also be banned between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. on Fridays, the Muslim day of worship when mosques are packed.

Reflecting the no-nonsense approach that has characterized Mr. al-Maliki's government, Gen. Jassem warned that the curfew would be strictly enforced and that anyone caught with a weapon would be shot or detained.

"Anybody on the street, in his car or in his shop caught with a weapon, any kind of weapon, will be considered a terrorist and will be treated as a terrorist. He will be killed or captured," the general said.

He said security forces would set up checkpoints on the streets and conduct raids in known insurgent pockets in and around Baghdad. The checkpoints will be manned by combined units of Iraqi police and army and U.S. forces.

DOJ_NMG_0033687

The mixed units are designed to cut down the incidence of false checkpoints and sectarian death squads who often wear Interior Ministry or police uniforms.

"I am optimistic about his coming over here -- you will see a change in the government," he said. "Bush is the solution: He brought them in, so he can take them out," he said of the Shi'ite-led Iraqi government.

Others were less impressed by the American leader's five-hour visit to the heavily guarded Green Zone, which -- with regular electricity and water, gas stations, buses, restaurants, swimming pools and protected villas -- is an alien world to the one in which most Iraqis live.

"What will [Mr. Bush] do for us?" asked Om Mohammed, a 34-year-old Shi'ite housewife. "We need electricity, we need water, we want a less-expensive life. We are tired of the three years they said was democracy. Democracy without electricity and water is not democracy. Our kids are dying every day. Zarqawi is dead, but we will get another 20 Zarqawis."

Al-Muhajer, the apparent successor to the terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, who was killed last week, said in an Internet statement that the horrific bombing and beheading carnage in Iraq was far from over.

"Do not be overtaken with the ecstasy of having killed our sheikh. He has left behind lions that have been trained in his den," the statement threatened.

Zarqawi died a week ago after the building he was hiding in was hit by two 500-pound American bombs. The U.S. military said Monday that a medic had spent about 20 minutes trying to save him even as blood ran from his mouth.

Seeking to dispel claims that Zarqawi was beaten or shot while in U.S. custody, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said an autopsy performed Saturday proved the Jordanian-born militant died of "massive internal injuries," the Associated Press reported.

"A coalition medic treated Zarqawi while he did lapse in and out of consciousness," Gen. Caldwell said at a press conference in Baghdad. "The medic secured his airway, at which point Zarqawi expelled blood." He said the medic "noted the breathing was shallow and labored."

The cause of death was listed as "primary blast injury of the lung," with blast waves from the two bombs causing bruising and bleeding of the organs. Zarqawi suffered multiple bruises, scratches and deep head wounds.

Iraq Mulls Amnesty Offer To Insurgents (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

The Iraqi government is preparing a national reconciliation initiative that could include a conditional amnesty offer and negotiations with some armed insurgent groups to be implemented alongside a tougher security plan.

Senior Iraqi officials on Tuesday said the initiative aimed to capitalise on the elimination of al-Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the completion of the new national unity government that includes leaders from the Sunni Arab community that dominates the insurgency.

It will be combined with massive new security operations. Nuri al-Maliki, the prime minister, is set to launch this week a crackdown in the capital, deploying tens of thousands of troops and imposing a night-time curfew.

A statement from Mr Maliki on Tuesday said “the raids during this plan will be very tough...because there will be no mercy towards those who show no mercy to our people”, according to news agency reports from Baghdad.

Muwaffak al-Rubbaie, Iraq’s national security adviser, said the government would also soon announce a “dynamic and detailed plan” that would lead to the release of detainees and offer a conditional amnesty to insurgents.

The initiative would also review the de-Ba’athification strategy – the controversial weeding out of former Ba’ath party members from the administration – and “welcome those who lay down their arms”, he added, speaking by telephone from Baghdad.

“We believe this is a golden opportunity,” Mr Rubbaie said. “Zarqawi used to spread fear among people, including insurgents, and the political atmosphere now is very suitable for an outreach to the insurgents.”

The government is considering publishing a list of 46 wanted militants and defining them as the only real enemies of Iraqis. “We are identifying our enemy and saying we’re not against any community,” Mr Rubbaie said.

Other Iraqi officials, however, cautioned that the reconciliation strategy was still under discussion and no decision had yet been taken on the main elements.

Opinion within the government appears to be divided over who should benefit from an amnesty, and Mr Maliki has vowed that those who have killed would be brought to justice.

“There has to be some flexibility in an amnesty but the lines are not clearly defined yet,” a senior official said.

DOJ_NMG_0033688

The official said another key challenge was to identify nationalist insurgent leaders ready for dialogue in a diffuse insurgent network where foreign and local extremists are difficult to isolate. The forum for talks with armed groups, however, is likely to be an Arab League-sponsored conference that has just been delayed until the first week in August.

According to Hoshyar Zebari, the foreign minister, the Arab League will give the government suggested names of insurgent leaders who could be invited to the conference.

"We need real people, real representatives," Mr Zebari said.

Jalal Talabani, the Iraqi president, has been calling for negotiations with insurgents and his aides have been in contact with some groups. The pan-Arab daily al-Hayat, however, reported on Tuesday that several groups that had been approached had issued statements rejecting a dialogue.

Dozens Die In Timed Attacks Aimed At Top Kirkuk Officials (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel And Khalid Al-Ansary

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 13 — Insurgents unleashed a volley of bombings across the northern oil city of Kirkuk on Tuesday, killing more than two dozen Iraqis in morning rush hour attacks that were aimed at top police officials and security patrols, authorities there said.

The attacks came after what the local authorities described as the capture and elimination several days ago of a major terrorist cell.

While Kirkuk has been the scene of a number of assassinations and other violence, the six bombings on Tuesday represented an attack of unusual coordination that local security officials suggested might have been retaliation for the arrest of the cell's members or intended as a signal that the insurgency in the city remained strong.

The security officials said the attacks could also have been a response to the killing six days earlier of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of the terrorist group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

Mr. Zarqawi's presumed successor, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, issued a statement through a jihadist Web site on Tuesday pledging to continue attacks against "crusaders and Shiites" and suggesting that insurgents would avenge their leader's death.

The Kirkuk attacks occurred in just over one hour, the local authorities said. By the time they were over the bombers had killed at least 25 people and wounded 46 more, said Dr. Mohammed Abdullah, a physician at one of the city's hospitals. Dozens of people lined up at hospitals to donate blood.

The first bomb appeared to have missed its target, an Iraqi police patrol, shortly after 8 a.m. In the second attack, at 8:30 a.m., a suicide bomber tried to force his way into the home of a police colonel. The bomber killed three policemen and wounded seven others, including the colonel, said Brig. Burhan Tayeb Taha, a Kirkuk police commander.

The brigadier said the deadliest blast, caused by a car bomb at 8:45, killed 18 Iraqis in a crowded public market in Tiseen, a district of Kirkuk that is heavily populated by Turkmen Shiites. A police patrol was the target of that attack, which also left 19 people wounded, the brigadier said. It was not clear how many of the casualties were police officers and how many were civilians.

Ten minutes later, the fourth bombing killed four people, including two policemen. Two more bombs aimed at the police detonated about 9:20 a.m., killing two civilians and wounding 10 others. The police also said they had killed a man as he tried to detonate a car bomb.

In Baghdad, at least nine bodies were found throughout the city, and an engineering professor was also killed. A car bomb and rocket attacks killed at least two other people in the capital.

In his first statement since a posting on a jihadist Web site on Monday identified him as Mr. Zarqawi's replacement, Mr. Muhajir, a shadowy figure whose name was not familiar to Iraqi security officials, asserted that Al Qaeda fighters in Iraq were "more determined, more stable and more powerful than anytime prior," according to a translation by the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups.

Referring to the American-led coalition, Mr. Muhajir wrote that "every day, for three years, they say that the battle is about to end and promise their people that." And he warned the coalition not to rejoice in Mr. Zarqawi's death, saying that the coming days "will turn your children's hair gray, and battles will reveal your false power."

Bush Flies To Iraq To Pledge Support For Premier (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033689

President George W. Bush on Tuesday committed his administration's support to the third Iraqi prime minister in as many years, telling Nuri al-Maliki he had made his surprise overnight flight to Baghdad to look him "in the eye" and pledge that America would keep its word.

Spending five hours in Baghdad, Mr Bush appeared briefly before the media with the Iraqi prime minister and his key ministers, saying they had discussed the security, economic and reconstruction strategy. "And all of it makes sense to me," Mr Bush said, but gave no details. He praised Mr Maliki's selection of a diverse cabinet and the strength of his character.

"I've come not just to look you in the eye, but to tell you that, when America gives its word, it keeps its word," Mr Bush said.

Although Mr Maliki was said to have known about Mr Bush's secret flight only five minutes before they met, White House officials said planning for the trip began a month ago. The timing was dependent on completion of the Iraqi cabinet and not linked to the killing last Wednesday of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Clearly Mr Bush and the Republicans, facing mid-term congressional elections in five months, are hoping to capitalise on a rare patch of good news from Iraq, which has, temporarily at least, displaced reports of alleged massacres of Iraqi civilians by US troops and the worst month of carnage so far for Baghdad.

Mr Maliki told Mr Bush he was committed to a pluralistic government that could bridge Iraq's sectarian divide. He thanked the US for its sacrifices and expressed a hope that US troops could soon withdraw.

"God willing, all of the suffering will be over, and all of the soldiers will be able to return to their countries with our gratitude for what they have offered," he said.

However, controlled leaks to the media recently that the US was aiming to reduce troop levels in Iraq to 100,000 by the end of the year are giving way to suggestions by officials that reductions will be smaller than forecast because of the surge in sectarian violence.

Donald Rumsfeld, defence secretary, said that in coming weeks General George Casey, US commander in Iraq, would discuss with the Iraqi government "at what pace we're going to be able to draw down our forces".

The US would maintain an "appropriate troop level", he said, noting that numbers had increased to a high of 160,000 during the elections and had since returned to 129,000.

Mr Rumsfeld was speaking to reporters after he and Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, gave closed door briefings to the Senate and House on the outcome of two days of policy discussions on Iraq held at Camp David and then taken to Baghdad by Mr Bush.

The issue of troop reductions had not been discussed with senators, Mr Rumsfeld said.

Democrats appeared unimpressed. Senator Jack Reed said he had heard "nothing remarkably new" in the classified briefing. Senator Joseph Biden said he hoped Mr Bush's trip to Baghdad would lead to a "fundamental change in policy" but that he feared the president would rely on more of the same.

Flying out of Iraq on Air Force One, Mr Bush told the small group of reporters allowed to accompany him that he had come away with a "very positive impression" of Mr Maliki as a "serious-minded fellow" not stuck in the past.

Hinting that he was lowering US ambitions, Mr Bush said the objective in Iraq was to create a sense of order so that people were confident in their government, but that he did not believe the government could guarantee "a complete absence of violence". He also indicated that US troops would soon lead a new offensive in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, while Iraqi security forces focused on Baghdad and Basra.

Defense Phase Of Hussein Trial Ends (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 13 (AP) — The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's trial declared an end to the defense phase of the proceedings on Tuesday, shrugging off protests from the former Iraqi leader's lawyers that they have not had a fair chance to present their case and want to put more witnesses on the stand.

The trial, which has lasted nearly eight months, moves into closing arguments, with the prosecution starting on Monday, followed by the defense on July 10. The judges could call a recess as early as mid-July to consider verdicts in the case against Mr. Hussein and seven members of his inner circle who are charged with crimes against humanity.

The eight defendants could face execution by hanging if convicted on charges they were responsible for the torture and executions of men and boys from the Shiite village of Dujail, where guerrillas tried to assassinate Mr. Hussein in 1982.

It is not known how long the judges' deliberations will take. But the declaration by the chief judge, Raouf Abdel-Rahman, suggests that the court was pushing to wrap up what has been a tumultuous trial — with two defense lawyers killed early on, the chief judge replaced halfway through and frequent scenes of shouting.

DOJ_NMG_0033690

Many in Iraq's repressed Shiite majority and Kurdish minority, in particular, are eager to see the former dictator go to the gallows.

But it could take months even if such a verdict and sentence were to be handed down. The defendants have a right to appeal, and Mr. Hussein is due for a second trial in connection with a military campaign against the Kurds in the 1980's.

The defense on Tuesday pressed its protests that it had been at a severe disadvantage throughout the trial. But they were perfunctorily cut off by Mr. Abdel-Rahman.

When one of Mr. Hussein's lawyers, Khamis al-Obeidi, said he wanted to bring more "effective and useful" witnesses to the stand, the chief judge told him: "For your client alone, you've presented 26 witnesses. If after 26 witnesses you can't prove his innocence — according to your words — then 100 witnesses will be the same situation."

Marines To Investigate Internet Video (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

Washington — The U.S. Marine Corps is trying to find out who is behind a video posted on the Internet that appears to show a Marine performing a song that makes light of killing an Iraqi family.

The four-minute video, posted anonymously on the Web site YouTube, shows the singer playing a song he calls "Hadji Girl" in which he tells of falling in love with an Iraqi, only to be fired upon by her father and brother with automatic weapons.

As an unseen audience laughs and cheers, the performer -- dressed in a green T-shirt and what appears to be camouflage pants -- singing about using "her little sister" as a shield against his attackers.

"As the bullets began to fly, the blood sprayed from between her eyes, and then I laughed maniacally," the performer sings. "Then I hid behind the TV and I locked and loaded my M-16; I blew those little (expletives) to eternity."

The singer also mouths Arabic-sounding words, borrowing phrases from the satiric movie "Team America: World Police."

It ends: "They should have known they were (expletive) with the Marines."

In Arabic, the word hajji refers to a Muslim who has made a religious pilgrimage to Mecca, but it is frequently used by U.S. soldiers with various spellings to refer to Iraqis, often pejoratively.

Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, a Marine spokesman, said the service was looking into the video but had yet to open a formal investigation. The video was later removed from the YouTube Web site, and Fazekas said U.S. officials still were not certain Tuesday of the singer's identity -- and whether he is in the military.

"The video that was posted anonymously is clearly inappropriate and contrary to the high standards expected of all Marines," Fazekas said. "The inappropriate actions of a few individuals should not tarnish the reputation of all American military personnel."

The video was brought to the Marines' attention by the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), a Washington-based civil rights group, which said that in light of recent allegations against Iraq-based Marines that include the deaths of 24 civilians in the town of Haditha, the video needs to be investigated.

"We welcome the Marine Corps statement, but we also expect that those who participated in this incident will be identified and disciplined appropriately," said Nihad Awad, CAIR's executive director, who also called on Congress to conduct hearings into the video and other incidents.

For Iraqis, Exodus To Syria And Jordan Continues (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 13 — In one of the first comprehensive tallies of Iraqis fleeing Iraq since the American-led invasion, an American refugee advocacy group has counted 644,500 Iraqi refugees in Syria and Jordan in 2005.

The figure, provided by the United States Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, a nongovernmental group based in Washington, is equal to about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population, and substantiates the overwhelming evidence of an exodus that has been accumulating in Iraqi passport offices and airline waiting rooms in recent months.

It was part of a survey of refugees around the world that was conducted by the committee and was scheduled for release on Wednesday. The number includes Iraqis who have been in Syria and Jordan since the invasion in 2003 but had not previously been counted as refugees, and those who arrived over the course of 2005.

The committee has counted Iraqi refugees in the past, but the most recent figure is by far the largest to date — more than triple the 213,000 recorded in 2004 — and the first big surge since the American invasion. At first, Iraqis living abroad began returning home. But as the war became increasingly deadly, more Iraqis chose to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0033691

In all, as of the end of 2005, 889,000 Iraqis have moved abroad as refugees since 2003, according to the group's tally, more than double the 366,000 counted at the end of 2004.

"It's the biggest new flow of refugees in the world," said Lavinia Limón, the committee's president.

The survey bases its count on figures from the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other sources, including local nongovernmental organizations and embassies. For that reason, the group considers its count more detailed than that of the United Nations, which offered a rough tally of 2.7 million Iraqis, including 1 million who fled under Saddam Hussein and another 1.2 million who left their homes but remained in Iraq.

In Baghdad, evidence of the departures abounds. Faris al-Douri, a travel agency director, said on Tuesday that airline tickets are booked weeks in advance, and that airlines have added flights to Jordan and Syria. Passport offices are packed.

"As if we were giving out cars, not passports," said Maj. Gen. Yassen al-Yassiry, director of passports for the Iraqi government.

The government issued two million passports from July 2004 to the end of 2005, he said. Some of those were for Iraqis taking holidays, but many were for migration. The government does not track the numbers of citizens leaving for abroad.

The roads to Syria and Jordan, the two most common destinations for Iraqis fleeing the war, are fraught with dangers. Monkath Abdul Razzaq, a middle-class Sunni Arab headed to Syria, watched dolefully as thieves plucked $11,000 from a hiding place in his car. Assad Bahjat, a Christian, also reported being held up on the road to Syria, after waiting for a gun battle to cease near the volatile city of Ramadi.

"Wherever we are, we thank God for every day," Mr. Bahjat said in an e-mail message after reaching the heavily Christian town of Sednaia, "because we are alive and not dead."

11,000 Troops Readied For Afghan Offensive (USAT)

USA Today, June 14, 2006

The U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan plans to unleash more than 11,000 troops Thursday in the biggest offensive since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, U.S. operational commander, said Operation Mountain Thrust is a push by U.S., British, Canadian and Afghan troops against Taliban fighters in four volatile provinces: Kandahar, Helmand, Zabul and Uruzgan. Militants have increased attacks against coalition troops in recent months and staged nighttime assaults on government headquarters in small villages.

Israel was not responsible for an explosion Friday that killed eight Palestinians on a Gaza beach, Defense Minister Amir Peretz said. Palestinians blamed the blast on an Israeli artillery shell. The Israeli investigation concluded that a Hamas mine exploded.

“The intention to describe this as an Israeli event is simply not correct,” Peretz said. Maj. Gen. Meir Califi, who headed the army investigation, said Israel's shelling had stopped before the explosion. Israel has been shelling northern Gaza for weeks trying to stop Hamas militants from firing rockets at Israel. Hamas called off a 16-month-old cease-fire after the beach blast.

Authorities released militant cleric Abu Bakar Bashir today, 26 months after he was imprisoned for conspiracy in the 2002 Bali bombings. Scores of Bashir's supporters greeted him jubilantly with shouts of “God is great!” The 68-year-old cleric, who is accused of being a key leader of the al-Qaeda-linked Southeast Asian militant group Jemaah Islamiyah, was convicted for giving his blessing to the nightclub bombings, which killed 202 people, most of them foreign tourists.

“It's hard to imagine how a leader of a gang … can get only two years for orchestrating to kill 200 people and injuring many more,” said Peter Hughes, 46, who suffered burns to 56% of his body in the attack.

Bashir has maintained his innocence.

Egypt will confiscate copies of the novel The Da Vinci Code and ban the film, Culture Minister Farouk Hosni told parliament. “We ban any book that insults any religion,” he said. Parliament was debating the book and film at the request of Coptic Christians who said the material is offensive. “It insults the Christian religion and Islam,” said Georgette Sobhi, a Coptic.

A central part of the fictional plot is that Jesus married Mary Magdalene and that their descendants are alive today. Hafez Abu Saeda of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights called the ban an assault on freedom of expression. “It should be regarded as art.”

New Leader For Marines Is Picked (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration announced the nomination of Lt. Gen. James Conway to take over the Marine Corps at a time when the Corps is dealing with the alleged killing of civilians by American soldiers in Haditha, Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0033692

Gen. Conway, who served as the top Marine commander in Iraq in 2003 and 2004, has worked closely with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld over the past two years. He hasn't shied away from publicly criticizing aspects of how the war has been handled.

In 2004, just before leaving Iraq, he told reporters that he disagreed with two important decisions surrounding the initial Marine Corps assault on Fallujah following the slaying of four U.S. contractors there. He and other Marine officers didn't want to storm the city immediately after the killings. Instead, they favored a more gradual approach in which they built relationships and intelligence in the city and then over time captured or killed those responsible for the slayings.

The Marines were ordered to attack immediately, but as concern built over Iraqi casualties and destruction, they were pressured to withdraw. Once the Marines began the assault, Gen. Conway and others said they believed the Marines should have been allowed to finish it. "We follow our orders. We had our say," Gen. Conway told reporters in 2004.

Gen. Conway eventually will succeed Gen. Michael Hagee, who is slated to step down in January. Marine officials said it wasn't clear whether Gen. Hagee will retire a few months early. The announcement of Gen. Hagee's successor in June comes somewhat earlier than normal.

Veteran Of War In Iraq Named To Oversee Marine Corps (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — Lt. Gen. James T. Conway, a veteran of two tours in Iraq, has been nominated by President Bush to serve as commandant of the Marine Corps as the service is struggling under investigations into the circumstances of civilian deaths in Iraq.

Pentagon and Marine Corps officials said the timing of the announcement on Tuesday was unrelated to investigations that marines might have killed 24 civilians without provocation in Haditha, in restive Anbar Province.

If confirmed by the Senate, General Conway would put on a fourth star and the Marine Corps would put atop its command structure an energetic, combat-tested officer — known for speaking his mind, even in public.

The current commandant, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, is scheduled to retire in January after a standard four-year assignment. Handicapping on his successor was already under way within the Pentagon before news of official inquiries into the Haditha deaths burst into public view over recent weeks.

"There is absolutely no relationship between this nomination and anything associated with ongoing investigations," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

General Conway currently is director of operations for the Joint Staff, and he has a close relationship with Gen. Peter Pace, the first Marine officer to serve as chairman of the Joint Chiefs.

"General Conway is a superb officer," General Pace said Tuesday. "And if you look at his war record in his Marine Expeditionary Force, going into Baghdad early on in the war, you'll see that he knows how to lead marines in combat."

General Pace stressed that the nomination "has no tie to Haditha," and noted that the nomination process was "moving forward well before Haditha came on the horizon."

Officials said that, if confirmed, General Conway could take command by November.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

A Crackdown On 'Perfect' Timing (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Federal regulators plan to crack down on an increasingly popular corporate practice that boosts executive compensation by guaranteeing profits on stock option awards.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is to issue a statement, possibly as early as next month, clarifying the agency's view of when current law allows backdating of stock options -- picking a date when the stock was at a low point to be the date of the award, thereby immediately guaranteeing a profit. Companies need the permission of directors, consistent with company policy, and full disclosure to investors, including properly counting the added costs against earnings.

"We will issue guidance on the backdating of stock options that will more clearly circumscribe the bounds of acceptable conduct," SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in an interview yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0033693

The action stems from a widening federal probe by the SEC and the Justice Department into whether several dozen companies backdated stock options illegally, making them more valuable by changing the date on which they were said to have been issued without telling shareholders and without recording the additional compensation cost as an expense against the bottom line.

More than three dozen companies have said they are being investigated by federal regulators for possible illegal backdating. While the SEC has been investigating backdating abuses for several years and more intensively in the past 12 months, most of the company announcements have been made since March, after the Wall Street Journal began publishing articles that focused public attention on the issue.

Stock options give an executive the right to buy a company's stock at a set price sometime in the future. Options are supposed to be valued on the date they are issued. The idea behind options is to give executives a non-cash incentive to improve the company's performance and, thus, its stock price. The executive would then profit from the difference between the cost of the stock under the option grant and the price at which it is sold after holding it for at least six months, as federal law requires.

Company officials backdate options to maximize an executive's profit. If a person buys 1 million shares for $25 a share and sells them for $30 a share, that executive will pocket $5 million, before transaction costs and taxes. If the executive backdates the option to a day when the stock was valued at a low point, say $20, then the seller will make $10 million profit by selling the shares at $30.

For the past six years or so, as stock options gained in popularity, regulators and the investment community began to notice that a company's stock price often rose after the company awarded executives stock options. That led to concerns that companies might be timing announcements to give stocks a boost after options awards were made.

In 2003, the SEC began to notice another wrinkle in possible improper manipulations of option awards, backdating. The agency brought one case citing backdating, and the head of the agency's enforcement division opened 2004 with a speech warning about a possible trend.

In the past 18 months several academic researchers have found a correlation between stock options being awarded and periods when shares were trading at their lowest point in a given time frame, usually several months but sometimes up to a year.

Under a law Congress adopted after a series of high-profile accounting scandals, beginning with Enron Corp., executives must file statements with the SEC within two days of a buying or selling a company's stock or being awarded options. The law, which took effect in the fall of 2002, shortened the period from 40 days with the intent of giving investors fresher information and preventing situations like those leading to the fall of Enron in 2001, when Enron's then-chairman, Kenneth L. Lay, was promoting the company's stock to investors while he was quietly selling his own shares in the company.

As the potential problem of backdating caught regulators' attention, they anticipated the shorter two-day filing period would make it harder for companies to backdate options and hide what they were doing.

A team of University of Michigan professors recently analyzed 569,000 SEC filings on option grants in the two years after the shorter filing period took effect, from August 2002 to August 2004, and found that 24 percent of such notices were filed late, with 10 percent more than a month late. They found smaller firms tended to be more likely to have a longer filing lag.

The professors said the delays suggest backdating and concluded that the new, shorter filing period has failed to thwart stock-option manipulation. SEC spokesman John Nester disagreed, saying the evidence the agency has seen so far suggests the "vast majority" of backdating occurred before the shorter filing deadline took effect.

Even so, the agency clearly thinks it needs to act soon. The clarifying statement Cox envisions the agency making next month probably will be issued at the same time the agency votes on a final set of new rules requiring companies to disclose more information about executive compensation, including how stock options are awarded, when company policy permits backdating, and what is the added cost of backdating.

Backdating has also caught the eye of powerful members of Congress. "It's one thing for an executive to make big profits because he's improved his company, but it's a whole different thing to make big profits because he's playing fast and loose with the dating of stock options," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) said yesterday, after his committee held a hearing on backdating and other practices that can lead to lost tax revenue for the federal government.

"Outside the corporate suite, Americans don't get to pick and choose their dream stock price," he said. "The market dictates the price. It's bothersome to think that after the corporate scandals of recent years, some executives are still looking for ways to cook the books for personal gain."

Several pension funds are suing companies over the timing of options grants. Cox said that when done improperly, the practice of backdating can erode the very performance incentives that options are is supposed to encourage.

DOJ_NMG_0033694

"What makes the option work as a powerful motivational tool is, that unlike a bonus, it isn't so much a reward for prior performance as it is an incentive for future performance," Cox said in a speech last week. "That's why the undisclosed backdating of options is such a serious potential problem. By giving the recipient of options an undisclosed paper gain right from the start, it cuts the direct connection to future performance. And in the process, what investors might otherwise view as a shareholder-friendly way to align their interests with those of the company's executives becomes instead a more expensive way for the firm to structure its compensation program."

SEC Steps Up Effort To Curb Options Dating In Rule On Executive Pay (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the wake of the widening scandal into the timing of stock options, the Securities and Exchange Commission is ratcheting up plans to address the issue in its proposed rule to revamp disclosure of executive pay.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in an interview that the executive-compensation rule "will almost certainly address options backdating explicitly." He added: "It is altogether possible ... that there will be additional disclosure requirements."

In conjunction with the rule, Mr. Cox said the SEC would issue guidance "saying when it is appropriate or not appropriate for a company to grant options while in possession of material nonpublic information when it comes to 'spring loading,'" a practice that involves granting options ahead of good news.

"I don't want to rule anything out in terms of the final rule and guidance, because they're not finished yet," he said, adding that he expects the process to be completed before the end of the summer.

The SEC and the Department of Justice are investigating several companies for backdating options, or timing them in such a way as to boost their payoff.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill yesterday raised the issue of backdating stock options during a Senate hearing on corporate taxes. "I've asked the Justice Department to let me know whether the tax laws on the books are adequate to rein in and prosecute stock-option backdating," said Sen. Chuck Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up." Mr. Grassley also said he was glad Justice Department officials made it clear "that executives can face possible prison time for backdating stock options."

Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general in the tax division of the Justice Department, said at the hearing that the government is investigating "very serious" issues and "such conduct would be a fraud on the market," and could potentially result in securities, mail-fraud, wire-fraud and tax charges against individuals and corporations.

Also yesterday, an advisory committee to the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board said guidance from the PCAOB on how to deal with options-backdating and related issues would be useful.

The proposed SEC rule already addresses some issues of backdating by requiring companies to disclose in a new table the grant date for options and include supplementary information if the exercise price is less than the market price on the date of the grant. Companies also would be required to discuss the reasoning behind the stock awards. Mr. Cox said that section "will be a very useful place to disclose the reasons for the decision to backdate and the basis for the selection of particular dates."

In a provision of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance act, the SEC shortened the time individuals have to report insider transactions, including stock options, from as many as 40 days to two, potentially reducing the ability to backdate.

Investors are already speaking out. A May 30 letter from the CFA Centre for Financial Market Integrity suggests that the SEC require disclosure of dates on which compensation committees approve share-based awards, disclosure of grant dates for all share-based awards, if different from the approval dates, and that compensation committees disclose whether any effective grant dates were selected to take advantage of pending news.

Earlier this month, the AFL-CIO urged the SEC to issue guidance on how to disclose any backdating issues outstanding.

RSA Security Inc., based in Bedford, Mass., said yesterday that the U.S. attorney in Manhattan issued a subpoena requesting information related to stock options. The maker of Internet-security technology, which previously announced an SEC inquiry about options, said it will cooperate.

Meade Instruments Corp., based in Irvine, Calif., said the SEC is conducting an informal inquiry into its options-granting practices. The maker of consumer telescopes previously announced an investigation by its board after an article in The Wall Street Journal last month, which noted that between 1998 and 2002, founder John Diebel had received six option grants, two of which were at the lowest stock price for the year. Mr. Diebel said at the time that he would be "shocked" if there was any "inappropriate activity," related to options. Meade said it will cooperate with the SEC inquiry.

Macrovision Corp., of Santa Clara, Calif., disclosed an SEC request for information yesterday regarding stock option grants and said it will cooperate.

DOJ_NMG_0033695

Senate Chairman Asks Prosecutors To Act On Options (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Vineeta Anand

Bloomberg, June 14, 2006

June 13 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley said executives who manipulated stock- option grants should be prosecuted, and he's willing push for changes in tax laws to make it happen.

``I've asked the Justice Department to let me know whether the tax laws on the books are adequate to rein in and prosecute stock-option backdating," Grassley, an Iowa Republican, said in a statement today. ``I've asked the Justice Department to let me know. If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up."

Grassley's committee, at a hearing on corporate taxes in Washington today, discussed the widening probe into stock options and the possibility that some companies falsified the grant dates to enrich the executives who received them. The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating at least 38 companies over such grants. Other companies have started internal probes.

At the hearing, Grassley asked Eileen O'Connor, an assistant attorney general at the Justice Department, to detail the actions federal prosecutors are taking. O'Connor said the matter is ``very serious" and the government is looking into the ``highly suspicious award of stock options to executives at a low point of stock value."

Grassley `Troubled'

In his statement, Grassley said he wants the Justice Department and the SEC to take a ``hard look" at options backdating. He said it's ``troubling" that some corporate boards appear to have granted backdated options without seeking approval from shareholders.

``It's one thing for an executive to make big profits because he's improved his company, but it's a whole different thing to make big profits because he's playing fast and loose with the dating of stock options," Grassley said. ``Outside the corporate suite, Americans don't get to pick and choose their dream stock price. The market dictates the price."

Executives found guilty of defrauding investors could be sentenced to jail time and face hundreds of thousands of dollars in criminal penalties, O'Connor said.

``We'll follow the clues where they lead," she added in an interview after the hearing.

Grassley may raise more questions about the investigation at subsequent hearings on taxes, said Jill Gerber, a Senate Finance Committee spokeswoman.

Accounting Board

Separately, the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board discussed whether to issue guidelines to corporate auditors on how to detect manipulation of stock-option grants at a meeting in Washington today.

``It's clearly on the table," said Damon Silvers, associate general counsel at the AFL-CIO labor union in Washington, and a member of the board's advisory group, who attended the meeting.

``Nobody committed to doing anything, but the whole point of the discussion was that that was where they were heading," Silvers said.

The accounting board was set up to supervise auditors by the Sarbanes-Oxley accounting and corporate governance law.

Probe Into US Stock Option Claims Grows (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

The Department of Justice on Tuesday said it considered allegations that dozens of US companies might have improperly backdated stock options “very serious”, as another company said it was under investigation.

More than 40 companies, mostly in the technology sector, are the subject of probes by the US attorneys or the Securities and Exchange Commission – or both – after it emerged that stock options were retroactively awarded to executives to dates that immediately preceded a rise in the company’s share price.

Investigations are understood to be focused on whether the backdating of stock options was done without proper disclosure to shareholders, and whether or not they were properly “expensed” for tax purposes.

“The department considers allegations of this nature to be very serious,” Eileen O’Connor, assistant attorney-general at the department’s tax division, told a Senate finance committee hearing.

Ms O’Connor said criminal penalties applicable included 25 years in jail and a $250,000 fine for securities fraud.

Senator Chuck Grassley, the committee’s chairman, said: “I’ve asked the justice department to let me know whether the tax laws on the books are adequate to rein in and prosecute stock option backdating. If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up.”

DOJ_NMG_0033696

On Tuesday RSA Security, a Massachusetts-based online security company, became the 20th company to be subject to a justice department probe. It said the US attorney for the southern district of New York had subpoenaed it, requesting records from 1996 to the present related to its granting of stock options. Shareholder anger that executives may have fraudulently enriched themselves has spilled over into lawsuits.

Two large US public pension funds on Monday filed suit against McAfee, an internet security company, and Juniper Networks, another technology company. The lawsuits are a sign that broader questions are being asked about the state of executive compensation Stock options have long been viewed as effective tools with which to give executives incentives to perform. But any proof that executives used backdating fraudulently to enrich themselves would puncture that notion, corporate governance experts and lawyers say.

Mr Grassley said: "It's one thing for an executive to make big profits because he's improved his company, but it's a whole different thing to make big profits because he's playing fast and loose with the dating of stock options."

Grassley: Deal With Backdating (MRKTWTCH)

By William L. Watts, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The Senate's top tax writer urged federal authorities Tuesday to closely investigate allegations that publicly traded companies "backdated" options grants to top executives, and to let lawmakers know if existing laws are strong enough to punish the practice.

"If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said after a hearing on corporate-tax policy.

In the hearing, Eileen J. O'Connor, the assistant U.S. attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's tax division, said that the department is investigating allegations in "several districts around the country" that some option grants were backdated to provide executives lower exercise prices. O'Connor didn't discuss any individual investigations.

Authorities also are looking into whether other potentially illegal practices were used to price the options at a low-dollar amount, such as awarding options based on "inside" information about a pending event that would subsequently send the stock price higher, she added.

"Such conduct would be a fraud on the market; it would boost executives' compensation at the expense of other investors," O'Connor told the committee.

If the probes reveal criminal behavior, prosecutors could bring charges including securities fraud, mail fraud, wire fraud and various tax-related charges against individuals and corporations, she said. Such charges carry the potential for prison time and hefty fines.

Questions about the timing of executive options have surfaced regarding several companies. On Tuesday, RSA Security Inc. said it received a document subpoena from the U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York regarding stock option grants from 1996 to the present. The Bedford, Mass.-based software company said it plans to fully cooperate with the federal prosecutor in the matter.

A recent statistical study by The Wall Street Journal found a number of companies with highly improbable patterns of options grants, similar to those of some companies already under scrutiny by federal authorities.

"I was glad Justice officials made it clear today in response to my questions that executives can face possible prison time for backdating stock options. I expect the Justice Department to fully enforce the law in all of these areas," Grassley said.

Pension Funds Sue Companies, Cite Backdated Stock Options (USAT)

By From Wire Reports

USA Today, June 14, 2006

Pension funds in the USA, Europe and Australia have begun suing dozens of companies under investigation in the widening scandal over illegally backdated stock options.

Darren Robbins, an attorney at the Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins law firm in San Diego, told the Associated Press that the pension funds are "completely beside themselves and outraged over the self-dealing that has gone on."

In one lawsuit, security software maker McAfee was sued by the Heavy & General Laborers' Pension and Annuity Funds, and technology firm Juniper Networks was sued by the Employer-Teamsters Pension Health and Welfare Funds, according to the Financial Times.

DOJ_NMG_0033697

The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission are looking at about 40 U.S. companies for suspected illegal backdating of stock options, according to the companies' SEC filings and media reports.

In recent days, computer chipmaker Broadcom, online job-listing firm Monster Worldwide, networking chipmaker Applied Micro Circuits and other companies have said they're under investigation.

Meanwhile, Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who heads the Senate Finance Committee, issued a statement that he has asked the Justice Department whether the laws are strong enough to prosecute stock-option backdating.

"If the tax laws are inadequate, I want to beef them up," he said.

The Council of Institutional Investors, which represents U.S. pension funds with $3 trillion in assets, is sending letters this week to 1,500 U.S. companies, asking them to disclose to shareholders if the companies are under investigation in the stock-option controversy.

Federal investigators appear to be looking at whether companies and executives manipulated their stock-option grants by "backdating" them to make the stock awards more lucrative.

Stock options are issued to executives at a current market price, then cashed out on a later date at a higher "strike price." If a company has done well and its stock price has risen, the options then reward executives for enhancing shareholder value.

Some companies are suspected of backdating the grants to days when the companies' stock prices were low, and right before a big spike in share prices.

Backdating of options could be illegal if companies did not disclose that to shareholders or failed to account correctly for it, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said last week.

Some Enron Broadband Jurors Say They Felt Pressured To Convict (AP)

By Juan Lozano, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 14, 2006

Defendants seeking new trial.

HOUSTON — Lawyers for a former Enron Corp. broadband executive found guilty last month on fraud and conspiracy charges have asked for a new trial after several jurors said they felt pressured to convict.

Affidavits by two jurors and two alternate jurors were part of a 90-page motion by attorneys for former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, who was convicted on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records. The same jury acquitted former in-house accountant Michael Krautz of the same charges.

In their affidavits, the jurors said they felt that they had been instructed by U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore and pressured by other jurors to reach a unanimous verdict and avoid a hung jury, even though they believed that Howard was innocent.

A trial last year against Howard, Krautz and three other broadband executives ended with a hung jury. Howard and Krautz were the first to be retried.

"There was just so much pressure to change my vote that I felt like we had to compromise and give in to the majority because I felt like there was no other choice," juror Anne Marie Campbell said in her affidavit.

Campbell said that at one point, a male juror who had voted for conviction "even tried to grab the shoulders" of a female juror who had voted not guilty and "banged his fist on the table during deliberations."

Juror Cheryl Oswalt said one juror "insinuated during deliberations that they had changed their votes for Krautz, so maybe we might consider changing our votes for Howard."

"This does go beyond the normal give-and-take process that all juries go through in reaching a decision," Jim Lavine, one of Howard's attorneys, said Tuesday. Jurors "have to confine deliberations to what happened in the courtroom. We think they went beyond that because of the influence of Enron in Houston."

Jaclyn Lesch, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said she could not comment on the motion.

Howard and Krautz were accused of participating in a small piece of the fraud that brought down Enron in 2001.

Prosecutors said they took part in a scheme to manufacture earnings for Enron's flailing broadband unit in late 2000.

Dubbed Project Braveheart, the deal involved selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that disintegrated a few months later.

2 Utilities To Pay Enron $50 Million In Settlement (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033698

Two small utilities are set to pay more than $50 million to Enron for electricity that they agreed to buy but that Enron will never deliver, under terms of a settlement that raises larger issues.

As part of the settlement, which may be approved as early as today, the staff of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission will not investigate fraud claims against Enron for manipulating electricity prices, critics say. They added that the settlement might allow the destruction of evidence crucial to proving that Enron cheated customers and would prevent others from resolving their fraud claims.

Brian Lee, a commission spokesman, said the criticisms were ill-informed and baseless. He said the settlement did not prevent the handful of utilities and customers who had to yet to resolve their fraud claims to continue pursuing their complaints before the commission.

Enron, which is in bankruptcy proceedings, made $1.6 billion in profits from what the commission's staff has testified was "unjust and unreasonable" pricing. The commission ruled earlier that Enron could be forced to give up all its profits since 1997 because of its manipulations.

Enron said that under terms of its contracts with the two utilities, it was owed more than $170 million whether or not the power was delivered. The utilities said that they did not owe anything but decided to pay the smaller amount to remove a big financial risk from their books.

Critics noted that the commission chairman, Joseph T. Kelliher, had said that on his watch any firm that extracted profit through market manipulations would be forced to disgorge all profits.

Mr. Lee said that policy was still in force, but said the settlement with the two utilities involved a contractual dispute about termination fees, not profits. What critics are arguing, he said, "is the termination fee is an unjust profit and that is something the commission has not weighed."

Representative Jay Inslee, a Washington Democrat, said that the settlement was "the equivalent of Bonnie and Clyde, having been arrested, demanding that the banks refund the money they stole and the government making the banks give them the money."

He said that since Enron had never delivered the power it should not be entitled to collect fees that were due when a contract was terminated. Enron is seeking $116 million, plus interest, for power it never delivered to the 600,000 customers of the Snohomish Public Utility District in Washington, which is not a party to the settlement.

Senator Maria Cantwell, a Washington Democrat, said the commission "has abdicated its responsibility" to protect consumers and taken the side of Enron and its creditors, "instead of looking out for the public interest."

The settlement also drew complaints from a cement company that has been billed $4.2 million for electricity that Enron will never deliver to its Montana kiln operation. Jack Ross, senior vice president and general counsel for the Ash Grove Cement Company, said he was at a loss to understand why the commission staff agreed to the settlement.

"We thought FERC would be an advocate for the consumer and we are an energy consumer," Mr. Ross said. "We felt the staff decision was more aligning itself on the Enron side and we were very surprised that they were so cozy on the Enron side."

The settlement would apply directly to the commission staff, Enron and two electric utilities. Silicon Valley Power, part of the city of Santa Clara, Calif., would pay Enron $36.5 million for power it agreed to buy, but that Enron never delivered. Valley Electric Association, a cooperative which serves the rural desert region west of Las Vegas, would pay $14 million. Both would get some money back from the Enron bankruptcy proceedings.

Neither accused Enron of price gouging. Enron sought $147 million from Silicon Valley Power and more than $20 million from Valley Electric in contract termination fees.

The critics said the settlement would make it hard for the cement company and several public power agencies to fight Enron's efforts to collect more than $130 million for power that would never be delivered.

They pointed to Paragraph 12 of the proposed settlement:

"Staff agrees as of the settlement effective date to release the Enron Parties from all existing and future claims under any legal theory or cause of action that: (1) Enron charged, collected, or paid unlawful rates, terms or conditions for electric energy, ancillary services, or transmission congestion or natural gas in the western markets; (2) Enron manipulated the western electricity or natural gas or associated markets in any fashion, or otherwise violated any applicable tariff, regulation, law, rule, or order relating to the western markets; (3) Enron was unjustly enriched."

White House Weighs Move To Rein In Fannie And Freddie (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033699

The Bush administration, seeking to ratchet up pressure on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and propel legislation stalled on Capitol Hill, threatened to tighten control over the mortgage giants on its own and to ponder using its authority to limit their growth.

In a move seen as a warning that the administration may act on its own if Congress doesn't, the Treasury said it will review the process it uses to approve requests by the mortgage companies to issue debt. The administration is pressing Congress to alter the law to limit the size of the portfolios of mortgages and mortgage-backed securities that the two stockholder-owned, government-chartered companies hold.

At the same time, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Alphonso Jackson said that until Congress tightens regulation of the companies, he intends to use existing powers to "increase the transparency" of the companies to make sure their investments are in line with their mission of supporting the housing market.

Treasury has the legal authority to shrink the portfolios of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac by rejecting their requests to issue debt, a power it hasn't used previously. Randal Quarles, undersecretary of Treasury for domestic finance, said accounting and corporate-governance problems at the two entities dictate that Treasury examine how it approves debt-issuance requests so it can determine whether to exercise that authority.

"There are a lot of new facts that have come to light and that we've had further chance to consider," Mr. Quarles said in an interview. Treasury needs to determine whether it is "looking at everything that's important" in its debt approval process, he said.

Mr. Quarles is interested in using Treasury's authority, according to people familiar with the administration's thinking.

Mr. Quarles, who announced Treasury's review in a speech, said in the subsequent interview that no decision had been made about limiting the companies' debt issuance. But at their current size, he said, the "outsized portfolios" of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac "create risk in the financial system." The administration has long maintained that the companies' holdings, currently totaling around $1.5 trillion, are so big that any missteps in their risk management could detonate a financial panic.

The companies say they manage risks prudently, use the portfolios to assure a steady supply of fixed-rate mortgages to Americans and need the profits they make from borrowing at favorable rates (because the market assumes the government essentially guarantees the debt) and investing in mortgages to finance the affordable-housing programs that Congress has mandated. Some members of Congress fret that tighter constraints on Fannie and Freddie could upset the housing market.

Fannie's chief spokesman, Chuck Greener, said: "We will work with Treasury and HUD and cooperate with the reviews." David Palombi, chief spokesman for Freddie, also said his company would cooperate, though he added that forcing Fannie and Freddie to slash their portfolios wouldn't reduce risks but just shift them to banks or other investors. For the past three years, Congress has been debating legislation to create a more powerful regulator for Fannie and Freddie. Last year, the House passed such a bill, which the administration says is too weak. The Senate Banking Committee approved a separate bill. The legislation has bogged down in the Senate amid debate over a provision -- strongly backed by the administration -- that would put tight limits on the companies' mortgage holdings.

The provision likely would force the companies to cut their mortgage holdings and focus on providing guarantees on mortgage-backed securities held by other investors. That would leave Fannie and Freddie much smaller, cutting off their biggest source of profits. Strict Treasury limits on their borrowing could lead to the same result without legislation, though that could lead to a backlash from Congress, which might seek to take away the Treasury's control of their debt issuance.

The administration moves drew fire from some Fannie and Freddie supporters. "This is a legal, dubious, backdoor way for the Treasury Department to accomplish something they could not accomplish legislatively," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D., N.Y.), a member of the banking committee.

Pressure On Fannie, Freddie Increases (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday increased the pressure on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to curtail their growth, announcing Cabinet-level studies of the companies' holdings and whether they can be reined in using existing law and regulatory powers.

Legislation to slow the companies' growth and narrow their activities began moving through Congress last year in response to multibillion-dollar accounting scandals, but it is stalled in the Senate.

Yesterday, Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson said his agency would study whether billions of dollars in assets and liabilities are being held by the two companies in violation of their government charters.

Meanwhile, Treasury Undersecretary Randal K. Quarles said his agency was examining whether it had the authority to limit Fannie and Freddie's ability to sell debt and, by extension, their ability to grow.

DOJ_NMG_0033700

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac help replenish the supply of mortgage money by buying home loans from banks and other lenders. They issue debt to raise the money to buy those mortgages.

"The time is right for Treasury to review its debt approval process to ensure that we continue to act as appropriate custodians of the power that Congress gave us when the charters of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were created," Quarles told a gathering of Women in Housing & Finance yesterday.

Announcement of the two studies follows Fannie's agreement to pay $400 million in fines to settle charges that its executives manipulated earnings to trigger higher bonus payments. Critics have long argued that Fannie and Freddie are too big and have used the unfolding accounting scandals to bolster their case.

The HUD review will look at holdings Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac label as "other assets/other liabilities," including some non-mortgage assets, to see if they comply with the companies' government charter.

In Freddie Mac's 2004 annual report, "other assets" included investments in low-income housing tax credits, real estate and equipment. "Other liabilities" included money owed to holders of its mortgage-backed securities.

HUD was "not certain" of the total dollar value of the investments under review because Fannie Mae has not issued accurate financial statements "for some time," agency spokesman Lemar C. Wooley said in an e-mail.

The agency is developing its plans for the review, Wooley said, and "at this early point in the process, HUD does not know how long the process will take."

Both companies said they would cooperate with HUD and Treasury.

The Treasury and HUD actions come as legislation to tighten oversight of the two companies remains bogged down in the Senate. Lawmakers have not been able to agree on whether to force the companies to shrink their investment portfolios, which played a major role in the accounting problems.

The White House backs legislation that would curtail the companies' growth.

Last week, Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.) said he was confident that this summer the Senate would take up legislation to strengthen regulation of the companies.

The administration resumed calls to clamp down on the companies after their chief regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, issued a report detailing accounting violations and linking them to bonuses for top Fannie Mae executives.

The day the report was issued, Fannie Mae agreed to increase the amount of capital it keeps on hand and to temporarily cap its investment portfolio at $727 billion. OFHEO director James B. Lockhart III and Freddie Mac chief executive Richard F. Syron have also had preliminary talks about OFHEO imposing a similar cap on Freddie Mac.

Shelby has invited Lockhart, Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd, and former Fannie Mae chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines to testify Thursday before his committee on OFHEO's findings.

Raines was ousted in December 2004.

U.S. Government Starting Special Reviews Of Mortgage Giants (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 14, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The U.S. administration is starting special reviews of the financial operations of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

The two government-sponsored companies, both of which have been roiled by accounting scandals in recent years, already have been under pressure from lawmakers and regulators who want their combined multitrillion-dollar mortgage holdings to be reduced. The administration has long been critical of the two companies, and officials have pointed to the accounting scandals to bolster their case that the massive mortgage portfolios are improperly managed and pose a risk to the financial system.

On Tuesday, two officials - Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson and Randal Quarles, Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance - disclosed the new reviews by their departments in separate appearances before groups in Washington.

Quarles said he had directed Treasury staff to review the department's process for approving the massive mortgage-related debt issued by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

Some Treasury officials have taken the view in recent years that the department has the authority to limit that debt.

The two companies were created by Congress to pump money into the home-mortgage market by buying home loans from banks and other lenders and bundling them into securities for sale on Wall Street. They have grown dynamically in recent years and now finance or guarantee some $4 trillion (â‚¬3.18 trillion) of home mortgages, representing about one-half of the single-family mortgages in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0033701

HUD has oversight authority for the two companies' fulfillment of their mission of making housing affordable and the power to review new areas of business that they wish to enter. Jackson told a congressional gathering that the department also will begin to review their investments and holdings and some financial transactions that have raised concern on the part of regulators.

The chief regulator of the two companies said last week that the government will pursue some Fannie Mae executives to recover bonus money they reaped in an accounting scheme - if Fannie Mae itself fails to do so.

The regulator, James B. Lockhart, is acting director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. The agency last month issued a blistering report alleging a six-year accounting fraud at Fannie Mae, the second-largest U.S. financial institution after Citigroup Inc.

The report said Fannie Mae employees manipulated accounting to hit company quarterly earnings targets so senior executives could pocket hundreds of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004. The company - whose accounting errors are estimated at some $11 billion (â,¬8.7 billion) - was fined $400 million (â,¬318 million) in a settlement with OFHEO and the Securities and Exchange Commission, one of the largest civil penalties ever in an accounting fraud case. Fannie Mae also agreed to temporarily cap its mortgage holdings at $727 billion (â,¬578.3 billion).

--

On the Net:

Fannie Mae: http://www.fanniemae.com

Freddie Mac: http://freddiemac.com

Treasury Department: http://www.ustreas.gov

Department of Housing and Urban Development: http://www.hud.gov

Memo To Fannie (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

A joke in Washington these days goes like this: "What's the difference between Enron and Fannie Mae? Answer: The guys at Enron have been convicted."

If you're a taxpayer on the hook if Fannie Mae goes belly up, you may not think that's funny. But it does mean you should be pleased by two signs yesterday that the Bush Administration is still taking the scandals at the government-created finance titan seriously. The actions are aimed at cleaning up its risky financing, especially the $1.5 trillion portfolio of mortgage-backed securities (MBSs) that Fannie and its sibling Freddie Mac have accumulated and which pose a risk to the larger financial system.

Undersecretary Randal Quarles announced that Treasury was reviewing its procedures for approving new Fannie and Freddie debt, much of which goes to buy MBSs. While Mr. Quarles said a review didn't presuppose any outcome, his message was unmistakable. Treasury believes it has the power to limit what Fannie and Freddie can borrow, and if necessary will do so.

Mr. Quarles said the Administration would prefer that Congress act to give a new regulatory body that power instead. But Fannie and Freddie and their political allies -- the homebuilders especially -- have been lobbying furiously to stop such reform legislation. So Treasury is telling the mortgage giants that even if they keep blocking reform, the Administration can achieve the same results administratively.

Also yesterday, the Department of Housing and Urban Development said it will begin an audit of the non-mortgage securities that Fannie and Freddie hold in their portfolios. Those securities, such as stocks and some of their debt, would seem to have a tenuous relationship to the companies' legislative charter of supporting affordable housing, and so this review is also well-justified.

Both actions ought to send a message to Congress, which has been acting as if it wants the entire subject to go away. In the Senate, the question is why the Republican leadership has not heeded the very damaging report on Fannie from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight to force a vote on Banking Chairman Richard Shelby's strong reform bill. Ofheo revealed that Fannie's top executives enriched themselves over a period of years through dubious accounting. Do Senators support reform of a corrupted and dangerous institution whose finances remain a black box even today, or are they for the status quo?

For their part, Fannie, Freddie and their Beltway friends clearly want to stop any Congressional action before the November election, hoping that Democrats will capture either the House or Senate and then let them off the hook. But yesterday's decisions ought to alert the two companies that the Bush Administration still has two more years to run. Fannie's stock took another nearly 1% hit yesterday, to $47.44, on the Treasury and HUD news, which shows the price that the company's shareholders are paying because its executives continue to block any meaningful reform.

S.E.C. Opens Fund Rules For Comment (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

DOJ_NMG_0033702

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is inviting public comment on the cost of mutual fund governance rules set aside by a federal court in April, a move that leaves open the possibility of reviving or revising them.

The agency will accept comment until Aug. 21 on the cost issue and on "any issue related to the underlying purpose" of the rules, the S.E.C. said in a statement yesterday.

The rules would require that the chairman and three-quarters of the directors of mutual funds be independent from management. They were adopted on a 3-2 vote under William H. Donaldson, the agency's former chairman.

The United States Chamber of Commerce successfully challenged the requirements in a lawsuit. On April 7, a federal appeals court said the S.E.C. had not followed its own procedures in adopting the rules. The court gave the agency 90 days to correct its process.

The five-member commission voted unanimously to solicit the new round of comment, the S.E.C. said in yesterday's statement. Commissioners are split on whether ultimately to kill the rule or keep it.

"I have every confidence that the process we are announcing today will result in mutual fund governance that both protects investors and promotes their interests," Christopher Cox, the current S.E.C. chairman, said in the statement.

In a status report filed with the appeals court, the S.E.C. said it would rely on the public comments to decide whether to pass rules "identical to, similar to or different than" the ones struck down on April 7.

Stephen A. Bokat, the chamber's general counsel, said the S.E.C. should consider passing a rule that requires mutual funds to disclose in prospectuses how many independent directors they have and whether they are led by an independent chairman.

New Chief For Accounting-Oversight Board Is Near (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is close to naming a new chairman for the body that regulates accounting firms and has settled on a shortlist of three candidates for that post, according to people familiar with the matter.

The appointment of a new chairman for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, or PCAOB, would end a regulatory uncertainty that has hung over the accounting world since the agency's first chairman, William McDonough, stepped down late last year. It also would mark one of the most significant appointments to be made by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox since he took over last year as head of the securities-market regulator.

The SEC appoints PCAOB members but does so in consultation with the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve, and the shortlist of candidates reflects this relationship, the people familiar with the matter said.

The candidates for the PCAOB post include William Gradison, 77 years old, who has served as acting chairman since last December. A former nine-term Republican congressman from Ohio, Mr. Gradison has indicated an interest in taking the post permanently, according to people familiar with the matter. If he doesn't get the nod, Mr. Gradison would continue serving as a board member. The chairman's position pays $615,000 a year, according to the PCAOB, while board members make $500,000.

Another contender is Jerome H. Powell, 53, a former Treasury Department official who served as assistant secretary for domestic finance and undersecretary for finance in the administration of the first President Bush. Until last year, Mr. Powell was also an executive with private-equity firm The Carlyle Group.

The third candidate is Mark W. Olson, 63, a Federal Reserve Board governor and former Ernst & Young LLP partner who has also served as staff director of a Senate subcommittee overseeing the SEC, accounting issues and the insurance industry.

The three candidates for the chairman job have all interviewed for the position, according to the people familiar with the matter. Messrs. Gradison and Powell didn't return calls seeking comment. A Federal Reserve spokesman declined to comment on whether Mr. Olson had interviewed for the position.

While looking to fill the chairman's spot, Mr. Cox and the commission also are weighing candidates for a second open spot on the five-member board. The seat currently is held by Kayla J. Gillan, former general counsel to California's public-employee pension plan.

Ms. Gillan's term expired last fall, but she remains on the job and may be renominated, according to the people familiar the matter. Steven Harris, minority staff director on the Senate Banking Committee under Senator Paul Sarbanes, the committee's ranking Democrat, who is retiring at the end of this year, is also under consideration for this board seat, according to people familiar with the matter. Ms. Gillan declined to comment. Mr. Harris didn't return a call seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0033703

The PCAOB was created by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in the wake of corporate scandals such as Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc, ending decades of self-regulation by the accounting profession. Mr. McDonough, a former New York Federal Reserve Bank president, helped create the agency and lead it through its first inspections of accounting firms.

Although generally supported by big accounting firms, the board has come under attack by groups looking to roll back parts, or all, of Sarbanes-Oxley.

Following a speech last week, Chairman Cox said he expected to appoint a new PCAOB chairman in coming weeks but declined to elaborate. A spokesman for the SEC declined to comment. A spokesman for the PCAOB said such an appointment is an SEC decision and that it "wouldn't be appropriate for us to comment."

Taking An Audit Of Regulatory Cooperation (WSJ)

By Neil Lerner

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

The last few weeks have provided clear reminders, if any were needed, that prosecutors are keen to crack down on corporate fraud. We have seen Jeff Skilling and Ken Lay convicted of multiple charges related to the Enron collapse and likely to face long jail terms. We have also seen Daewoo motor company founder Kim Woo-Choong sentenced to 10 years in prison for embezzlement and accounting fraud.

Part of this scrutiny of business has landed on auditors. Clearly the work of auditors is a critical safeguard against corporate fraud. Consequently, the oversight and inspection of their work must be effective, too. However, getting effective, practical regulation in place has proved to be a tall order for government. And this problem is compounded by the fact that auditors -- and the companies they work with -- operate around the globe these days. The stakes are high, as we saw when Enron's outside auditing firm, Arthur Andersen, went out of business under the weight of prosecution.

Legislators have been busy on this front, too. The U.K. government is proposing a new offense for auditors if they "knowingly or recklessly" sign off misleading, false or deceptive information. The U.S. Congress responded to Enron by passing the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires CEOs and CFOs to attest to the accuracy of their financial statements and to the quality of their internal controls, backed up by similar attestations from their independent auditors. In the European Union, there has also been a concerted effort to raise audit standards in order to ensure that financial manipulation by executives will become easier to detect. Just last week, Brussels officially published the Eighth Company Law Directive, which aims to ensure a consistent standard of auditing across the bloc.

It would be a pity if the effectiveness of these efforts to improve corporate governance and the integrity of financial reporting was undermined by a spaghetti junction of overlapping regimes for monitoring the work of auditors. But that is what we are in danger of seeing when it comes to oversight of auditors working for the myriad companies that are listed in more than one jurisdiction.

The auditing profession needs a regulatory system that keeps pace with the continuing evolution of the global capital markets, where companies routinely operate beyond their own national or continental borders. Otherwise, the work of an auditor of a Hong Kong company that is listed on the New York and London stock exchanges, for example, could be subject to review by three separate regulatory bodies. There is also the possibility that, if any fault was found on the part of the audit firm, an investigation by three separate oversight bodies could lead to double or even triple jeopardy.

This is not just an issue for audit firms. The extra costs that would arise from such duplication of regulation invariably would be passed on to corporations in the form of higher audit fees. It is therefore in everyone's interests to find a workable solution.

To ensure effective coordination of public oversight of audit firms within the EU, the European Commission has set up the European Group of Auditors' Oversight Bodies. This group will provide technical advice for the implementation of the Eighth Directive, as well as assessments of third countries' oversight systems.

Yet this action does not go far enough. What is really needed is the cooperation of all major audit oversight bodies around the world so that home regulators can work to one agreed set of standards for oversight, inspection and investigation and firms will be confident that compliance with standards in one major jurisdiction will ensure compliance elsewhere.

We therefore strongly support the International Roundtable of Independent Audit Regulators -- an informal group of the major oversight bodies which met recently in Sydney. The group, which included oversight bodies from the U.K., Canada, Australia, Germany and other countries around the world, discussed ways to harmonize oversight and inspection approaches. It is a pity that not all major regulators were able to attend this meeting, since their involvement in these discussions is critical for a truly global solution.

DOJ_NMG_0033704

Without greater cooperation, home-country oversight bodies will not be able to rely on their international counterparts. This will lead to a significant workload and expense for regulators, including traveling the world to review audit firms working in their jurisdictions and overcoming many language issues in the process.

Furthermore, audit firms will be subject to multiple inspections from different oversight bodies with varying standards. This will result in significant duplication of effort and a great deal of wasted time for employees, all at a significant cost that probably will be passed on to clients.

The challenge is to produce a regulatory system that is rigorous and effective but which allows business to get on with its job and produce results. We have seen this challenge before with Sarbanes-Oxley and other regulation. And as the world's borders continue to blur and commerce becomes ever more global, we no doubt will see it again.

Mr. Lerner is global head of regulatory issues for KPMG LLP.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case, Lawyer Says (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove will not be indicted in the CIA leak investigation, his attorney announced yesterday, a decision that signals that a special prosecutor's probe is unlikely to threaten any other Bush administration officials.

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald told Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, in a short letter delivered Monday afternoon that he "does not anticipate seeking charges" against Rove in the case, Luskin said. Rove was told about 4 p.m. while aboard a Southwest Airlines flight en route to a campaign speech in New Hampshire, but he waited until early yesterday morning to publicly reveal the news.

The announcement ends months of speculation about Rove's legal future and frees the architect of President Bush's presidential victories to resume his central White House role without the threat of criminal charges hanging over him. Rove, who spent countless hours preparing for five grand jury appearances in the case and sharpening his defense, was "delighted, obviously," Luskin said. "We've always said he did everything he could to cooperate" with the prosecutor, he added.

"It's a chapter that has ended," Bush told reporters during his trip back from Iraq. The president said he thinks Fitzgerald "has conducted his investigation in a dignified way."

With Rove's situation resolved, the broader leak investigation is probably over, according to a source briefed on the status of the case. Fitzgerald does not appear to be pursuing criminal charges against former State Department official Richard L. Armitage, who is believed to have discussed the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame with at least one reporter, according to the source.

"I'm not worried about my situation," Armitage said last night on the Charlie Rose television show.

A source briefed on the case said that the activities of Vice President Cheney and his aides were a key focus of the investigation, and that Cheney was not considered a target or primary subject of the investigation and is not likely to become one. There are no other outstanding issues to be investigated, the source said, though new ones could emerge as Fitzgerald continues to prosecute I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, on charges of lying to investigators and a grand jury.

Rove does not emerge from the investigation unscathed, however. His credibility took a hit inside and outside the White House when he allowed then-Bush spokesman Scott McClellan to tell reporters that he had no role in the unmasking of Plame, the CIA officer at the center of the leak scandal. The investigation has shown that, in a one-week period in 2003, Rove spoke to two reporters about Plame and her CIA role, then reported back to other senior White House officials, according information publicly released by Fitzgerald and by sources familiar with the case.

The episode left McClellan and a few other White House aides upset that they were initially misled by Rove, according to several administration sources. Other White House officials said the case seemed to distract Rove at times and compounded Bush's political problems since his 2004 reelection victory.

An indictment would have been devastating, both politically and practically, for the White House. Rove is intimately involved in efforts to retain GOP majorities in the House and the Senate and to revive the Bush presidency.

Instead, Republicans cheered yesterday's news and charged Democrats with smearing Rove's name by suggesting that he was guilty of lying over the past few months.

DOJ_NMG_0033705

"Even when it's against the interests of what is in our nation's interest, you're seeing Democrats prejudging for political purposes," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said on MSNBC. "It was wrong when they did it to Karl Rove."

Democrats said Rove remains a symbol of fading White House credibility. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said yesterday that he should have been fired long ago.

In an interview, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y) said that he trusted Fitzgerald's judgment in the case, but he called on the special counsel to eventually release a report that details the roles of Rove and other White House officials in the leak of Plame's name.

"There is a fundamental here: The American people have lost faith in this White House," he said. "Things like this will not restore their faith."

Still, Democrats acknowledged that the all-clear signal for Rove will provide a political boost for the Bush White House and for Republicans. Rove, who was stripped of day-to-day policy management as part of the recent White House shake-up, is a political force not only inside the Oval Office but also among many Republicans seeking advice on how to win congressional races in a tough political climate for the GOP. A popular figure among conservatives, he is expected to intensify his campaigning and fundraising in the months ahead.

Fitzgerald's spokesman declined to comment.

Fitzgerald is investigating whether any administration officials knowingly disclosed Plame's CIA role as part of an effort to discredit allegations by her husband -- former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV -- that Bush had twisted prewar intelligence to justify an invasion of Iraq. Wilson had been sent by the CIA to investigate whether Iraq had sought nuclear weapons material from Niger. He reported back that the charge could not be proved, but Bush nevertheless asserted in his 2003 State of the Union address that intelligence existed that Iraq had tried to buy uranium in Africa.

After Wilson went public with his allegations a few months later, the White House was forced to concede that the Africa assertion was not based on solid evidence. But that was not before Libby, Rove and others set out to discredit Wilson, in part by telling reporters that his wife, a CIA officer, may have helped set up the Niger trip. Plame's name and affiliation with the intelligence agency was first revealed in a July 2003 column by Robert D. Novak, who has not revealed his sources for the story.

The CIA leak case is likely to remain a distraction for the White House. Libby was indicted last October on charges of perjury, making false statements and obstructing justice in the case. His trial is expected to begin in January, and legal filings in the case are likely to bring out new details of the role White House officials played in unmasking Plame.

In recent months, court filings have revealed more about Cheney's hands-on role in the White House effort to rebut Wilson, which resulted in the disclosure of Plame's name.

Cheney, Rove and other top White House officials could be called as witnesses in the Libby trial. It is also possible that others could be charged in the case if Fitzgerald discovers new evidence. Recent court filings have described the investigation as ongoing.

But the full details of Rove's role may never be known, because Fitzgerald is not required to issue a public report on his probe. Though Fitzgerald initially showed interest in Rove after learning, in the course of the investigation, that Rove had discussed Plame with reporters, lawyers in the case said the prosecutor spent the past two years or more trying to determine whether Rove lied to the grand jury.

Specifically, Fitzgerald wanted to know if Rove purposely hid from the grand jury in February 2004 the fact that he had discussed Plame with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper.

Rove would later tell the grand jury that he had simply forgotten the conversation with Cooper until his lawyers found an e-mail months later that showed that the Rove-Cooper conversation had occurred. For much of the investigation, Fitzgerald seemed skeptical of Rove's foggy-memory defense. In fact, a few days before he indicted Libby, Fitzgerald appeared ready to charge Rove, the lawyers said.

At that point, Luskin stepped forward and offered last-minute evidence that he seemed confident would clear Rove. Eight months later, that came to pass.

No Rove Charges Over Testimony On C.I.A. Leak (NYT)

By David Johnston And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — The decision by a special prosecutor not to bring charges against Karl Rove in the C.I.A. leak case followed months of intense behind-the-scenes maneuvering between the prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Rove's lawyer, lawyers in the case said.

DOJ_NMG_0033706

The move, made public early Tuesday by Mr. Rove's lawyer, Robert D. Luskin, brought a surprise ending to the investigation of Mr. Rove, President Bush's senior adviser. At one point last fall, Mr. Rove seemed close to facing perjury charges over lapses in his early testimony about a conversation with a Time magazine reporter.

Mr. Fitzgerald's decision left I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, alone among current and former White House officials still facing legal jeopardy in the three-year-old leak case. Mr. Fitzgerald announced in a letter to Mr. Luskin on Monday that he would not indict Mr. Rove, who had testified on five occasions to a federal grand jury about his involvement in the disclosure of an intelligence officer's identity.

After months in which the case has been a major distraction to the White House, the decision frees Mr. Rove in his role as Mr. Bush's top strategist during midterm elections this year. Mr. Luskin declined to address the legal issues surrounding the case but said, "We believe that the special counsel's decision should put an end to the baseless speculation about Mr. Rove's conduct."

A spokesman for Mr. Rove's legal team, Mark Corallo, said that Mr. Rove had made no deals to cooperate with the prosecution in any way, and that the decision was based purely on Mr. Fitzgerald's findings. A spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald, Randall Samborn, had no comment.

Mr. Fitzgerald's decision is not expected to affect the legal case against Mr. Libby, who is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice. But it does free Mr. Fitzgerald to focus exclusively on preparations for that trial, which is scheduled to begin in January and could still embarrass the White House.

In a series of court filings in that case, Mr. Fitzgerald has indicated he may call Mr. Cheney as a witness, an unsettling prospect that could expose the vice president to the uncertainties of being questioned in a criminal trial. The decision to decline to prosecute Mr. Rove effectively ends the active investigative phase of Mr. Fitzgerald's inquiry; Mr. Rove was the only person known to remain under scrutiny.

That leaves some important unanswered questions. Among them is who in the government first told the columnist Robert D. Novak about the C.I.A. officer at the heart of the case in the days before his July 14, 2003, column in which he disclosed the identity of the officer, Valerie Wilson.

Mr. Fitzgerald has been investigating whether the White House leaked Ms. Wilson's name to discredit an Op-Ed article in The New York Times written by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, in which he said there was no basis for the administration's claims that Iraq had tried to buy nuclear fuel in Africa. A prosecution brief in the case said that a copy of the article annotated by Mr. Cheney showed that the vice president and Mr. Libby had been acutely focused on Mr. Wilson's criticism.

White House officials were careful Tuesday not to celebrate too joyously over the news for Mr. Rove. But they were clearly buoyed by what they called the closing of one uncomfortable chapter in the leak case.

Speaking on Air Force One on his way back from Baghdad, Iraq, Mr. Bush told reporters: "It's a chapter that has ended. Fitzgerald is a very thorough person. I think he's conducted his investigation in a dignified way. And he's ended his investigation."

But he cautioned: "There's still a trial to be had. And those of us involved in the White House are going to be very mindful of not commenting on this issue."

Mr. Fitzgerald's decision not to prosecute Mr. Rove came after months of private discussions between him and Mr. Luskin, beginning last fall, even before Mr. Libby was indicted. While in public Mr. Rove revealed little concern, lawyers in the case said Mr. Luskin had waged a fierce battle to stave off the prosecution. The lawyers in the case and associates of Mr. Rove would discuss confidential issues only after being assured anonymity.

The lawyers said Mr. Fitzgerald seemed at times to be close to bringing charges against Mr. Rove over his failure to volunteer early in the inquiry a conversation he had had about Ms. Wilson with a Time magazine reporter, Matthew Cooper.

Mr. Rove had testified that he had initially forgotten about that conversation, and that his memory had been jogged only after his lawyers found an e-mail message referring to a conversation with Mr. Cooper, sent from Mr. Rove to Stephen J. Hadley, then the deputy national security adviser and now the chief security adviser. Mr. Rove had argued that it would have been legal suicide to lie knowingly to a grand jury about a conversation with a reporter.

That argument seems to have been crucial in avoiding an indictment. Mr. Fitzgerald, lawyers in the case said, believed at least initially that Mr. Rove's effort to find the e-mail message meant that he must have known of its existence earlier. But Mr. Luskin offered an alternative account, at one point switching from his role as a lawyer, offering himself as a witness.

Last fall, Mr. Luskin gave a sworn deposition to Mr. Fitzgerald, saying he had been told by Viveca Novak, a friend at Time magazine who is not related to Mr. Novak, that Mr. Rove might have talked to Mr. Cooper. That gave Mr. Luskin a reason to search for any record of such a conversation.

DOJ_NMG_0033707

Mr. Rove was said by associates to be ebullient on Tuesday. He declined to comment, but the White House tipped photographers that he would be walking from the White House to the Old Executive Office Building, providing imagery of Mr. Rove, all smiles.

The leak investigation, several associates said, had been a heavy burden for Mr. Rove and his wife and son, whose home had frequently been visited by reporters and cameramen. Officials said Mr. Rove had stayed focused on his work throughout, but he was also said to have appeared less jovial and less inclined to engage in his usual practical jokes.

Associates said Mr. Rove seemed to loosen up in recent weeks, apparently as he and his lawyer had grown more confident that no indictment would come, and even as liberal bloggers and other commentators had predicted an imminent indictment, most recently in May, based on a report on Truthout.org.

Truthout has stood by that report, which said Mr. Rove was under a secret indictment. In a posting Tuesday it suggested that Mr. Rove was cooperating with the prosecution, which, it noted, had not commented publicly on Mr. Rove's legal status.

In a statement, a lawyer for the Wilsons, Christopher Wolf, indicated that the couple was considering taking civil action against Mr. Rove. "The day still may come when Mr. Rove and others are called to account in a court of law for their attacks on the Wilsons," Mr. Wolf said.

Tom Rath, a Republican leader in New Hampshire, said he was relieved Mr. Rove could concentrate on the midterm elections without the taint of scandal.

"It was like being on the disabled list; you see him in a uniform every day but you can't have him on the mound," Mr. Rath said of Mr. Rove's previous legal limbo. "Now he's back on the mound."

Rove Won't Be Charged In CIA Leak Case (AP)

By Toni Locy

The Associated Press, June 13, 2006

Presidential adviser Karl Rove won't be a criminal defendant in the CIA leak case, but he could still end up being grilled in court as a witness.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald could question Rove about whether the Bush administration compromised a CIA officer's identity to retaliate against a political critic.

Still, Rove and the White House could breathe a sigh of relief Tuesday after the prosecutor told Rove's lawyer he wouldn't seek a federal indictment against the political operative.

Rove has been identified as a likely defense witness in next year's trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby has been charged with lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned about Valerie Plame's CIA status and what he told reporters about it.

If Libby's defense attorneys summon Rove to testify, Fitzgerald can cross-examine him about a host of issues, including a July 2003 conversation Rove had with syndicated columnist Robert Novak days before Novak published Plame's name.

Aboard Air Force One Tuesday, President Bush praised Fitzgerald.

"It's a chapter that has ended," Bush said. "Fitzgerald is a very thorough person. I think he's conducted his investigation in a dignified way."

The president said White House officials would remain mum about the leak and the results of the investigation. "I think it's going to be important for you all to recognize there's still a trial to be had," he said to reporters. "And those of us involved in the White House are going to be very mindful of not commenting on this issue ... because of the Libby trial."

At the White House, Rove was all smiles, as he usually is, as he carried out his normal routine. With Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten in Iraq with Bush, Rove ran the senior staff meeting.

While a cloud may have been lifted from its top political operative, the White House's embarrassment over the Plame leak has not ended. The administration faces the possibility of a parade of current and former top officials being called to testify during Libby's trial, starting with Cheney.

In court filings, Fitzgerald has described a White House campaign — led by Cheney — to discredit Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, after he wrote an opinion piece in The New York Times in July 2003 that accused the administration of twisting intelligence on Iraq to justify the war.

Fitzgerald has not ruled out calling Cheney, who cut out Wilson's article with a pen knife and scrawled questions on it wondering whether Plame sent her husband on a "junket" to Niger to determine the accuracy of allegations that Iraq had tried to buy material to make a nuclear weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0033708

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., one of the first senators to call for an independent investigation of the leak, said, "We have faith that Prosecutor Fitzgerald will continue to pursue this case and turn over every other stone and follow every lead, no matter how high they take him."

Other Democratic lawmakers called Tuesday for a separate congressional inquiry into Rove's role in disclosing Plame's name to reporters and the question of whether Rove or others at the White House sought to discredit Wilson.

"Congress has a constitutional obligation to provide a check and balance on the executive branch," said Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. "Providing a public accounting of the actions of Mr. Rove is an important part of fulfilling this obligation."

Early in his investigation, Fitzgerald abandoned the idea of indicting anyone on a charge directly related to actually leaking Plame's identity, which was classified at the time.

Instead, his investigation focused on the possibility of a cover-up and lies by administration officials about how and when they learned about Plame and whom they told. So far, only Libby has been indicted. Fitzgerald's spokesman, Randall Samborn, refused on Tuesday to comment on whether the investigation was continuing.

Until last summer, the White House had denied that Rove or Libby had anything to do with leaking Plame's identity. Those claims were countered by grand jury testimony from Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper who said both Rove and Libby had told him about Plame.

Rove testified before the grand jury an extraordinary five times, insisting initially that he had talked only to Novak. Rove later admitted talking to Cooper.

Robert Luskin, Rove's attorney, said it was too soon to know whether Rove would take the stand at Libby's trial, which is scheduled to begin in January.

In court filings, Libby's lawyers have predicted Rove will be "a key witness at trial," an assertion Fitzgerald has dismissed as a ploy "to put the conduct of others on trial."

At this stage, Luskin said, both Fitzgerald and Libby's lawyers are feeling each other out.

Fitzgerald is trying to keep the case simple and limited to the question of whether Libby lied, while Libby's lawyers are trying to broaden it so they can get access to as much of the prosecutor's evidence as possible before trial, Luskin said.

"This is just positioning," he said.

Rove Will Not Be Charged In CIA Leak Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

Top White House aide Karl Rove will not be charged in an investigation into the leaking of CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity after her diplomat husband accused President Bush of manipulating intelligence to justify military action in Iraq.

Washington lawyer Robert Luskin said Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald told him late Monday that "he does not anticipate seeking charges against" Mr. Rove. The notification came after Mr. Fitzgerald met with chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan, who has overseen the grand jury investigation.

"In deference to the pending case, we will not make any further public statements about the subject matter of the investigation," Mr. Luskin said. "We believe the special counsel's decision should put an end to the baseless speculation about Mr. Rove's conduct."

Mr. Fitzgerald's office declined to comment.

"It's a chapter that has ended," Mr. Bush told reporters aboard Air Force One on the way back from Iraq. "I think he's conducted his investigation in a dignified way. And he's ended his investigation.

"I think it's going to be important for you all to recognize there's still a trial to be had," he said. "And those of us involved in the White House are going to be very mindful of not commenting on this issue."

Mr. Rove emerged from the Eisenhower Executive Office Building several times yesterday in view of photographers staked out on the White House lawn, waving and smiling at them.

"Now Karl can be Karl," said one senior administration official, who said Mr. Rove is now free to focus on politics heading into the 2006 congressional elections. Mr. Rove was given expanded duties after the 2004 election, including a post as deputy chief of staff and a portfolio that included domestic issues. But earlier this year he was reassigned back to focus on politics.

The administration official said Mr. Rove did not show strain at the White House, even as stories swirled that he was about to be indicted.

DOJ_NMG_0033709

Mr. Rove testified five times before a federal grand jury in the leak investigation, most recently in April. Grand jurors handed up an indictment in October against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, charging him with obstruction of justice, perjury and lying to FBI agents.

The three-year probe centers on accusations that senior Bush administration officials leaked Mrs. Plame's CIA role in retaliation for critical comments on the Iraq war by her husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. Mr. Rove's name surfaced almost immediately, and he was the subject of continuing press speculation about his role in the affair.

Mr. Fitzgerald focused on concerns over whether Mr. Rove, 55, obstructed justice in failing to disclose to investigators a conversation that he had with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper just before he and columnist Robert Novak published Mrs. Plame's name in July 2003. Mr. Rove told prosecutors that he did not recall the conversation until his lawyer discovered a White House e-mail referring to it.

Mr. Libby is the only person charged in the Fitzgerald investigation. No one was indicted in the case on the original accusations that spurred the special counsel's inquiry -- that an administration official violated a 1982 law prohibiting the purposeful disclosure of a CIA agent's name.

From the White House's standpoint, the Fitzgerald notification to Mr. Luskin means that Mr. Rove is in the clear, and Republicans said Democrats now owe him an apology. Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, speaking on CNN, said Democrats "took this good man, and they prejudged him."

Mr. Rove was a popular target for Democratic lawmakers, who tried to strip him of his security clearance through an amendment on the Senate floor last year, and an even more popular target for liberal-leaning Web logs, or blogs.

Yesterday, Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said he accepted Mr. Fitzgerald's findings, although he added that Mr. Rove acted wrongly and deserved the attacks from Democrats.

"I don't think he conducted himself honorably and well here," Mr. Schumer said, though he acknowledged that "some of the things that were said about him proved to be untrue."

Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said Mr. Rove leaked Mrs. Plame's identity, which is a reason to fire him, even though Mr. Fitzgerald did not indict him.

"Karl Rove does not belong in the White House," Mr. Dean said. "If the president valued America more than he valued his connection with Karl Rove, Karl Rove would have been fired a long time ago."

Meanwhile, Mr. Libby, 55, has denied any wrongdoing, saying that he was "confident that at the end of this process, I will be completely and totally exonerated."

The indictment said he discussed Mrs. Plame and her husband with several people in the White House but identified them only by title and did not accuse them of breaking the law. Those named were former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, an undersecretary of state later identified as Marc Grossman and a senior White House official referred to as "Official A," later named as Mr. Rove.

Rove Won't Face Criminal Charges In CIA Case (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A prosecutor's decision not to seek an indictment of White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove for perjury has buoyed Republican hopes that President Bush's top political adviser can help the party keep its congressional majorities in November.

On Tuesday, Robert Luskin, Rove's attorney, said special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald told him that Rove would not be indicted in the case of a CIA officer's blown cover, an investigation that has lasted almost three years.

“A long ordeal like this one — with so much public speculation — has got to take its toll,” Luskin said.

The decision lifted a legal cloud over the 55-year-old aide who is revered by Republicans and reviled by Democrats. Credited with supreme political and organizational skills, Rove helped elect Bush twice and forge a Republican victory in 2002, all part of an overarching effort to create an enduring Republican majority.

Former Republican chairman Ed Gillespie, a friend of Rove's, said he has the ability to see “the big picture … and make sure that people are executing the big picture.”

Fitzgerald's decision eliminated the possibility of an indictment that “would have been depressive to the Republicans” on Capitol Hill, said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a Rove ally.

“It's great we'll have him front and center,” said Mark McKinnon, Bush's media adviser.

Rove, however, isn't on the ballot, said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. “The election is about Republican incumbents, and they're as unpopular as ever.”

Deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the White House is pleased that Fitzgerald has cleared Rove, who can keep "crafting and building support for the president's agenda."

Rove's legal problems started with his discussion with a Time magazine reporter about Joseph Wilson, a former ambassador who had challenged administration claims that Iraq had sought uranium ore from Africa.

According to reporter Matthew Cooper, Rove confirmed that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. The disclosure of Valerie Plame's name inspired the Fitzgerald investigation because of laws against revealing a CIA operative's identity.

Fitzgerald charged Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, with perjury Oct. 28. Libby, however, was not charged for the Plame disclosure but for statements he made to prosecutors and grand jurors about his contacts with reporters. Libby pleaded innocent and is scheduled to stand trial early next year.

Rove initially failed to disclose his talk with Cooper; Luskin said his client had forgotten about the brief conversation and cooperated fully with investigators once the omission was discovered.

"It's a chapter that has ended," Bush said Tuesday en route home from a surprise trip to Iraq.

Rove may still have legal issues surrounding the case. Wilson has said he may file a civil suit against Rove and other administration figures. Fitzgerald's announcement "obviously does not end the matter," said Wilson's attorney, Christopher Wolf.

"The day still may come when Mr. Rove and others are called to account in a court of law for their attacks on the Wilsons," Wolf said.

Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman accused Democrats of pre-judging Rove for political purposes. "The facts show that Karl Rove actually did nothing wrong," he said.

Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean said the prosecutor's decision "does not diminish the fact that Karl Rove was involved in leaking the identity of an intelligence operative during a time of war."

Prosecutors Say Rove Won't Be Indicted In Leak Case (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Karl Rove, President Bush's top political advisor, will not face criminal charges, ending his jeopardy in a three-year investigation into the leak of a CIA agent's name to the press, his lawyer said today.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald formally notified Rove's legal team Monday that the prosecutor "does not anticipate" seeking charges against him, according to a statement by Robert Luskin, Rove's attorney.

Luskin said he hoped the special prosecutor's letter would "put an end to the baseless speculation about Mr. Rove's conduct."

Rove testified before the grand jury five times before Fitzgerald decided not to seek an indictment.

The announcement seemed only to ignite partisan fires over corruption and secrecy. Saying the White House was pleased, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said, "Karl is as he has been throughout the process — fully focused on the task at hand: crafting and building support for the president's agenda."

And Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said Democrats owe Rove an apology.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich hailed the news. "Certainly for the White House and for Karl Rove this is a very important morning and a very positive one."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean was having none of it. "His real sin … is leaking the name of an intelligence operative during a time of war," Dean said on NBC's "Today" program. "He doesn't belong in the White House."

Fitzgerald has been looking into who disclosed the identity of Valerie Plame after her husband, former U.S. diplomat Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration for twisting intelligence in the run-up to the March 2003 invasion of Iraq.

In October, Fitzgerald indicted Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on charges of obstruction of justice and lying to FBI agents and a grand jury. Libby pleaded not guilty and is scheduled to go on trial in January.

The 55-year-old Rove, chief architect of Bush's electoral victories, was in New Hampshire on Monday, urging Republicans to stay the course against a backdrop of bad poll numbers for the White House. At a $100-a-plate dinner, Rove called the Iraq invasion a just and necessary part of a larger war on terror.

"Sometimes history sends you something that you can't plan for," Rove told the crowd, according to the Concord Monitor. "And what really matters then is the character of the person who occupies [the White House]."

Across the street, protesters greeted his visit. One sign said, "Karl Rove & NH GOP: Where Criminals Congregate."

Maybe Not Morning In America, But At Least Out Of The Dark (WP)

By Dana Milbank

DOJ_NMG_0033711

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Within hours of hearing yesterday morning that Karl Rove wouldn't be prosecuted in the CIA leak case, Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), the chief of the Democrats' campaign to retake the Senate, hurried to the press gallery to blunt the damage.

But it was no use. "Senator," MSNBC's Tom Curry needled Schumer, "as you know, the president has nicknames that he applies to people, and one of the nicknames he applied to Karl Rove was 'Turd Blossom.' "

"Cherry Blossom?" Schumer asked, puzzled.

"Turd Blossom," Curry repeated. "In terms of Rove's career as a political strategist in the fall campaign, will this lead to a new flowering of Turd Blossom?"

"I'm not going to comment," said the nonplused New Yorker.

But the earthy image -- a Texas desert flower that flourishes in manure -- was a good metaphor for Rove and the GOP yesterday: Both were, at least momentarily, blooming from the political muck in which they have been mired.

Rove, President Bush's chief strategist, was off the hook. Bush himself was in Iraq, celebrating the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the completion of an Iraqi cabinet. Hillary Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, was booed by antiwar liberals at a gathering in Washington. A new House Republican was sworn in after winning a closely watched special election. And Bush's lowly poll numbers crept up in the Gallup poll.

A dozen days earlier, a reflective Bush expressed remorse about his "bring 'em on" tough talk. But yesterday, the doubts were gone and the bravado was back -- as much as it can be for a guy at 38 percent in the polls. "The progress here in Iraq has been remarkable," he told the cheering troops. "America's safer. The world is better off." He accused his opponents of a naÃ¯ve bid to "forget the dangers we face" since Sept. 11, 2001.

The president's allies went further with the bluster. Moments after learning of his exoneration, Rove told a New Hampshire audience Monday night that Democratic critics of the Iraq war such as John Kerry and John Murtha, both combat veterans, "give the green light to go to war, but when it gets tough, they fall back of that party's old platform of cutting and running. They may be with you for the first few bullets but they won't be there for the last tough battles."

Yesterday morning, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman went on TV to demand that Democratic leaders apologize to Rove. "I think there probably are a lot of folks who ought to acknowledge they were prejudging" him, concurred Sen. George Allen (R-Va.). White House aides, meanwhile, wrapped themselves in the imagery of military derring-do. Tony Snow and Dan Bartlett allowed themselves to be photographed wearing flak jackets and helmets on a chopper flight into Baghdad -- although the result was more Michael Dukakis than Mission Accomplished.

Democrats hurried to block Bush from recovering his political standing. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), addressing the liberal gathering in Washington, recalled Bush's lack of combat experience. "Now, I understand fully that Iraq is not Vietnam," he said. "After all, President Bush is even there today."

Asked by reporters about the recent good news for Bush, Schumer was grudging. "These few developments -- and, for instance, the Zarqawi one is one I welcome -- don't remove the cloud of incompetence that is over the administration's head," he said. "I don't think the administration can really recover until they change their entire way of operating."

But however fervently Schumer wished away Bush's good news, Republicans sensed a shift in momentum. Sen. John Warner (Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, even felt comfortable enough to brush off reporters' questions about the alleged Haditha massacre. "I think the secretary [Donald H. Rumsfeld] is correct in waiting" to brief Congress, Warner said. Asked when Pentagon officials might be called before his committee, he replied: "At this time, I don't think anybody can give an estimate on that. But I'm sure that they're forthcoming; they're not reluctant to come up and provide the witnesses. Not at all."

The GOP's confidence may be a little premature. The same CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll that showed Bush's approval up to 38 percent from 31 percent last month also showed that Americans still disapprove of the way he's handling Iraq, by 60 percent to 36 percent.

But, however tentative the progress, Republicans were ready to find a flower in the manure. "The Democratic Party," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) said, is "looking success in the face and snatching defeat out of the jaws of victory. We've got some very good news!"

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) was also ready to declare a tentative victory. "Fundamentally, I believe the news is good," he told the microphones. "Sometimes I want to ask my colleagues, 'What is it about good news you don't like?' "

Bush, winging back from Iraq on Air Force One, struck reporters as "upbeat and relaxed" -- so much so that he savored Rove's exoneration in the CIA leak case, breaking his own rule about not commenting on the matter. Said Bush: "It's a chapter that has ended."

Rove Won't Be Charged In CIA Leak Probe, Lawyer Says (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, June 14, 2006

June 13 (Bloomberg) -- Karl Rove, President George W. Bush's top political adviser, won't face criminal charges in a three-year investigation into the leak of a CIA operative's name, his lawyer said.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald formally notified Rove's legal team yesterday that the prosecutor ``does not anticipate'' seeking charges against Rove, the attorney, Robert Luskin, said in a statement. ``The special counsel's decision should put an end to the baseless speculation about Mr. Rove's conduct,'' Luskin said.

Randall Samborn, Fitzgerald's spokesman, declined to comment. White House Counselor Dan Bartlett said the president was informed of the notice shortly before Bush boarded Air Force One last night for a surprise trip to Iraq. He declined to characterize Bush's reaction.

Fitzgerald's decision not to pursue criminal charges against Rove removes a legal cloud from Bush's closest political aide and coincides with Bush's effort to halt a slide in public opinion polls before the November congressional elections. The prosecutor's action also suggests that only I. Lewis ``Scooter'' Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, will face charges.

Rove, 55, testified five times before federal grand juries investigating the case, most recently on April 26.

Notified

Luskin said he was notified of the decision yesterday and couldn't reach Rove immediately because the presidential adviser was on the plane to New Hampshire, where he was giving a speech to Republican Party officials. Rove got the news via BlackBerry message.

``The guy is elated and relieved,'' Luskin said. ``No matter how thick-skinned you are, this kind of thing begins to weigh on you after awhile.''

Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said that while the decision was good news for the White House, it wouldn't affect Democrats' efforts to make gains in the November congressional elections.

``Karl Rove is clearly the political mastermind behind the Republicans,'' Dean said on NBC's ``Today'' program. ``I think that he would have continued to exercise that role even if he had been indicted.''

Dean said Bush should have fired Rove a long time ago. ``He doesn't belong in the White House,'' Dean said.

`Rush to Judgment'

Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman said on CNN that Democrats engaged in a ``rush to judgment'' in trying to tie Rove to the disclosure of the Central Intelligence Agency operative's identity. He said Dean and other Democratic leaders owe Rove an apology.

``It's pretty clear that Karl Rove not only did nothing wrong, but he did everything right in terms of cooperating with this investigation,'' Mehlman said.

The probe was initiated to determine whether anyone in the administration violated a 1982 law prohibiting the purposeful disclosure of a covert agent's name. No one has been charged under that statute. Libby was indicted on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice regarding his conversations with reporters about the former CIA agent, Valerie Plame, who is married to a prominent critic of the Iraq war.

Her name was first published by syndicated columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003. A report on Time magazine's Web site three days later also identified Plame, who was a covert operative for the agency.

The disclosure of her name followed criticism of Bush's justification for the war in Iraq by her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson.

Dispatched by CIA

Wilson, who served in Africa and was acting U.S. ambassador to Iraq under former President George H.W. Bush, was dispatched by the CIA in February 2002 to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein's regime was seeking yellowcake uranium from Niger. At the time, Plame was working at the agency's headquarters in Langley, Virginia.

After the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, Wilson served as an unidentified source for journalists writing stories that questioned Bush's claims about Iraq's weapons. By the time he publicly accused the government of twisting intelligence to justify the war in an essay published July 6, 2003, in the New York Times, administration officials already were compiling information on him and the Niger mission, according to court documents in the Libby case.

A week later, Novak wrote that Wilson was sent to Niger at the suggestion of Plame. He cited two unnamed ``senior administration officials'' as the source of the information.

Investigation Sought

The CIA asked for a Justice Department investigation. Novak, who has refused to reveal what he told investigators, subsequently said he didn't know what Plame did at the agency and had no reason to believe she was a covert agent.

In the Libby indictment, Fitzgerald said Plame's identity was classified and he rebutted assertions made by some Bush supporters that her status wasn't a secret in Washington.

In an April legal motion filed in connection with the Libby case, Fitzgerald wrote that some of the 12,300 pages of government documents turned over to Libby's defense team ``could be characterized as reflecting a plan to discredit, punish or seek revenge against Mr. Wilson."

Questioned

Bush and Cheney both have been questioned in the case by investigators in sessions held in their offices and as many as two dozen current or former administration officials.

In addition, Fitzgerald has sought information from at least a half dozen reporters, including Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper, NBC's Tim Russert and former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who was imprisoned for 85 days last year for refusing to reveal her sources to the grand jury.

Rove is a key member of Bush's inner circle. The former direct-mail political consultant ran Bush's upset victory in the 1994 race for Texas governor and has been at Bush's side since. He was the primary strategist behind Bush's 1998 re-election race and his 2000 presidential victory. After being re-elected president in 2004, Bush credited Rove as the ``architect" of his success and gave him added responsibilities for developing White House policy.

Since the election, Rove has suffered setbacks. He was the primary strategist behind Bush's failed attempt to overhaul Social Security in 2005. He also has been unable so far to break up Republican resistance to the president's attempt to rewrite the nation's immigration laws to create a system of temporary work permits.

In a realignment of the White House staff in April, Rove was stripped of his policy-making responsibility to keep his focus on political strategy. With Bush's popularity at an all- time low, the president's agenda is stalled in Congress and Republicans are struggling to keep their majorities in the House and Senate.

Nonindictment Of Rove Owes Much To Tactics (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

The client was President Bush's top political adviser, the leading strategist for the Republican Party, and the bane of Democrats' existence. The attorney was a left-leaning litigator who wears a gold hoop in his left ear and rides a Ducati motorcycle.

But even some who wanted to see Karl Rove indicted credit the skillful lawyering by attorney Robert Luskin and his open-door strategy with the prosecution and the press alike with convincing the grand jury of his innocence.

Indeed, Mr. Luskin had Mr. Rove appear before the grand jury in the case repeatedly to explain that what had appeared to be a misstatement was in fact a lapse of memory.

Yesterday morning, Mr. Luskin issued a three-sentence statement saying Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald had notified him that he "does not anticipate seeking charges against Karl Rove."

The news appears to end a nearly three-year investigation into Mr. Rove's involvement in the leaking of the identity of Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame, in response to criticism of the war in Iraq by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. While no one has been charged with the underlying crime of exposing an intelligence officer, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, was indicted in October on five counts of lying to federal investigators and the grand jury and obstructing the probe. He has pleaded not guilty, and his case is set to go to trial in January.

The particulars behind the nonindictment likely won't be revealed; grand-jury testimony is held in secrecy, and jurors needn't make their deliberations public. Mr. Luskin, a partner at Washington law firm Patton Boggs, says the main reason his client isn't being indicted is because he didn't break the law.

Mr. Luskin continually tried to bring new information to the attention of Mr. Fitzgerald and had his client repeatedly return to the grand jury to respond to lingering questions. All told, Mr. Rove testified five times, a risky strategy that exposed him to possible misstatements.

"Over the years, I've come to the view that you're never going to sneak a pork chop past a wolf and if you try to trick people you're not going to do very well," says Mr. Luskin, who notes that the world of criminal attorneys is a small one where reputations are quick to gel, for better or worse. "Your most important form of advocacy is having an honest and candid dialogue with prosecutors," he says.

STATEMENT FROM ROBERT LUSKIN

DOJ_NMG_0033714

Below is the full text of a press release from Karl Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin.

"On June 12, 2006, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald formally advised us that he does not anticipate seeking charges against Karl Rove.

"In deference to the pending case, we will not make any further public statements about the subject matter of the investigation. We believe that the Special Counsel's decision should put an end to the baseless speculation about Mr. Rove's conduct."

A onetime reporter in the Washington bureau of the Providence Journal in Rhode Island, Mr. Luskin went on to become a Justice Department attorney and after that a criminal defense lawyer. He represented the Interior Department in the 1990s during an independent-counsel probe. "Bob is an old reporter and that can be of extreme value in cases like this," says Ben Ginsberg, also a partner at Patton Boggs whose close ties to the Bush administration led him to recommend Mr. Luskin to Mr. Rove.

The co-chairman of Patton Boggs's litigation team, Mr. Luskin was hired by Mr. Rove in October 2003 just weeks after the Justice Department had opened a criminal investigation into Ms. Plame's exposure in a column by Robert Novak.

Mr. Wilson accused Mr. Rove of being pivotal in the outing of his wife, and Democrats were clamoring for his indictment. The White House official faced a potential perjury charge last October when Mr. Libby was indicted. Mr. Fitzgerald's questions about Mr. Rove appeared focused on whether he lied to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury initially about a conversation with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper, according to people familiar with the situation.

Mr. Rove testified that he had no recollection of that conversation; Mr. Cooper later testified -- and wrote in a magazine column -- that he'd talked to Mr. Rove about Mr. Wilson and his wife in a quick conversation just days before Ms. Plame's name became public in Mr. Novak's column.

Mr. Luskin actually was the one who found evidence that his client's recollection was wrong. Just prior to Mr. Rove's third appearance before the grand jury in October 2004, Mr. Luskin says he locked himself in his office for three days and personally reviewed every stitch of paper he had collected on the case, including printouts of all of Mr. Rove's emails for the period in question.

That is when he found one sent by his client to Stephen Hadley, then deputy national security adviser, mentioning a phone conversation with Mr. Cooper. Days later, Mr. Rove provided the email to Mr. Fitzgerald during a grand-jury appearance, though he maintained he still didn't recall the conversation.

"In white-collar crime cases, the game is won or lost at the indictment stage, so heading one off is Job No. 1," says Randall Elliason, former chief of the government-fraud section of the U.S. attorney's office in Washington. "The one thing he did do that appears to have paid off is to go back to the prosecutor as he learned information about [Mr.] Cooper being a possible source."

But the issue of whether Mr. Rove genuinely forgot this conversation or purposely lied wasn't settled. A key sticking point for the prosecutor was how Mr. Luskin could have known that his client was a source for Mr. Cooper if Mr. Rove hadn't told him. Had Mr. Rove lied about not remembering the conversation?

Then, last October, Mr. Luskin's media relationships and his rapport with Mr. Fitzgerald bore fruit. During a pair of meetings with the prosecutor just before he was set to seek indictments, Mr. Luskin explained that he heard from Viveca Novak, who then worked at Time magazine, over drinks at a Washington bistro one night that chatter around her newsroom indicated Mr. Cooper considered Mr. Rove a source for information about Ms. Plame.

Mr. Fitzgerald then took testimony from her and had Mr. Rove return to the grand jury room to discuss this new information. Perjury cases are notoriously difficult to win because a prosecutor has to prove that a person willfully made false statements under oath. In this matter, legal experts say Mr. Luskin's discovery of the Hadley email and revelation of his discussion with Ms. Novak may have created enough reasonable doubt.

Spokesmen for Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Rove declined to comment.

Analysis: Telling FBI The Truth Saved Rove (AP)

By Pete Yost

The Associated Press, June 13, 2006

The decision not to charge Karl Rove shows there often are no consequences for misleading the public.

In 2003, while Rove allowed the White House to tell the news media that he had no role in leaking Valerie Plame's CIA identity, the presidential aide was secretly telling the FBI the truth.

It's now known that Rove had discussed Plame's CIA employment with conservative columnist Robert Novak, who exposed her identity less than a week later, citing two unidentified senior administration officials.

Rove's truth-telling to the FBI saved him from indictment.

And by misleading reporters, the White House saved itself from a political liability during the 2004 presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0033715

While the president and the vice president underwent questioning by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald in 2004, Rove's role never surfaced. The lone blip on the radar screen was a one-day flurry of news stories the month before Election Day when Rove was brought before a federal grand jury — one of his five grand jury appearances in the probe.

The extent of Rove's involvement didn't become official until Oct. 28 of last year, when Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, was indicted on charges of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's CIA identity and what he told reporters about it.

The indictment recounted Rove's conversation with Novak about the CIA officer, as Rove later related it to Libby.

For nearly three years, the White House has refused to discuss the Plame investigation, citing the fact that it is still under way.

"The ability of this White House to stiff the press is probably better than any previous administration," said presidential scholar Stephen Hess, a former speechwriter for President Eisenhower and an adviser to Presidents Ford and Carter. "Clearly if there are no leaks, there's no damage."

Hess said Tuesday the Plame case is an example of the news media being complicit in the White House's conduct.

"I'm saying that there was a handshake and Bob Novak was honorable to the handshake" by refusing to publicly identify his sources, said Hess. "It's not quite a deal with the devil because these people are our elected and appointed officials, but it's a question of how much you want to let them off the hook."

Lee Edwards, a distinguished fellow at the Heritage Foundation, said other administrations have "flinched or blinked or said 'we've got to do more in response to this or that crisis.'"

"Rove and everyone else has been under enormous pressure and yet they have been able to stick to it and that's remarkable," said Edwards.

Among the many unanswered questions in the Plame probe are what, if anything, Rove told President Bush about his conversation with Novak. Another question is whether Rove told Bush about his conversation with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper.

It was the Rove-Cooper conversation on July 11, 2003, that threw the investigation back on the front pages a year ago.

Facing jail unless he cooperated with prosecutors, Cooper testified that Rove said Wilson's wife worked at the "agency" and that she was responsible for sending her husband on a CIA mission to Africa in 2002 to check out intelligence about Iraq.

"I inferred that he obviously meant the CIA and not, say, the Environmental Protection Agency," Cooper wrote in Time, recounting his conversation with Rove.

Wilson's mission to Africa was the basis for his later criticism of the Bush administration. In his State of the Union speech in 2003 in the run-up to war, Bush embraced intelligence that Saddam Hussein had recently sought significant quantities of yellowcake uranium from Africa.

From his trip, Wilson had concluded it was highly doubtful any such transaction between Iraq and Niger had taken place.

It was the Rove-Cooper conversation about Wilson's wife that became the focus of Fitzgerald's investigative interest in the president's political adviser.

Unlike the conversation with Novak, Rove didn't reveal it to the FBI until more than a year into the criminal investigation of the Plame leak.

Rove's explanation for his belated disclosure of the conversation? He says he forgot about it.

No Charges Against Rove In CIA Leak Case (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 14, 2006

The special prosecutor investigating the alleged leak of the identity of a CIA operative advised White House strategist Karl Rove on Monday that he would not be charged with a crime in connection with the nearly three-year-long investigation, Rove's lawyer said Tuesday.

The announcement Tuesday by Rove attorney Robert Luskin brought to a close months of uncertainty at the White House after its top strategist came under scrutiny over his conversations with reporters.

"I was delighted and relieved for my client's sake," Luskin, a partner at Patton Boggs, says. "Obviously, he's been through a terrific ordeal."

Luskin first received a fax from special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald around 4 p.m. Monday. Rove was about to board a plane to New Hampshire to deliver a speech at the Republican State Committee's annual dinner when Luskin reached him via BlackBerry. They decided to hold off on a public announcement until the morning, Luskin says. He declined to elaborate further on Fitzgerald's decision. Fitzgerald's spokesman, Randall Samborn, declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0033716

The investigation has rocked the White House for months and cast a shadow over Rove, President George W. Bush's closest adviser, who ultimately surrendered his policy-making role in the administration during the probe.

Rove first testified before the grand jury in February 2004 and returned four more times, most recently in April. That month, Rove was relieved of his policy duties at the White House.

Legal experts say the decision may signal an end to Fitzgerald's investigation into whether government officials intentionally leaked classified information -- the name of CIA operative Valerie Plame -- to the media.

Only one person has been indicted in the probe, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who was charged in October with false statements, obstruction of justice and perjury.

The investigation was sparked after syndicated columnist Robert Novak named Plame as a CIA operative who worked on weapons of mass destruction. The disclosure came just days after her husband, Joseph Wilson IV, wrote an op-ed article in The New York Times criticizing the intelligence that administration officials used to bolster its claims for war against Iraq. Wilson, a former ambassador, had traveled to Niger in 2002 to examine a report that Iraq was trying to buy uranium yellowcake from Africa.

The central allegations about Rove stemmed from his July 2003 conversation with Time reporter Matthew Cooper, with whom he discussed Wilson and his wife. Rove initially admitted to talking to Novak about Wilson but did not recall any conversation with Cooper.

Then, in October 2004, Rove told the grand jury that he remembered his conversation after finding an e-mail he had written to Stephen Hadley, then-deputy national security adviser, mentioning his conversation with Cooper.

Fitzgerald's decision raises questions over what, if any, role Rove may play in Libby's upcoming trial, now scheduled for early next year. Former federal prosecutor Peter Henning, now a professor at Wayne State University, says it is possible that Rove could be called as a witness, but "it's not clear how helpful Rove will be for one side or the other."

Libby's attorney, William Jeffress Jr., declined to comment.

Frogs Aren't Marching (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

So much for having Karl Rove "frog-marched" out of the White House "in handcuffs." That's the fate Democratic partisan Joe Wilson once predicted for President Bush's political guru, and yesterday his hope and accusations vanished like fog on the Potomac.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald informed Mr. Rove's lawyers on Monday that he'll bring no charges as part of his investigation into who leaked the CIA identity of Mr. Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame. Mr. Wilson's original claims that Mr. Bush lied about Iraq intelligence have been discredited many times over, including in a bipartisan report from the Senate Intelligence Committee. And now we know that even the relentless Mr. Fitzgerald has concluded that the charge that Mr. Rove criminally blew Ms. Plame's CIA cover is false.

The mystery is why Mr. Fitzgerald kept Mr. Rove twisting in the wind for so long. The prosecutor has been on the case for two-and-a-half years, and he long ago learned the source for the July 2003 Robert Novak column that "outed" Ms. Plame and was the reason he was appointed. Mr. Rove was forced to make no less than five grand jury appearances, the latest as recently as April.

In the end, it seems Mr. Fitzgerald was trying to trap Mr. Rove over the minor matter of his failure to remember a conversation with Time reporter Matthew Cooper. But Mr. Rove is the one who later volunteered information about the conversation to Mr. Fitzgerald, after a check of White House records reminded him of it. A perjury or obstruction accusation based on that inconsequential discrepancy would have been prosecutorial misconduct.

The Rove decision also finally discredits the accusation that there was some grand White House conspiracy to smear Mr. Wilson. Mr. Fitzgerald has brought no charges concerning the original leak, which means there was no underlying crime. His entire case -- and this entire "scandal" -- has been distilled to charges of perjury and obstruction against one man, former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

And that one case comes down to nothing more than the fact that Mr. Libby's memory of conversations with three reporters differs from that of the reporters themselves. Think we're exaggerating? Here's how the judge in the case, Reggie B. Walton, summarized it in a recent ruling on evidence: "The charges against the defendant are based entirely [our emphasis] upon what the defendant has said was discussed during his conversations with these news reporters."

Those conversations took place in the summer of 2003, while the reporters didn't testify about them for Mr. Fitzgerald until a year or more later. Memories aren't always perfect, and Mr. Libby's lawyers will no doubt have ample room to cast doubt on those recollections against the record of notebook entries and public statements made by the reporters. Mr. Fitzgerald will also have to prove why a seasoned lawyer such as Mr. Libby had a motive to lie if there was no underlying crime to cover up.

DOJ_NMG_0033717

We should add that the lack of any underlying crime also means that Mr. Fitzgerald's pursuit of journalistic sources in this case violated the Justice Department's own guidelines, which state that "there should be reasonable grounds to believe . . . that a crime has occurred, and that the information sought is essential to a successful investigation."

Mr. Fitzgerald could ignore those guidelines because he was a "special" counsel subject only to the supervision of the friend who appointed him, former Deputy Attorney General Jim Comey. Only weeks into his probe, he had his official orders changed to include investigation of perjury, suggesting that even at that early stage he had concluded that the original leak was probably not a crime.

The tragedy of this episode is that a political fight over the war in Iraq was allowed to become a criminal matter. Mr. Wilson spun his false tale in an effort to discredit the war and deny Mr. Bush a second term. The liberal media put partisanship above their own interests in demanding a special counsel probe of "leaks" -- until that probe turned on their own sources. The Attorney General at the time, John Ashcroft, passed the buck to Mr. Comey by recusing himself on flimsy grounds -- an act of political and legal abdication.

So what we are left with is a three-year political spectacle that has kept the White House under siege during a war, weakened or pushed out of office some of its most important aides, and made liberal celebrities of Mr. Wilson and his wife. And to what public purpose? A prosecutor with more wisdom than Mr. Fitzgerald would have long ago understood he was injecting himself into a political brawl, closed his case and left the outcome to the voters.

U.S. Challenges House Leaders On Searches (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, June 14, 2006

House leaders who called the late-night search of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record)'s office unconstitutional seek special treatment for lawmakers that would allow them to block criminal investigations, the Justice Department said Tuesday.

Democratic and Republican leaders essentially are calling for a member of Congress to be given notice of a search and to be allowed to be present for it, rights "that are not available to any other person" under constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures, government lawyers said in a 27-page court filing.

If the House leaders have their way, lawmakers also would be able to determine what documents do not have to be turned over to investigators or cannot be used in prosecution, the department said. In that circumstance, "a member of Congress could easily thwart a criminal investigation by unilaterally declaring certain documents to be privileged," the government said.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, Majority Leader John Boehner, Republican Whip Roy Blunt and Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer last week asked a federal judge to declare unconstitutional the search of Jefferson's office May 20-21. Such a move could undermine part of a lengthy bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat.

The leaders said the search was heavy-handed and threatened the balance of power in government. But they also acknowledged that the FBI has every right to investigate Jefferson.

Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who approved the warrant, has scheduled a hearing Friday.

The FBI raid on a congressional office was the first ever, congressional and executive branch officials have said.

The government employed teams of lawyers and investigators who are not involved with the case to sort through the documents in an effort to prevent material protected by the Constitution's separation of powers from being read by prosecutors, the department said.

To ease tension with the House over the search, President Bush stepped in and ordered the material seized in the raid to be sealed until mid-July to give the House and the Justice Department time to negotiate a resolution.

At issue is a constitutional provision known as the speech and debate clause, which protects senators and representatives from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit about their legislative work.

If the search is not invalidated, the House leaders said, the Justice Department could use the threat of similar raids to intimidate Congress into scaling back its oversight of the agency and its components, such as the FBI.

Deliberations In Safavian Trial Postponed (AP)

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN, The Associated Press

AP, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal court jury in the first trial of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was sent home four hours after beginning deliberations Tuesday so the judge could consider whether to dismiss a juror for misconduct.

DOJ_NMG_0033718

Former Bush administration official David Safavian is charged with concealing from ethics officials and investigators that he assisted Republican influence-peddler Abramoff's efforts to obtain two government properties.

The jury of 10 women and two men had selected a foreperson but had not even received their written copies of jury instructions nor begun any substantive deliberations when the problem arose.

Prosecutors argued that a female juror should be dismissed because she disregarded the judge's instructions on several occasions and told other jurors Tuesday she had discussed the costs of a golf trip to Scotland with her father. Safavian's expenses for the August 2002 trip arranged by Abramoff have been an issue in trial testimony.

The defense opposed replacing the juror with an alternate and said U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman should just give jurors a stiff warning to stop all outside discussions.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman, who questioned the juror, decided he wanted to study similar cases before ruling on the government's dismissal motion. He said he would rule Wednesday morning, and asked the jury to return then.

He also denied the jury's request for a dictionary and told the jurors that if they needed definitions or had other questions to ask him by note.

Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist and former business partner of Safavian, was never called to testify, a point Safavian's defense attorney emphasized in closing arguments Monday.

The defense characterized the trial as a clear case of prosecutorial excess, but the government depicted Safavian as an ethically challenged public servant trying to serve two masters.

As the General Services Administration's chief of staff, Safavian "was appointed by the president to serve the people of the United States, but he chose instead to serve Jack Abramoff," Justice Department lawyer Nathaniel Edmonds told the jury on Monday.

Prosecutors seized on dozens of e-mails in which Abramoff and Safavian exchanged information about two pieces of GSA-controlled property that Abramoff wanted for himself or his lobbying clients. Many of the e-mails were written around the time that Safavian accepted a weeklong trans-Atlantic golfing jaunt from Abramoff.

Safavian lawyer Barbara Van Gelder said Safavian "was trying to do the right thing" when he paid $3,100 for the trip and got ethics approval for the weeklong golfing excursion to Scotland and London organized by Abramoff.

"He told everybody about this trip" including his boss, Van Gelder said.

Edmonds said Safavian revealed nothing about the three-day London leg of the trip or the extent of the lavish accommodations. Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said if Safavian had told the truth, "there would have been questions" about who was paying for it and what business Abramoff had with GSA. Safavian told the ethics officer that Abramoff did all his work on Capitol Hill, a statement Van Gelder said is "literally true."

She said the government failed to prove its case by not summoning Abramoff to testify.

"Where's Jack?" Van Gelder asked the jury in final arguments.

"If the government does not call Jack Abramoff they have not met their burden," Van Gelder said.

Prosecutors gave no reason for not calling Abramoff, who would likely be a witness if the Justice Department assembles criminal cases against any members of Congress. The disgraced lobbyist has pleaded guilty to crimes in federal courts in Washington, D.C., and in Miami.

Two Ex-cops Who Moonlighted As Mob Hit Men Turn Against Their Lawyers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 14, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Wearing sharply tailored suits and sharing "Godfather"-style kisses in the courtroom, attorneys Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes appeared a formidable defense team for two ex-New York Police Department detectives accused of moonlighting as hit men for the mob.

Now, two months after Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa were convicted of eight slayings, the former cops are charging that their lawyers botched the case - and asking a federal judge to throw out the verdict.

Both Cutler and Hayes were disappointed by the allegations from their one-time clients, saying Eppolito and Caracappa were desperate men motivated by the life sentences awaiting them if their appeal fails.

"I was just so personally offended," Cutler said. "One day you're begged to come in, and the next day you're knocked by the client, who to me is delusional in a certain respect. He's certainly ungrateful and shameless."

The defendants' new lawyers were unsparing in their assessment of their predecessors.

"Hayes' indifference to Mr. Caracappa's defense, both in terms of preparation and understanding, was apparent throughout the case," Daniel Nobel, who now represents Caracappa, said in court papers.

Joseph Bondy, the new attorney for Eppolito, said Cutler "spent the majority of Mr. Eppolito's closing argument speaking about himself, including that he lost over 14 pounds during trial, loved Brooklyn as a borough of bridges and tunnels, and was an admirer of the great Indian Chief Crazy Horse."

A hearing is set for June 23 on the defendants' allegations of ineffective counsel.

The allegations against Cutler and Hayes are at odds with their reputations.

Cutler, a burly, swaggering figure, is best known for defending Mafia boss John Gotti, employing a loud and merciless style of cross-examination known as "Brucifixion." And Hayes, author of the recent memoir "Mouthpiece," had a client list that included Sean "Diddy" Combs and Robert De Niro; he was the model for the impeccably tailored, street-smart defense attorney in Tom Wolfe's "The Bonfire of the Vanities."

When the two decorated former detectives were convicted April 6, Hayes shared a tearful courtroom hug with Caracappa. Their rapport has since vanished.

"He's desperate - who else can he attack?" Hayes said. "I am surprised, however, since I didn't think he was like that."

"They started off blaming the government and the prosecutors, blaming this and that," Cutler said. "Who's left? Us. I am rankled and angry."

Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were found guilty of committing or facilitating eight killings while on the payroll of both the NYPD and Luchese family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso.

Their new lawyers charged that Cutler and Hayes failed to attack a possible flaw in the government case: That the alleged racketeering enterprise did not continue once the defendants retired and moved to Las Vegas. That would mean the five-year statute of limitations had expired and the convictions would be invalid.

The court filings also included complaints that Cutler and Hayes ignored their clients, that Eppolito was denied his right to testify, and that cross-examination of prosecution witnesses was improperly handled.

Neither Eppolito or Caracappa took the witness stand, though Cutler probably will at the hearing this month.

"I don't want to hurt Lou, and I certainly don't want to hurt Steve," Cutler said. "But I will be heard."

Laski Sentenced To 24 Months In Chicago Corruption Case (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 14, 2006

James Laski at times dabbed tears from his eyes as a federal judge sentenced the former Chicago city clerk to 2 years in prison for taking nearly $50,000 in bribes to steer city business to trucking companies run by his friends.

Laski is the highest-ranking official to be charged in the federal investigation of the scandal-ridden Hired Truck Program.

"After 26 years in government service, I have thrown everything away for the sum of $48,000," the 52-year-old Laski told the court before the sentence was handed down.

The comment brought a rebuke from U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle that Laski was oversimplifying the case. Norgle said Laski's conduct was the kind of breach of trust that saps the faith of ordinary citizens in their government.

It's intolerable that people would start to assume that it always takes crooked dealings to get city contracts, the judge said.

"The good guys lose here," Norgle said. "Honorable guys who have companies and want to do business with the city are the losers."

But Norgle did offer a measure of leniency in the case. Laski could have been sentenced to 30 to 37 months in prison, according to federal guidelines.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Manish Shah had sought a sentence within that range, reminding the judge that Laski attempted to obstruct the probe by asking friends to lie to investigators.

"He was the elected city clerk of the City of Chicago, essentially selling his clout to line his own pockets," Shah said, calling the bribes Laski's "walking around money."

"It allowed him to redo his kitchen, it allowed him to stock his family's vacation home in Wisconsin," he said. Laski also told federal investigators he was involved in ghost payrolling while an alderman in the early 1990s, Shah said.

The judge said he factored in all the mitigating circumstances in Laski's case, including his guilty plea and cooperation and the fact that Laski has a 9-year-old son who has an extreme anxiety disorder and requires special care.

Jeff Steinback, Laski's lawyer, called his client's conduct "inexcusable and wrong," but also said he had done much good as an alderman and then as clerk. Laski's resignation letter in February ended more than two decades of public service and 11 years in the clerk's office.

Laski has a long history of battling an anxiety disorder himself, Steinback said, and he is seeing a psychologist. A presentence report said Laski has been drinking more than nine beers a night in recent months, the judge noted.

DOJ_NMG_0033720

"Jim Laski is using every ounce of energy he possesses, mental and physical, to hold himself together today," Steinback said.

Laski pleaded guilty to taking monthly bribes of $500 to $1,000 from friend Michael "Mick" Jones, an operator of Get Plowed Inc. trucking company. Jones, who also was an official in the clerk's office, has pleaded guilty and will be sentenced in August.

Laski also pleaded guilty to taking $2,000 a month from another friend, Randy Aderman, another city employee, to steer work to FRC Trucking. Aderman pleaded guilty and is to be sentenced next week.

Laski told the judge that his conduct was a betrayal of the city and his family's pride.

"The citizens of Chicago don't deserve a public official that accepted bribes," he said. "I have to live with that shame for the rest of my life."

Steinback said Laski expects to make a public statement about his case next week. Laski did not speak to the media as he left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse.

jcoen@tribune.com

Ex-city Clerk Gets 2 Years In Jail (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, June 14, 2006

Disgraced city clerk James Laski was sentenced this morning to 24 months in prison for taking $48,000 bribes in connection with the Hired Truck Program and coaching a witness to lie to a grand jury.

U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle could have given Laski up to 37 months but took into account Laski's family situation and his acceptance of responsibility for his crimes.

Laski, 52, is the highest-ranking public official convicted in the Hired Truck scandal. He pleaded guilty earlier this year.

"I have thrown away everything for $48,000," Laski, who often wiped away tears during this morning's hearing, told the judge.

Laski served as Chicago's city clerk for 11 years.

His lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, had sought a reduced sentence, saying Laski suffers from a severe anxiety disorder, as does one of his children.

City Hall Lawyer: I Was Unaware Of Hiring 'Irregularities' Before April 2005 (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 14, 2006

The top lawyer in Mayor Richard Daley's administration told a federal jury Tuesday that she was unaware of any "irregularities" in city hiring until after the FBI raided the mayor's office last year.

Testifying against the mayor's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, Corporation Counsel Mara Georges also said she did not know before the April 2005 raid that officials in the mayor's office kept lists of politically connected job seekers.

Georges became the highest-ranking city official to take the stand in the trial of Sorich and three other ex-city officials. The defendants are accused of rigging hiring and promotions for many city jobs to favor pro-Daley campaign workers.

The trial has focused attention on patronage hiring, a practice that supposedly faded into Chicago's past more than 20 years ago, when the city agreed to the federal Shakman decree. For years before the hiring scandal broke, Daley administration officials had maintained that the city was abiding by the decree.

Georges testified Tuesday about two conversations she had in June 2005 with Sorich and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy, Sorich's aide in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The purpose of the meetings was to learn what that office's role was in hiring and how the city's hiring process could be improved, Georges said.

Prosecutors charge that the office dictated who received city jobs that were supposed to be filled without regard to applicants' political ties.

But when Georges discussed Intergovernmental Affairs' role in hiring with Sorich and McCarthy, neither mentioned to her that they participated in filling positions covered by the Shakman decree, she said.

Her testimony was intended to support prosecutors' contention that Sorich and McCarthy took steps to conceal the alleged hiring scheme.

Georges also testified that she had discussions with McCarthy about a color-coded list of applicants for city truck driver jobs that FBI agents found in city offices.

DOJ_NMG_0033721

Prosecutors say the list was used to track how many jobs went to campaign workers under pro-Daley political coordinators such as then-Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez.

But Georges said McCarthy told her the list helped Intergovernmental Affairs keep an eye on Sanchez, a leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization.

Georges said McCarthy told her of "rumors that Al Sanchez was favoring Hispanics who were members of Hispanic Democratic Organization in the hiring of motor truck drivers."

On cross-examination, attorneys for Sorich and McCarthy pointed out that Georges never specifically asked the men whether Intergovernmental Affairs had a role in hiring for jobs covered by the Shakman decree.

McCarthy's attorney, Patrick Deady, also questioned Georges about a 2005 meeting in McCarthy's office when he showed her a stack of résumés received by Intergovernmental Affairs.

"Did it seem like he was trying to hide anything?" Deady asked.

"No, he was not," Georges said.

It was not clear from the testimony whether those résumés were for Shakman-covered or Shakman-exempt jobs. About 1,000 of the city's 38,000 jobs are Shakman-exempt, meaning the administration could staff them with political appointees.

Defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin attempted several times to question Georges about whether the mayor was aware of Intergovernmental Affairs' role in hiring.

But U.S. District Judge David Coar prevented Georges from answering any questions that strayed far beyond her testimony about the 2005 meetings with Sorich and McCarthy.

Durkin asked if Georges knew that Daley instructed Intergovernmental Affairs officials to ensure racial diversity for all city jobs, including those covered by the Shakman decree.

"No, I don't know what you're referring to in regard to Shakman-covered positions," Georges responded.

Durkin has said Daley told federal prosecutors last year that he gave Intergovernmental Affairs responsibility for recommending job candidates in an effort to increase racial diversity.

Daley's statement to prosecutors has not been made public, and neither Daley nor anyone in his administration has publicly represented what he said.

Georges only once invoked attorney-client privilege in declining to answer a question Tuesday. Coar allowed her to decline to answer Durkin's question about a conversation she had with the mayor's chief of staff, Ron Huberman, shortly after the federal raid.

Georges' testimony that she was unaware Intergovernmental Affairs officials were involved in hiring for Shakman-covered positions appeared to contradict a key defense theory

Durkin has argued that Georges and other top city officials knew as early as 1997 that Intergovernmental Affairs kept lists of politically connected job applicants.

Intergovernmental Affairs officials turned the lists over to Georges and former Corporation Counsel Brian Crowe in connection with an unrelated federal investigation, Durkin has said.

Coar has blocked jurors from hearing testimony about the defense theory. He is expected to rule on the matter Wednesday.

Georges also testified about how Daley administration officials decided to admit publicly last year that politics had affected some hiring.

FBI agents arrived at City Hall armed with search warrants about 8 p.m. April 29, 2005. Georges said she remained with them at the mayor's office until almost 3 a.m. April 30.

Georges said she personally investigated the 2004 hiring of truck drivers by pulling records from the Personnel Department. What she found there, she said, prompted a news conference in late May 2005.

Coar sustained objections from prosecutors when Durkin asked, "Where was the mayor in all of this?"

Georges declined comment as she left the courthouse, saying her testimony would continue Wednesday.

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

rrbush@tribune.com

Suspended Bolivar Official Enters Pleas To Felony Charges (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 14, 2006

GREENVILLE, Miss. - Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown entered not guilty pleas Tuesday to felony charges of receiving kickbacks and witness tampering.

Brown entered the pleas during a hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge Eugene Bogen.

"The reason why he pleaded not guilty is because he is truly not guilty," said attorney Douglas Greene of Fort Worth, Texas, who represented Brown at the hearing.

"He is a rookie in the middle of a veteran political game," Greene said.

Brown, 29, was arrested June 6 by FBI agents. He was later released on $20,000 bond.

At the time of his arrest, federal authorities said Brown was accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County, which was to be reimbursed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said Brown is also accused of attempting to intimidate a witness in the investigation.

Brown has been administrator in Bolivar County since April 2004. He previously was project administrator for South Delta Planning and Development District Inc. in Greenville.

On Monday, Brown was suspended without pay by the Bolivar County Board of Supervisors pending a determination by the state attorney general's office.

California Man Charged As Enforcer For Israeli Cartel Pleads Guilty (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 14, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A reputed enforcer for a notorious Israeli cartel decided to take a plea deal Tuesday in the midst of his federal trial - after a top-ranking member of the group testified against him, officials said.

Hai Waknine - a 35 year-old Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, California, and describes himself as a businessman - pleaded guilty to a single racketeering charge, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Sleisenger. Under a deal with the government, he will be sentenced to nine years in prison, Sleisenger said.

Waknine had faced 46 counts of racketeering, extortion, conspiracy, and other charges stemming from an alleged scheme to hide money embezzled from an Israeli bank by loaning it out in Miami and Los Angeles. Waknine was accused of threatening violence to get debtors to pay up.

The turnabout came shortly after a morning of testimony from Gabi Benharosh, a powerful member of an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group. Authorities say the syndicate has enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe, California, Nevada and elsewhere in the U.S.

Benharosh told jurors Waknine had helped devise the scheme and collect the money, Sleisenger said. That conflicted with the defense's argument that Waknine acted under duress and was merely doing Benharosh's bidding.

A message left with defense attorney David Kenner was not immediately returned Tuesday.

Waknine is out on $2 million (â,¬1.6 million) bond until his sentencing in September, Sleisenger said.

Benharosh agreed to a plea bargain in March but has yet to be sentenced.

Prosecutors allege that an employee of the Tel Aviv Trade Bank embezzled funds to help pay off her brother's debt to Benharosh and other members of the Jerusalem Group.

After receiving part of the funds, Benharosh wanted to leave Israel amid a police investigation into the bank employee, traveling to the U.S. where he met Waknine, prosecutors said. With Waknine's help, money was then lent to two people in Miami, one in Los Angeles.

In one case, Waknine and two associates threatened to "physically harm" a man if he did not pay back the $520,000 (â,¬413,650) that Benharosh loaned him, according to court documents.

And in March 2003, he and three others visited the Los Angeles debtor and allegedly demanded that he repay $950,000 (â,¬755,708). One of Waknine's strongmen, the victim of a bomb blast, then showed the man scars on his legs and implied the same could happen to him. Waknine later demanded an inflated repayment of $2 million (â,¬1.6 million), according to prosecutors.

Duke's Redick Charged With DWI, Cancels Orlando Workout (WP)

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Duke basketball star J.J. Redick was arrested early yesterday in Durham, N.C., on charges of drunken driving, another blow to a school shaken by a lacrosse scandal.

Redick, the Associated Press player of the year, also was charged with unlawful use of highways for making an illegal U-turn.

Redick, who has a Virginia driver's license, lost his driving privileges in North Carolina for 30 days, police spokeswoman Kammie Michael said.

DOJ_NMG_0033723

Redick, 21, was released on $1,000 bond shortly after being taken before a Durham County magistrate. He is to appear in court July 17. The arresting officer wrote in his report that Redick had "very glassy eyes, strong odor of alcohol coming from breath."

Redick had a blood-alcohol level of 0.11 percent. The legal limit for drivers in North Carolina is 0.08.

"I regret what happened last night and want to apologize to my family and the Duke community for the incident," Redick said in a statement issued by the university.

Redick finished his career as the leading scorer in ACC history, averaging 27 points per game last season. He is expected to be a high first-round pick in the June 28 NBA draft.

On Monday, he canceled a workout scheduled for today with the Orlando Magic, which has the No. 11 pick in the draft. Magic spokesman Joel Glass declined to say why Redick backed out, and no workout had been rescheduled.

"J.J. knows he made a mistake and regrets it," Duke Coach Mike Krzyzewski said in a statement. "He represented the very best in college athletics and exhibited outstanding character at Duke the last four years. He is and will continue to be a credit to the Duke basketball family. As his friend and his coach, he has my total support."

-- From News Services

Antigua Hits Back At US Gaming Laws (FT)

By Frances Williams In Geneva

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

The tiny Caribbean island state of Antigua and Barbuda has taken the first steps to haul the US back before the world trade court in a long-running dispute over internet gambling.

Antigua, which has a population of 68,000, says Washington has failed to comply with a World Trade Organisation ruling last year that US internet gambling laws discriminate against foreign suppliers. As a result, Antigua claims to have lost a large chunk of the rapidly growing offshore gaming business it has been building to diversify its economy away from tourism. US gamblers are estimated to account for about half the $12bn global internet gaming market.

This week, Antigua requested meetings with the US, a prelude to the establishment of a WTO panel to judge compliance. If, after any appeals, the WTO finds the US still in breach of fair trade rules Antigua can ask for permission to retaliate. "Obviously, we are going to have to be a bit creative in order to come up with something to motivate the Americans," Mark Mendel, a US lawyer advising Antigua, said after the April 3 2006 deadline set for US compliance expired.

Antigua is especially aggrieved because the US has taken no action to implement the WTO ruling, claiming - on the basis of an interpretive statement by the justice department - that its laws are already in compliance.

"Antigua and Barbuda does not believe that a simple restatement of a legal position taken by a party to a dispute . . . can be considered a [compliance] measure," Antigua says in its consultation request.

The US argues it does not discriminate against foreign suppliers of internet gambling services because domestic suppliers are equally restricted in offering services across state boundaries.

The WTO agreed the US ban on cross-border gambling services could be justified under WTO rules to protect "public morals" but pointed out remote gambling wagers were permitted under the 1978 Interstate Horseracing Act. Allowing remote gambling on horse races while banning the remote supply of gambling services from overseas suppliers was discriminatory, it said.

www.wto.org

Rep. Kennedy Gets Probation After Guilty Plea (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy, who lost control of his car near the Capitol last month in what he says was a drug-induced stupor, pleaded guilty yesterday to driving under the influence of prescription medication and could face 10 days in jail if he fails to comply with a long list of court-imposed conditions.

Placed on probation for a year, Kennedy (D-R.I.) must meet monthly with the psychiatrist overseeing his after-care treatment and attend weekly meetings of a recovery group and Alcoholics Anonymous. Kennedy also must submit to random drug screening and meet regularly with a psychiatrist to monitor his mood and anxiety and use of mental health medications.

"I've always said that I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions," Kennedy said in a brief statement outside the D.C. courthouse. "Today in court, I did just that. I accepted the consequences of my actions."

DOJ_NMG_0033724

The plea agreement, which was in the works when Kennedy returned from a month-long stay at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, was presented yesterday afternoon in D.C. Superior Court. Earlier in the day, Kennedy was charged with driving under the influence, reckless driving, and driving without a permit. The latter two charges were dropped in return for the guilty plea.

Kennedy, 38, who has admitted abusing pain pills and alcohol as an adult, has said that he took prescription medication to calm stomach inflammation and to help him sleep the night of the crash. He has said that he does not recall getting out of bed and has no memory of the May 4 accident in the 100 block of C Street SE, outside the Cannon House Office Building.

U.S. Capitol Police officers suspected that Kennedy was intoxicated when he staggered out of his Ford Mustang shortly before 3 a.m. after he nearly hit a police car and then crashed into a security barrier. But the six-term congressman -- who said he was trying to reach the Capitol for a vote -- was not given a sobriety test. Instead, Capitol Police commanders ordered that Kennedy be driven to his nearby home, touching off complaints that the son of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) received special treatment.

Appearing yesterday before Magistrate Judge Aida L. Melendez in a courtroom filled with reporters and curious courthouse employees, Kennedy looked calm and attentive as the events of that night were recounted.

Deputy D.C. Attorney General David M. Rubenstein said that after emerging from his green 1997 Ford Mustang, Kennedy was slurring his words and nearly fell over at one point. Kennedy was not carrying his driver's license or his congressional identification, and his eyes were red and watery, Rubenstein said.

When officers brought him home, Kennedy spent several minutes trying to open a gate before realizing that his house was next door, Rubenstein said.

A day later, Kennedy left for the Mayo Clinic to be treated for an addiction to prescription medicines. It was his second trip to the clinic in less than a year, he said. He had been a patient there during Congress's winter recess and had left the clinic "reinvigorated and healthy," he said.

Next to his attorney, N. Richard Janis, Kennedy was clear and firm in his responses to the judge's routine inquiries about his intention to plead guilty and the implications of such a decision. "Yes," he was satisfied with his attorney's service. "No," he had not taken any drugs or medication in the last two days. Only once was he more expansive. "I am pleading guilty to driving under the influence," he said.

Last week, Kennedy made his first public appearance since his clinic stay. Speaking at a Brown University conference on mental health care and addiction treatment, he said he was "confident" about his health and "positive" about his future. Kennedy also said last week that Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.), who is a recovering alcoholic, had visited him at the clinic and would serve as his sponsor in recovery.

Ramstad was in court with Kennedy yesterday. Afterward, as Kennedy addressed reporters, he singled out Ramstad for thanks, calling him a "true friend."

"Personally now, he has been so important to me in this very difficult time," Kennedy said.

Recalling his own wake-up call 25 years ago, Ramstad said he was happy to be Kennedy's sponsor. "He's accepted his addiction, and he's going to be just fine one day at a time," Ramstad said.

Kennedy did not take any questions as he and his entourage left the plaza in front of the courthouse. He ignored a reporter's question about whether he had been drinking the night of the crash; he had said in May that he did not consume alcohol that evening.

Traci L. Hughes, a spokeswoman for the D.C. attorney general's office, said no evidence has been uncovered to indicate that Kennedy was drinking before the crash.

Kennedy also did not respond when asked whether he intended to resign. His spokeswoman said that he has no intention of doing so.

But the next year is likely to be one of the more scrutinized of his life, with the regular doctor visits, the random drug tests and the weekly AA meetings that were ordered by the judge.

Along with those conditions, he must perform 50 hours of community service with the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington and must contribute $250 to the organization. Also, he must not use illicit substances or engage in any other illegal activity.

If he goes astray in any way, he could be in trouble with the court. Melendez sentenced him to 10 days in jail and a $300 fine but suspended both penalties -- meaning she can impose them if Kennedy violates the terms of his probation.

Kennedy, who was born in Massachusetts, graduated from Providence College and stayed in Rhode Island to launch his political career. He was elected to the state House of Representatives in 1988 at age 21 and was reelected in 1990 and 1992 before moving to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0033725

Representative Kennedy Reaches Deal (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — Representative Patrick J. Kennedy pleaded guilty this afternoon to driving under the influence of prescription drugs in connection with a car crash near the Capitol early on the morning of May 4 and was placed on probation for one year.

Mr. Kennedy, 38, entered his plea in District of Columbia Superior Court, where two other charges, reckless driving and failure to exhibit a driving permit, were dismissed under an agreement he reached with prosecutors.

"I am pleading guilty to driving under the influence," Mr. Kennedy told Magistrate Judge Aida Melendez, according to The Associated Press.

Judge Melendez said that Mr. Kennedy would serve 10 days in jail if he violated his probation and that he must continue drug treatment. The judge also fined the congressman $350, of which $250 will go to the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington and the remaining $100 to a crime victims' fund.

Standing in the sunshine outside the courthouse afterward, Mr. Kennedy said, "I accepted the consequences of my actions." He said he was looking forward to "the next chapter of my life."

Mr. Kennedy appeared with Representative Jim Ramstad, a Minnesota Republican whom he described as his "true friend" and sponsor, and said he was "very grateful to be on the road to recovery" and eager to get back to work for his Rhode Island constituents.

Mr. Ramstad described himself as "a grateful recovering alcoholic of nearly 25 years who had a similar wake-up call on July 31, 1981." On that day, nine years before he was elected to Congress, he awoke in jail after a night of drinking ended in a brawl, according to The Almanac of American Politics.

Mr. Ramstad's ties to the Kennedy family go back more than four decades. He met President John F. Kennedy in 1963 in the same Rose Garden ceremony where a young Bill Clinton was photographed shaking the president's hand, according to the political almanac. Mr. Ramstad appeared in the background of the now-famous picture.

Representative Kennedy, a six-term Democrat and the son of Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, checked himself into the Mayo Clinic the day after the crash to be treated for drug dependency.

The congressman has said that he has no memory of driving his car into a security barrier around 3 a.m., and that he had not been drinking beforehand, even though the initial police report listed alcohol as a factor in the accident. Rather, Mr. Kennedy has said, he was under the influence of prescription anti-nausea and sleep medications, which he had taken at the "prescribed amount."

Shortly after leaving the Mayo Clinic, the congressman said he continued to suffer from bipolar disorder and a tendency toward addiction. "The key to recovery will be a small group of people who will watch over me," he said at a news conference.

And at a Rhode Island health-care conference on June 5, Mr. Kennedy said he was "confident about my health, positive about my future and passionate about my work representing the people of a Rhode Island."

The congressman said he was touched by the outpouring of support he had received "from everyone from priests to police officers." Mr. Kennedy said a Congressional colleague, a Republican, told him he was "praying that your experiences and your struggles will become your greatest blessings."

Kennedy Sentenced After Guilty Plea To DUI (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Miga

AP2, June 13, 2006

A judge sentenced Rep. Patrick Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) to drug treatment and a year's probation after he pleaded guilty Tuesday to driving under the influence of prescription drugs.

Kennedy, D-R.I., will also pay $350 in connection with his middle-of-the-night car crash last month near the Capitol that he has said he has no memory of.

Two other charges against Kennedy were dismissed as part of a plea deal: reckless driving and failure to exhibit a driving permit.

Accompanied by his lawyer, the son of Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., entered his plea Tuesday afternoon before District of Columbia Superior Court Magistrate Judge Aida Melendez.

"I am pleading guilty to driving under the influence," he said.

Melendez ordered Kennedy to undergo court-monitored drug treatment and pay $350 — $250 of which would go to the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington, and $100 to a crime victims' fund. She also gave Kennedy a 10-day jail sentence that was suspended unless he violates probation, and she ordered him to serve 50 hours of community service with the boys and girls club.

DOJ_NMG_0033726

"I've always said that I wanted to accept full responsibility for my actions," Kennedy told reporters outside the courthouse. "Today in court, I did just that. I accepted the consequences of my actions. I look forward today to moving on to the next chapter in my life."

Kennedy was joined in court by Rep. Jim Ramstad (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn., who is his sponsor in Alcoholics Anonymous. Ramstad said he'd had a "wake-up call" similar to Kennedy's several years ago.

"I'm grateful he has accepted his addiction and he is going to be just fine one day at a time," Ramstad said.

D.C. Attorney General Robert Spagnoletti issued a statement saying Kennedy "has been treated like any other citizen found guilty of driving under the influence," and is expected to honor the terms of his probation.

Under the plea deal, Kennedy must attend weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous and a recovery group facilitated by his physician, Dr. Ronald Smith. He must check in with Ramstad once a week and submit to random urine screenings for drug abuse.

Kennedy also has to meet regularly with a "qualified psychiatrist to monitor mood symptoms, anxiety and use of psychotropic prescription medications," according to court documents.

Because of his guilty plea, Kennedy's driving privileges will be revoked in D.C. for six months, an aide said. Kennedy has notified Rhode Island registry officials of his plea and expects his Rhode Island license will also be suspended, the aide said.

Kennedy returned to Congress last week after nearly a month of treatment for addiction to prescription pain drugs at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota.

The six-term congressman, who has struggled with addiction since high school, entered the clinic one day after the May 4 crash on Capitol Hill that he said he could not remember.

The accident has raised questions about whether Kennedy, 38, was drinking and had received special treatment by police, who did not conduct field sobriety tests. He has denied consuming alcohol before the crash.

In the hours before the crash, Kennedy said he returned home from work and took a sleeping pill, Ambien, and Phenergan, a prescription anti-nausea drug that can cause drowsiness. He said he did not consume alcohol and has denied ever seeking special treatment.

Kennedy crashed his green 1997 Ford Mustang convertible into a security barrier near the Capitol about 2:47 a.m. The officer listed alcohol influence as a contributing factor in the crash and noted that Kennedy was "ability impaired," with red, watery eyes, slurred speech and unsteady balance, according to the accident report.

Kennedy told the police officer he was "headed to the Capitol to make a vote," the report said. He was cited for failure to keep in the proper lane, traveling at "unreasonable speed" and failing to "give full time and attention" to operating his vehicle.

Kennedy's office has said that it has not received those initial citations.

Police did not conduct field sobriety tests on Kennedy. The officers involved in the accident were instructed by a superior to take the congressman home, Rubenstein said. Kennedy initially directed the officers to the wrong Capitol Hill address and spent several minutes in vain trying to unlock a gate before he was taken to his home, Rubenstein told the court.

Kennedy Pleads Guilty To DUI, Gets Probation (RC)

By John McArdle

Roll Call, June 14, 2006

After pleading guilty to one count of driving under the influence of drugs Tuesday, Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.) will begin fulfilling the terms of his plea agreement this week.

In exchange for the guilty plea, the Office of the Attorney General for the District of Columbia subsequently dropped two other charges of reckless driving and failure to exhibit a permit.

Kennedy, who was both arraigned and sentenced in D.C. Superior Court on Tuesday, caused a late-night car accident on Capitol Hill in early May after taking a combination of prescription drugs. He subsequently checked himself into the Mayo Clinic for rehabilitation, staying there for one month before returning to work last week.

The plea agreement, which was accepted by D.C. Magistrate Judge Aida Melendez, set several terms including a 12-month probation period, 50 hours of community service, random urine drug-abuse screenings and some $350 in fines. N. Richard Janis, a lawyer for Kennedy, said the Congressman planned to pay the fines — $100 of which will go to a crime victims fund and $250 of which will go to the Boys & Girls Clubs of Greater Washington — before the end of the week.

Melendez also suspended a 10-day jail sentence and another $300 in fines that Kennedy also would have to fulfill if he violates any part of his plea agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0033727

During the sentencing, Janis sought to have Kennedy's probation period shortened, noting that "Congressman Kennedy immediately accepted responsibility" for the incident and that the drug treatment plan laid out in the plea agreement was developed by Kennedy's physicians at the Mayo Clinic.

And though Kennedy has admitted only to being under the influence of the prescription drugs Phenergan and Ambien in the early-morning hours of May 4 when he crashed his Ford Mustang into a vehicle barrier at First and C streets Southeast, his plea agreement mandates that he must attend weekly Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and have weekly contact with an AA sponsor.

Kennedy's sponsor, former Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) — who visited Kennedy during his month-long stay at the clinic in Rochester, Minn. — explained outside the courthouse on Tuesday that the AA program is designed "for people of all chemical addictions."

Kennedy, who holds a Rhode Island driver's license, also could have his driving privileges revoked pending a review from the Department of Motor Vehicles for D.C. and the state of Rhode Island.

"This is a fairly typical sentence of someone being convicted for driving under the influence for the first time," said Tracey Hughes, director of communications for the D.C. Office of the Attorney General, in a press conference after Kennedy's court appearance. "I would say the highlight of this plea agreement is that Mr. Kennedy agreed to get help and agreed to continued monitoring" for drug abuse.

In a statement released after the hearing, D.C. Attorney General Robert Spagnoletti called the agreement "fair and in the best interest of the District. Mr. Kennedy has been treated like any other citizen found guilty of Driving Under the Influence, and he will be expected to comply with the conditions of his probation imposed by the court today."

"I've always said that I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions and today in court I did just that," Kennedy said in a brief press appearance outside the courthouse. Kennedy praised the professionalism of the Capitol Police Department and the attorney general's office in handling his case.

Before his arraignment and sentencing on Tuesday, Kennedy appeared at Capitol Police headquarters to be booked on the charges from the accident.

A Capitol Police spokeswoman declined to comment on the case Tuesday afternoon and referred questions to the D.C. attorney general's office. A department release Tuesday evening said, "The Capitol Police consider this matter closed."

But Capitol Police Labor Committee Chairman Andy Maybo did release a statement commending Kennedy "for stepping up and taking responsibility for his actions. Although he may have violated the law, he has set an example to all Americans that regardless of who you are, it is not ok to commit a crime and one must take responsibility for his or her own actions."

Local and national police labor officials — who raised concerns that Kennedy had received preferential treatment the night of his car accident when Capitol Police management kept officers from conducting a field sobriety test and collecting evidence at the scene of the accident — have monitored the case closely.

Maybo said Tuesday that the members of the Capitol Police Labor Committee "wish Congressman Kennedy well on his road to recovery."

During Tuesday's arraignment, a few new details of what happened the night of Kennedy's crash came to light.

In outlining the case that the attorney general's office would have presented had it gone forward with a trial, Deputy Attorney General David Rubenstein told Judge Melendez that several Capitol Police officers would testify to the fact that in their opinion Kennedy was under the influence of a substance, including the two officers who drove Kennedy home that night.

Rubenstein said that when the officers dropped Kennedy off he initially identified the wrong house as being his residence and tried to unlock an outside gate of a house next door to his for several minutes before realizing he was at the wrong home.

And though the Capitol Police traffic report from the crash noted that Kennedy's ability was impaired the night of the incident and that alcohol influence was a primary contributing factor in the accident, Hughes said Tuesday that "there was not enough evidence gathered in the investigation to bring the charge of DUI alcohol" in the case.

According to the Capitol Police traffic report, Kennedy was traveling at "a high rate of speed" at approximately 2:45 a.m. May 4 when an officer noticed he was swerving into the wrong lane.

The car did not have its lights on, and after hitting a curb the car swerved "back into the wrong lane of travel thereby causing [a Capitol Police Patrol Division officer] to use evasive maneuvers in order to avoid a collision with the vehicle," the report reads. The car then slowed down and collided with a vehicle barrier at First and C streets Southeast.

Upon approaching the vehicle, the report states, the officer found Kennedy to be at the wheel and observed that his "eyes were red and watery, speech was slightly slurred, and upon exiting his vehicle, his balance was unsure."

Kennedy stated to the officer that he was "headed to the Capitol to make a vote."

DOJ_NMG_0033728

Other contributing factors to the accident noted by the Capitol Police were speed, driving on the wrong side of the street and driver inattention.

Rep. Kennedy Cops A Plea For May DUI (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, June 14, 2006

Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.) pleaded guilty to driving under the influence of drugs as a part of an extensive agreement the lawmaker reached with the District of Columbia Office of the Attorney General.

"I've always said that I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions. Today in court I did just that," Kennedy said in a brief meeting with reporters after appearing before D.C. Superior Court Magistrate Judge Aida Melendez. "I accepted the consequences of my actions. I've cooperated fully with the Capitol Police and with the attorney general's office.

"I think they've done a fantastic job. … I look forward today to moving on to the next chapter of my life."

Kennedy entered the guilty plea on the condition that the two other charges, reckless driving and failure to exhibit a permit, would be dropped.

"I am pleading guilty to driving under the influence," Kennedy told Melendez.

The lengthy plea agreement stipulates a 12-month probationary period, monthly meetings with Dr. Ronald Smith at Bethesda Naval Hospital, attendance at weekly recovery-group meetings and weekly Alcoholics Anonymous meetings. In addition, Kennedy must submit to random urine and drug-abuse screenings and maintain regular contact with a "qualified psychiatrist."

Kennedy must also maintain weekly contact with an AA sponsor.

Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) is Kennedy's sponsor. "Jim has been a true friend of mine," Kennedy said. "He has been so important to me in this very difficult time."

Ramstad, who is a recovering alcoholic, attended the court proceedings, sitting in the front row of the courtroom.

"He's accepted his addiction, and he is going to be just fine one day at a time," Ramstad told reporters.

"I am absolutely convinced that Mr. Kennedy will continue to work his program one day at a time because I'm his sponsor," Ramstad said. "This is the first time in his life that as a Democrat he's answering to a Republican — he's going to do what I tell him."

Ramstad said that AA is not just for alcoholics but also for people addicted to other substances.

Upon accepting Kennedy's plea, Melendez added a 10-day jail sentence and a $300 fine — both of which will be suspended as long as Kennedy abides by the terms of the plea agreement. He will also have to pay $100 to the Victims of Crime Fund, as stipulated by D.C. code, and will make a $250 donation to the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington, in addition to completing 50 hours of community service there.

Traci Hughes, director of communications for the D.C. Office of the Attorney General, expressed satisfaction that the matter had been brought to a close.

"The attorney general would like me to convey that he has treated Mr. Kennedy just as any other defendant in this type of situation — [he] was not given any special treatment," she said.

She said the sentence is typical for a first-time offender.

The Capitol Police referred to the Office of the Attorney General's remarks and offered no further statement.

Andy Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police, expressed support for Kennedy.

"I commend Congressman Kennedy for stepping up and taking responsibility for his actions," Maybo said in an e-mail. "Kennedy has set an example to all Americans that regardless of who you are, it is not OK to commit a crime.

"We all wish him well on his road to recovery."

Kennedy turned himself in to Capitol Police headquarters around noon yesterday before traveling to the Superior Court of the District of Columbia for arraignment and sentencing.

The initial Capitol Police arrest report cited three traffic violations: failure to keep in the proper lane, unreasonable speed and failure to give full time and attention to the operation of a vehicle. Those violations carry a total of $80 in fines, according to Robin Costello, Kennedy's press secretary.

It is unclear whether Kennedy will also have to pay the fine for the traffic tickets or whether his DUI guilty plea nullifies them.

Kennedy's admission comes more than a month after he crashed his green Ford Mustang into security barriers at C and 1st streets at 2:45 a.m. May 4.

The lawmaker's "eyes were red and watery, [his] speech was slightly slurred and upon exiting the vehicle, his balance was unsure," according to the incident report.

DOJ_NMG_0033729

Kennedy reportedly told police that evening after identifying himself that he was “late for a vote.” Votes had concluded several hours earlier.

During the court proceedings, Deputy Attorney General for Public Safety David Rubenstein added details provided to the office by the Capitol Police, including that when two sergeants drove the lawmaker home he pointed out the wrong house and spent several minutes trying to unlock the gate until he realized his residence was the house next door.

Kennedy said he had been disoriented because he was taking two prescription medications at the time.

On May 5, Kennedy convened a press conference and told reporters that he was checking himself into the Mayo Clinic for treatment for an addiction to prescription painkillers. Kennedy returned to the House last week after spending several weeks in rehabilitation.

Leaders of the Capitol Police were roundly criticized after the incident for failing to administer a field sobriety test, and the two sergeants who drove the lawmaker home dismissed the officer who initially attempted to pull Kennedy over.

As a part of the police investigation, the Capitol Police reassigned the watch commander who instructed officers not to follow regular procedures.

Rep. Kennedy Gets Probation In DUI Plea Deal (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (D-R.I.) pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge of driving under the influence of prescription drugs in a plea bargain with prosecutors stemming from a middle-of-the-night incident last month in which he nearly sideswiped a police cruiser.

District of Columbia Superior Court Magistrate Judge Aida Melendez placed the six-term congressman on supervised probation for a year. He was ordered to attend weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous, confer regularly with a psychiatrist, submit to random drug tests and contribute $100 to a crime victims fund and $250 to the Boys & Girls Clubs of Greater Washington, where he will also do 50 hours of community service.

If Kennedy violates the terms of his probation, she added, he will go to jail for 10 days and pay a fine.

"I've always said I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions, and today in court I did just that," Kennedy said after his sentence was announced.

"I'm grateful to be on the road to recovery," he added.

Standing at Kennedy's side as he talked to reporters on the courthouse steps was not his father — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) — but a Republican colleague from Minnesota.

"As a grateful recovering alcoholic of 25 years, I'm pleased to be his sponsor," Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) said. "He's accepted his addiction and he's going to be just fine, one day at a time."

Kennedy, 38, has said he has struggled with depression and drug addiction since he was a teenager. He was treated for cocaine abuse after he graduated from high school.

The incident that led to his courtroom appearance Tuesday began at 2:47 a.m. May 4, when Kennedy crashed his green 1997 Ford Mustang convertible into a security barrier on Capitol Hill. According to a report filed by the Capitol Police, he stumbled from the car, telling officers that he was rushing to make a vote. The House had adjourned three hours earlier.

The police report described Kennedy as "unsteady on his feet," with "slightly slurred speech" and "red and watery" eyes.

Later that day, Kennedy released a statement saying that he had consumed no alcohol but acknowledging that he had taken two prescription medications: Ambien for sleeplessness and Phenergan for stomach inflammation. The next day, he called a news conference to say that he was checking himself into the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., to treat an addiction to prescription drugs.

Kennedy stayed in Minnesota for 28 days, and Ramstad visited every Saturday, accompanying him to recovery meetings. Ramstad, who quit drinking 25 years ago after he woke up from an alcohol-induced blackout in a jail cell in Sioux Falls, S.D., will get a weekly call from Kennedy under the terms of probation.

Ramstad said in an interview Tuesday that Kennedy had told him, "This is the first time in my life I'll have a Republican telling me what to do." In 2004, the two founded the House Addiction, Treatment and Recovery Caucus, which educates legislators on addiction issues and promotes greater access to treatment.

During Kennedy's May 5 news conference, when he announced he was entering treatment, his voice cracked as he said, "I simply do not remember getting out of bed, being pulled over by the police or being cited for three driving infractions."

The Capitol Police drove him home that night and did not conduct a field sobriety test, leading to some criticism of a double standard for elected officials.

DOJ_NMG_0033730

In March, Rep. Cynthia A. McKinney (D-Ga.) was involved in an incident with Capitol Police in which she was alleged to have struck an officer who attempted to stop her at a security checkpoint. Charges against her are still being considered, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office said Tuesday.

For Kennedy, whose mother, Joan, has battled alcoholism throughout her life, the denouement on the courthouse steps was the result of a plea deal in which prosecutors dropped charges of reckless driving and of driving without exhibiting a permit. Kennedy, who despite his troubles is considered a safe bet for reelection in his Democratic district, has said the accident was also a wake-up call.

"Every day I'm on my knees thanking God that I didn't hurt somebody," he said last month.

Rep. Kennedy Gets Supervised Probation For DUI (CHIT)

By Johanna Neuman

Chicago Tribune, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.) pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge of driving under the influence of prescription drugs in a plea bargain with prosecutors stemming from a middle-of-the-night incident last month in which he nearly sideswiped a police cruiser.

District of Columbia Superior Court Magistrate Judge Aida Melendez placed the six-term congressman on supervised probation for a year. He was ordered to attend weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous, confer regularly with a psychiatrist and submit to random urine tests.

Kennedy also was ordered to contribute $100 to a crime victims fund and $250 to the Boys and Girls Club of Greater Washington, where he will do 50 hours of community service.

If Kennedy violates the terms of his probation, she added, he will go to jail for 10 days and pay a fine.

"I've always said I wanted to take full responsibility for my actions, and today in court I did just that," Kennedy said after his sentence was announced. "I accepted the consequences of my actions. ... I'm grateful to be on the road to recovery."

Standing at Kennedy's side as he talked to reporters on the courthouse steps was not his father—Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts—but a Republican colleague from Minnesota who is himself a recovering alcoholic.

"As a grateful recovering alcoholic of 25 years, I'm pleased to be his sponsor," said Rep. Jim Ramstad. "He's accepted his addiction and he's going to be just fine, one day at a time."

Kennedy, 38, has said he has struggled with depression and drug addiction since he was a teenager. He was treated for cocaine abuse after graduating from high school.

The incident that led to his courtroom appearance Tuesday began at 2:47 a.m. on May 4 when Kennedy crashed his green 1997 Ford Mustang convertible into a security barrier on Capitol Hill. According to a report filed by the Capitol Police, he stumbled from the car, telling officers that he was rushing to make a vote. The House had adjourned three hours earlier, and the last vote on May 3 was cast at 9:06 p.m.

The police report described Kennedy as "unsteady on his feet," with "slightly slurred speech" and "red and watery" eyes.

The Capitol Police drove him home that night and did not conduct a field sobriety test, leading to some criticism of a double standard for elected officials.

Later that day, Kennedy released a statement insisting that he had consumed no alcohol but acknowledging that he had taken two prescription medications, Ambien for sleeplessness and Phenergan for stomach inflammation. The next day, he called a news conference to say he was checking himself into the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., to treat an addiction to prescription drugs.

Kennedy stayed in Minnesota for 28 days, and Ramstad visited every Saturday, accompanying him to recovery meetings. Ramstad, who quit drinking 25 years ago after he woke up from an alcoholic blackout in a jail cell in Sioux Falls, S.D., will get a weekly call from Kennedy under the terms of probation.

Ramstad said Tuesday that Kennedy had told him, "This is the first time in my life I'll have a Republican telling me what to do."

As part of the plea deal, prosecutors dropped charges of reckless driving and of driving without exhibiting a permit.

Los Angeles Times

FBI Web Site Attracts Tipsters, Whistleblowers Against Public Corruption (FOX)

Fox News, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033731

WASHINGTON — Even with stories about public corruption probes flooding the morning papers, Internet and cable news airwaves, the FBI's new Web site for individuals to report malfeasance and just plain bad behavior hasn't made splashy headlines.

But the site, reportcorruption.fbi.gov, is up and running and the G-Men are paying attention.

"They don't want me to get into numbers, but, yes, we have had credible tips already," said Steve Kodak, an FBI spokesman.

It turns out that while tip lines have been in use by nearly every major and minor police department in the nation for years, the FBI's public corruption Web site, created last month, is somewhat of a new venture.

The idea is an offshoot of the Hurricane Katrina fraud tip line, which was created when law enforcement officers realized the outpouring of public support in rebuilding the Gulf Coast after last year's hurricanes wasn't benefiting just the people of Louisiana. A report out Tuesday by the Government Accountability Office reveals the government doled out an estimated $1.4 billion for fraudulent requests for assistance.

Over the past five years, the FBI has increased the number of agents dedicated to anti-corruption efforts from 450 to about 620. Of late, they have been kept busy with a persistent drumbeat of corruption-related cases involving congressional and federal officials.

On the wall of shame lately has been Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who saw his tenure in the House of Representatives come to an end after a newspaper revealed strange real estate deals involving the congressman that led to the uncovering of $2.4 million in bribes given to the California Republican in exchange for lucrative government contracts.

Elsewhere, court documents allege Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., took $100,000 in bribe money — an act that FBI agents say is caught on videotape. Agents apparently recovered $90,000 of the marked cash from Jefferson's home freezer, and claim they saw him trying to hide certain documents from agents while they were searching his house last year. The congressman has denied wrongdoing, and no charges have been filed against him, but an aide to Jefferson and a businessman have entered related guilty pleas.

The lobbying schemes surrounding Jack Abramoff have so far garnered federal plea deals from Abramoff; Neil Volz, a lobbyist and former aide to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio; and Tony Rudy, a former aide to former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas. A jury is currently deliberating the case against David Safavian, a top procurement official who is accused of lying to ethics regulators about his connections to Abramoff and a pricey golf trip he took with the lobbyist to Scotland.

No charges have been filed against Ney or DeLay, but they remain in the investigative crosshairs, and their political fortunes have taken turns for the worse. DeLay is facing unrelated charges in Texas of campaign money laundering. He retired from the House last week. Ney was forced to give up his position as chairman of the House Administration Committee.

Each of the investigations has spun off a web of new inquiries. Many more probes — from shady campaign tactics to corporate favoritism — are being conducted at the state and local levels.

With the list of investigations so long, Kodak said it is no coincidence the FBI is ramping up its efforts. "Obviously not, with everything that's going on lately," he said.

Tipsters from any walk of life are welcome to report suspicious activities, but since most of the would-be criminal action occurs behind closed doors, the bureau expects most contributions to come from individuals who work within the government.

The FBI's anti-corruption Web site offers visitors links where they can enter a tip or find phone numbers for local FBI field offices. Kodak said tipsters can leave as much or as little information as they want and assures that if tipsters want to remain anonymous, the FBI won't reveal their identities.

Because corruption cases take a long time to build, Kodak couldn't say how long it might take for this latest effort to bear fruit. He also acknowledged that anonymous tips make investigations more difficult because they're harder to verify and the possibility exists that some people might use the Web site to settle personal vendettas. But the problems don't outweigh the value of the program, he said.

"That's always been the case with any type of tip," Kodak said. "It all comes down to the field agent doing good ground work."

The Potential Downside of Tattling

Asked whether the National Security Agency might be called in to fish out an anonymous tipster against his or her will — a possibility, albeit remote, given the NSA's access to phone records and matrices of who's been calling whom — Kodak steered clear of the suggestion.

"We have never had a case where if someone was to remain anonymous, that we were to track that person down," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0033732

But Frankie Bailey, an associate professor at the SUNY University at Albany's criminal justice department, said some people might be scared away from using the site anyway.

The site doesn't say tipsters must leave personal information, but it doesn't exactly encourage anonymous tips. The tip page has space for all sorts of identification, which Bailey said she believes would be necessary to make necessary follow-up for tip verification.

"I don't know how they'd be able to follow up unless you left enough information. ... I would think they would need at least enough to get back to you," Bailey said.

One ex-cop says it's not out of the question that an anonymous tipster would be outed, or those trying to clean up corruption would become targets of retribution.

Peter Mancuso retired from the New York City police department in 1987 as assistant director of training. Around the same time, a massive corruption probe began looking into renegade police officers whose extracurricular activities included robbing drug dealers and re-selling their wares for personal profit. As indictments rained down, those who were trying to help uncover the criminal activity became targets themselves, Mancuso said.

Officers who reported corruption either were ignored or faced disciplinary actions for going against their superiors, he said. In one case, an officer who was an internal affairs plant in a corrupt precinct later faced perjury charges regarding his participation in the probe. Another officer faced disciplinary action after trying to place an anonymous tip. He was identified after the investigation began.

Trying to establish a public advocate for anti-corruption efforts, Mancuso and a group of retired officers sought to strike a difficult balance between distancing investigators from the active-duty police force and not becoming beholden to politicians whom they needed to gain enough political heft to raise a stink if future corruption went unchecked.

They hoped to amass allegations from current officers to present to higher authorities if normal channels of communication broke down. The group set up a tip line, got press coverage and waited for the calls to come in. But they didn't come. Eventually the effort fizzled out, Mancuso said.

Mancuso, who now runs a business in the Philadelphia suburbs, said he thinks the tip line didn't ring because the top echelons of the police department never endorsed it. The key is to put as much distance between the agency investigating the corruption and those who hold sway over the people reporting it, something he said the federal government is just as susceptible to as smaller agencies.

"Any time a public employee faces an official — or unofficial — punishment, in a sense for reporting corruption, it's obvious to me that that is an impediment," Mancuso said.

In some cases, it might be impossible to shield anonymous tipsters because only a handful of people would be privy to the information being reported, said Randall Eliason, who was in charge of the Justice Department's Public Corruption/Government Fraud Section from December 1998 until August 2001.

Eliason, now an adjunct professor at American and George Washington universities, said another problem with corruption cases is that prospective tipsters might not be sure about what they saw. Other criminal cases have identifiable evidence that a crime has happened: a dead body, a bank robbery caught on surveillance tape; a missing child.

But something that could be seen as corruption could also be a benign business transaction. And even if someone did see money exchanging hands between politicians, it's hard to prove the intent without catching the act on videotape.

"When you're trying to combat that, and predict what was in someone's mind ... the best proof of that is if you got someone on tape," Eliason said.

But catching corruption on tape poses its own problems, Eliason said. Informants who participate in police probes might be doing it to avoid prosecution, and they make less-than-perfect witnesses. It's even harder to orchestrate a sting operation to catch corrupt officials, like when the Justice Department got agents to pose as Arab sheiks in the Abscam bribery probe that unraveled in the beginning of the 1980s, netting multiple convictions of members of Congress.

The way campaign finance laws are written doesn't help either, Eliason said. Nearly everyone who makes a political contribution wants something in exchange, and it's often a matter of semantics when it comes to deciding whether an act is legal.

"Campaign contributions are considered perfectly fine, but briberies are considered illegal," Eliason said.

Bailey said the decision to report a tip also poses an ethical dilemma.

"Do you want to get someone in trouble when you don't have enough information? ... You would have to think long and hard whether or not you wanted to bring the whole force of the federal government down on someone," she said.

Nevertheless, with plenty of attention being paid to corruption, Bailey said it's a good time to roll out the site.

"The climate is right to get people to log on," she said. And even if the tips don't roll in, the FBI might not have a total loss.

DOJ_NMG_0033733

"The Web site is really interesting. Whether or not people actually report it, it draws you into the site as to what the FBI's really involved [in]. It's public relations," Bailey said.

'Suspicious Box' Blown Up Near Courthouse May Have Contained Criminal Evidence (LAW)

By Julie Kay, Daily Business Review

Miami Daily Business Review, June 14, 2006

When police blew up a suspicious box that caused the evacuation of two federal buildings in downtown Miami, they may have blown up a federal criminal case.

Authorities evacuated the courthouses Monday due to a bomb scare. The Miami Police bomb squad responded and destroyed the box, but it may have contained evidence from a just-decided case.

The James Lawrence King Federal Justice Building and the David W. Dyer Federal Building both were evacuated at about 2:30 p.m. for an hour or so on Monday. Hundreds of attorneys and courthouse staffers were ushered out of the buildings by federal marshals wearing yellow vests. They were directed to the street in front of the Federal Detention Center while the bomb squad did its work. Federal judges and magistrates were taken out of the building separately and taken to an undisclosed location.

"A special robot went over to the box, and it went kaboom," said Mark Schnapp, a partner at Greenberg Traurig in Miami who was at the U.S. Attorney's office when the building was evacuated.

But according to two lawyers who were present during the bomb scare and did not want to be named, it turned out that the box contained papers and evidence left on the sidewalk by a federal agent. The two lawyers said the evidence was from a criminal case in which a verdict had just been reached. That evidence included fake guns and wiretap equipment.

Lt. Bill Schwartz, a spokesman for the Miami Police Department, confirmed that the box left between the Miami Dade College campus and the James Lawrence King courthouse contained papers. But he said he had no details about the nature of the papers or who left them there. "Someone accidentally put something down," Schwartz said. "We felt the need to evacuate the buildings."

Alberto Hidalgo, a spokesman for the U.S. Marshals Service in Miami, confirmed that the box was blown up by the police bomb squad but said he had no information about what was in the box.

Matt Dates, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta, declined to comment on what the box contained. "We don't talk about security matters," he said.

If the box did contain evidence in the criminal case, it's unclear how the loss of the evidence may affect any appeal.

Some observers found humor in the situation. "That's smoking-gun evidence," said Miami criminal defense attorney David O. Markus, "just not in the way that the agent was hoping for."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Harm's Way At Hospital? (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Citing Deaths and Violence, the Justice Department Tells D.C. to Improve Care at St. Elizabeths Mental Facility

The Justice Department is demanding that the D.C. government correct problems at St. Elizabeths Hospital, saying the city-run psychiatric facility is beset by lax supervision, patient-on-patient violence and substandard care.

Two patients died in 2004 after they were attacked by other patients, and three died last year after problems with their medical care, according to an investigative report. Dozens of others have been kicked or punched in altercations, been put in restraints longer than necessary or been neglected by medical staff, the report said.

The hospital "fails to provide its patients with a reasonably safe living environment," the Justice Department said. "The facility too often subjects its patients to harm or risk of harm."

The Justice Department opened a civil rights investigation last year into conditions at the Southeast Washington hospital after a patient advocacy group flagged numerous problems. Justice officials sent their findings May 23 to Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), giving the city a list of steps that must be taken to avoid a civil rights lawsuit. There is no set deadline for the city to respond.

DOJ_NMG_0033734

The report marked the second time in recent weeks that the Justice Department has said the District government is endangering some of its most vulnerable residents. Justice lawyers asked a federal judge last month to hold the city in contempt of court for failing to improve conditions in group homes for the mentally and physically disabled.

Stephen Baron, the acting director of the District's Department of Mental Health, said city officials are working closely with the Justice Department on improvements at St. Elizabeths. During a tour of the hospital last week that he allowed a Washington Post reporter and photographer to join, Baron said conditions have improved since investigators left last June.

"It's a work in progress," said Baron, who headed Baltimore's public mental health system before coming to the District in April. He did not dispute the overall picture presented by the Justice Department but said the District is developing a detailed response.

Construction of a new hospital, expected to begin this fall, should solve many problems, Baron said. "It's not the full answer," he said. "We have quality-of-care issues to address."

To Justice Department investigators, the trouble is bigger than anything that can be fixed with bricks and mortar.

According to federal investigators, the hospital is unsafe not only for the 450 patients, but also for the 940 staff members. In spring 2004, a 60-year-old patient beat a 76-year-old to death, and a 55-year-old man died after he was stomped into a coma by another patient.

Between January and April 2005 -- the period most extensively studied in the investigation -- the hospital averaged more than one altercation involving a patient each day. Patients were involved in 138 altercations with fellow patients and 34 with the staff, the Justice Department found.

In a number of those cases, there was "little or no supervision," investigators wrote.

The report said patients "routinely" leave hospital grounds without authorization. One left the campus for four hours and returned with a crack pipe. Another was accidentally let out for grounds privileges Jan. 7, 2005, and has never returned, the report said.

In other cases, the staff was faulted for acting too harshly to control patients. Physical restraints, such as wrist and ankle straps, are supposed to be used only for the protection of patients or others -- not for punishment or the convenience of staff and only when less intrusive measures are tried first. But investigators found that the staff tied one patient to her bed with restraints on her wrists and ankles for 24 hours after a suicide attempt. The bed of another patient was outfitted with wrist restraints and a urinal.

Hospital records showed much more frequent use of restraints during the weekends, which investigators said was "clinically inexplicable" and probably indicates patients are restrained to compensate for a smaller staff on those days.

Besides the difficulties with supervision, investigators identified deficiencies in medical care. Investigators wrote that "basic nursing practices, such as monitoring vital signs, weight, and temperature, are largely absent."

The report mentions three instances in which patients died after receiving questionable medical care.

In one case, a patient returned to St. Elizabeths after treatment at another hospital for a stroke. The St. Elizabeths staff failed to perform a medical evaluation or take vital signs, investigators found. Nurses did not alert doctors when the patient had difficulty swallowing for several days. Soon after that, the patient died.

"It is inexcusable that St. Es did not provide this patient with basic medical care and monitoring, including routine monitoring of this patient's vital signs, for more than two weeks," investigators said.

In another case, a 79-year-old man returned to St. Elizabeths after an outside hospital stay for congestive heart failure. Here, too, the St. Elizabeths staff did not do enough follow-up, and he died, the Justice Department found.

Justice officials said that the staff has trouble managing patients' medications and that at least one patient "may have died as a result of St. E's gross departure from professional standards."

St. Elizabeths even fails at its core mission of delivering quality psychiatric care, the Justice Department said. Patients receive vague or delayed diagnoses, inadequate treatment plans and insufficient follow-up, the report said.

The report said the hospital is short 68 nurses, adding that chronic staff shortages contribute to poor care. Referring to one case, investigators said "it is inconceivable how a patient can suffer a seizure in front of the nurse's station without being observed or fall on the ground and bleed with enough time for the blood to dry before he is 'observed' on the floor by any staff."

Nothing so flagrant took place during The Washington Post's tour of the hospital last week. While some patients worked in a vegetable garden outside, most in the wards that were visited could be found slumped in mismatched chairs or perched in front of televisions.

Some were roused by the cries of a St. Elizabeths hospital attendant.

"Smoke-break time! Smoke-break time!" a burly aide called out, holding a shoe box filled with packs of cigarettes. The patients took their cigarettes and headed to an enclosed smoking porch with long wooden benches and a tile floor.

DOJ_NMG_0033735

"It calms them," the aide said.

In brief interviews with a dozen patients, none said that they were mistreated or that they feared for their safety. Instead, complaints ranged from cold breakfasts, broken air conditioning or lack of progress on their cases.

"They treat us fine, sir," said one patient, sitting next to an unused pool table. "They treat us fine."

In a small too-warm room off the main hallway in a one of the wards, a female patient meeting with her treatment team described her care as only "adequate."

Rizwan A. Malik, a psychiatrist at St. Elizabeths who read the Justice Department report, said a new hospital building and more staff would go a long way. That said, the hospital staff does the best with its resources and tries to help very sick people, he said.

"Never for one day did I think I was in the wrong place," said Malik, who was once punched in the face by a patient.

The Justice Department investigation is not the first in which St. Elizabeths has come under outside scrutiny. Six years ago, investigators for the federal Medicare program threatened to pull the hospital's eligibility because of inferior care. And the hospital functioned under court-ordered supervision from 1997 through 2001.

University Legal Services, an advocacy group for people with disabilities, has repeatedly complained about problems.

Mary Nell Clark, a managing attorney for University Legal Services, said the hospital fails on the most basic level -- it fails to heal.

"No matter what the beautiful new building will look like, it doesn't take care of the number of people in charge or the quality of care," she said.

Justice Department Looks Into Deaths Of People Subdued By Stun Guns (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing the deaths of up to 180 people who died after law enforcement officers used stun guns or other electro-shock devices to subdue them.

"These deaths raise a question in our mind that should be examined," said Glenn Schmitt, acting director of the department's National Institute of Justice. He said the review will initially focus on 30 deaths, including one from two decades ago.

Most of the deaths occurred within the past four years, corresponding with the mass deployment of stun guns to police departments throughout the country. A number of departments have re-evaluated their use of the weapons because of the fatal incidents.

More than 80 deaths since 1999 were identified in a recent analysis by The Arizona Republic. Amnesty International has identified more than 150 deaths since 2001.

The devices, marketed as alternatives to lethal force, are designed to incapacitate unruly suspects through electric shock.

Taser International, the nation's largest maker of stun guns, has supplied more than 130,000 devices to about 7,000 of the nation's 16,000 police agencies.

The company has maintained that its products are safe and have saved the lives of police officers and suspects.

"As we know, in-custody deaths are part of policing," Taser spokesman Steve Tuttle said when asked about the Justice Department review. "The more we can study and understand the circumstances that lead to in-custody deaths, the more opportunities there are to develop law enforcement tactics and procedures that will help prevent these unfortunate events in the future."

According to Taser, the company is a named defendant in 49 lawsuits alleging either wrongful death or personal injury. An additional 20 lawsuits have been dismissed.

The Justice Department review, which could take up to two years, was proposed last year after law enforcement authorities expressed concern about the increasing numbers of deaths after stun guns were used to incapacitate suspects, Schmitt said.

Schmitt said the review will enlist the help of the National Association of Medical Examiners, the American College of Pathologists, the International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP) and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Teams of medical examiners will begin reviewing individual cases this fall.

Amnesty International called the Justice review a "good first step."

"The fact that the government is doing this is an important acknowledgement that there is a serious problem," said Dalia Hashad, director of Amnesty's USA Program. "People are dying needlessly. It's important that the federal government is taking this responsibility."

Last year, the IACP recommended that law enforcement agencies closely monitor use of the devices after noting safety concerns involving stun guns.

DOJ_NMG_0033736

Schmitt said investigators are expected to examine a range of issues in each case, including ages, weight, possible physical impairments, evidence of drug use and other factors that could have contributed to the deaths.

In addition, Schmitt said, investigators will explore a phenomenon known as "excited delirium," in which a shutdown of bodily functions occurs after sensory overload.

Schmitt said the department is not urging any immediate change in the deployment of the devices.

"There is no reason to do anything different for now," he said. "We'll let the research answer the questions."

City Attorney Will Get Little Earth Case (MINNST)

By Chao Xiong, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, June 14, 2006

Allegations that two Minneapolis police lieutenants mistreated a man they arrested at Little Earth housing complex will be presented to the city attorney's office for consideration of possible criminal charges.

Allegations that two Minneapolis police lieutenants mistreated a man they arrested at Little Earth housing complex will be presented to the city attorney's office for consideration of possible criminal charges.

In a press release issued Tuesday afternoon, police said they need time to enhance video and photos of the May 26 incident before the case goes to the attorney's office in two weeks.

At issue is whether Lt. Mike Fossum intentionally used force with drug suspect Juan T. Vasquez and whether he and Lt. Richard Thomas left Vasquez in an excessively hot squad car.

Video surveillance released last week showed Fossum leaning his left shoulder and hip into Vasquez as Thomas walked him toward Fossum. Vasquez slumped down, knocking Thomas off the sidewalk. Fossum told police he thought Thomas was going to stop before they reached him.

The video also showed Vasquez in a squad car for at least 13 minutes with the windows shut. The outside temperature was 81 degrees at the time; it was unclear whether the air conditioning was on.

The Police Federation president, Sgt. John Delmonico, said it's time to bring the lieutenants back to work. They are both on paid administrative leave; that will be reviewed after the case is submitted to the attorney's office.

He said the officers did not use excessive force and also called paramedics for Vasquez when asked. Paramedics determined that Vasquez did not need hospitalization.

"I don't think the city attorney's office is going to find anything wrong," Delmonico said.

Little Earth's executive director, Bill Ziegler, said he is pleased that the case is continuing. Many residents of Little Earth expect outsiders to ignore or dismiss complaints coming from a housing complex long maligned through lore and media, he said.

Ziegler declined to say whether he wants criminal charges filed.

"Whatever is meant to happen is meant to happen," he said of the investigation's outcome.

The FBI has reserved the right to review the case for possible civil rights violations after the department's investigation is over, which is typical.

Chao Xiong • 612-673-4391

Officers Accused In Little Earth Incident Could Face Charges (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, June 14, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - The city attorney's office will soon be looking at possible charges for two Minneapolis police officers accused of misconduct during an arrest at the Little Earth housing complex, the Police Department announced Tuesday.

The May 26 incident was partially caught on a security tape, which showed a police officer bumping into a handcuffed man, who then doubled over. Witnesses also said the suspect passed out after he was held in a police car, with the windows closed, on a hot day.

Interim Police Chief Tim Dolan and other police officials met Tuesday with representatives of the FBI, the Hennepin County attorney's office and the city attorney's office to discuss the preliminary investigation into the officers' conduct.

After the meeting, the Police Department said in a prepared statement that it will present a case within two weeks to city prosecutors for possible criminal charges.

Bill Ziegler, the executive director of Little Earth, said he was pleased the investigation was moving forward.

"I'm hapy that no one looked the other way on this, that it is actually going through the process," he said. "The community feels like they're finally getting some action on this."

Meanwhile, police Lts. Richard Thomas and Michael Fossum remained on paid administrative leave. Their status will be reviewed after the case has been submitted.

DOJ_NMG_0033737

The FBI has reserved the right to review the final investigation for possible civil rights violations, police said.

According to police reports, Thomas and Fossum saw a man with a baggie of what they suspected to be crack cocaine. They arrested Juan T. Vasquez, 24, of St. Paul, who was visiting his girlfriend and son and doesn't live at the housing complex.

Thomas has been with the department since 1981; Fossum since 1986.

Both men's personnel files contain several medals and commendations. Thomas's includes two letters of commendation from an official of the Little Earth of United Tribes Housing Corp. in 2003, the same year he coached a Little Earth boys' basketball team.

Neither man's file included any reprimands for violence or improper conduct with a suspect.

Smuggling Suspects Face New Charges (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

Money laundering and identity theft were added yesterday to the charges against eight Montgomery County residents accused of smuggling illegal aliens into the county to work in a prostitution ring.

A federal grand jury in November indicted seven persons on charges that they transported illegal aliens into Maryland to work as prostitutes during the week and arranged for them to travel back to their homes in New York and New Jersey on the weekends.

The U.S. attorney's office in Maryland said the grand jury charged one more person and added three counts of money laundering for the purchase of vehicles to transport the women and property using sex ring money.

One suspect also was charged with using a false name and Social Security number to lease an apartment that was used as a brothel.

The prostitution ring generated more than $1 million in proceeds, court documents say.

"The investigation continues," said Marcia Murphy, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office.

The indictment names Elsy Aparicio, 43, Eliazor Gonzalez Aparicio, 29, Dorinalda Aparicio, 34, and their mother, Olinda Aparicio, 64, all of Gaithersburg; Jair Francis, 32, of Wheaton; Rigo Diaz, 31, of Gaithersburg; and Manuel Jandres, 38, of Germantown.

Mr. Jandres' wife, Rosibel Aparicio Jandres, 44, of Germantown, also was charged yesterday for her role in the group, which operated from February 2004 to July 2005.

Officials said the suspects purchased and rented apartments and houses in Wheaton, Gaithersburg, Germantown and Hyattsville to use as brothels. Documents indicate the Aparicios paid Mr. Francis to provide them with information regarding law-enforcement inquiries into their prostitution business.

The new indictment says Elsy Aparicio and Mr. Diaz purchased properties with the sex ring money, and that Mr. and Mrs. Jandres sold one home to cover up the source of the funds.

Mrs. Jandres was charged with one count and Elsy Aparicio, Mr. Diaz and Mr. Jandres with two counts each of money laundering and conspiracy to commit money laundering for attempting to conceal the source of the prostitution ring money by using it to purchase vehicles to transport the women, most of them illegal aliens.

The new indictment also charges Mr. Francis with using fake names to rent properties, and in at least one instance using an uninvolved woman's name and Social Security number without permission to lease a Wheaton apartment for use as a brothel.

Elsy Aparicio and Olinda Aparicio are under 24-hour electronic home monitoring; Mr. Jandres is on electronic home monitoring with work release; and Eliazor Gonzales Aparicio and Dorinalda Aparicio are in federal custody.

Mr. Francis and Mr. Diaz were released under the supervision of U.S. Pretrial Services.

Mrs. Jandres, who had not been arrested as of yesterday evening, is expected to appear before a magistrate judge either today or later this week.

The group's trial date is set for Dec. 4.

The women brought to the area are not charged in the indictment.

EEOC Is Hobbled, Groups Contend (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

With a shrinking workforce and a flagging budget, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is falling behind in enforcing federal civil rights laws in the workplace, labor union officials and civil rights advocates said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0033738

The EEOC is expected to have a backlog of 47,516 charges of employment discrimination next fiscal year, up from an estimated 39,061 this year and 33,562 in 2005, say officials with the American Federation of Government Employees, citing federal figures. The agency logged 75,428 complaints in 2005 and more than 79,000 the previous year.

At the same time, President Bush's 2007 budget request for the agency is $323 million, $4 million less than it received this budget year. The agency's full-time staff, which numbers 2,343 employees, has shrunk by more than 19 percent since 2001, according to the Office of Personnel Management. A partial hiring freeze has kept the agency from filling many openings.

"The EEOC is in a state of crisis and is systematically being weakened from within to justify its elimination," Andrea E. Brooks, a national vice president for the government employees federation, said in a statement.

Nicholas M. Inzeo, director of the EEOC's Office of Field Programs, acknowledged that funding has been tight and that the agency has had to trim its staff as Bush and Congress have directed more money to national defense and homeland security.

"These are tight times for all agencies. It means that the belt gets tighter, and we understand that," Inzeo said. "We believe very strongly in what we do. And with the resources that we have, we can do a lot. We try to make every penny count."

The government employees federation represents 1,300 of the agency's employees. Brooks appeared at a news conference yesterday with officials from several other groups, including the National Organization for Women, Blacks in Government and the Alliance for Retired Americans, to call attention to what they say are serious funding and management problems at the agency. They hope to influence members of a House appropriations subcommittee who are scheduled to deliberate today on the agency's 2007 budget.

Critics say the agency was weakened by a reorganization last year that downsized several district offices, created offices in Las Vegas and Mobile, Ala., and redeployed some staff members, including managers, to enforcement, litigation, mediation and customer service positions. Inzeo responded by saying the agency is spending money on frontline staff members rather than on more supervisors and managers.

Critics are especially upset about a nationwide call center staffed by contract workers that opened in Lawrence, Kan., last year to field calls that previously had been routed to district offices.

"It's a huge waste of money," Gabrielle Martin, president of the government employees federation's national council of EEOC locals, said of the $4.9 million contract with Pearson Government Solutions. "It does a terrible job."

A draft study commissioned by the EEOC's inspector general that was published in April found that the call center handled one-fifth of the projected call volume and saved the agency six full-time positions, not the anticipated 21. The study by Job Performance Systems Inc. found that the contractors do not understand their role or the work of the agency. The call center "should be either significantly changed or discontinued," the study found.

Inzeo said the final report should reflect "extensive comments" made by agency officials. "A lot of the numbers inside that draft are internally inconsistent," he said. ". . . Our field employees are telling us that they are receiving 500,000 fewer calls a year because of the contact center. The report doesn't do the math that gets you there."

Some Muslims Press Public Spaces To Make Room For Women's Modesty (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, June 14, 2006

Muslim women in the USA have been asking the public to accommodate their religious beliefs about modesty, a trend that some Muslims worry will provoke a backlash.

In some recent examples:

•In Lincoln Park, Mich., Fitness USA relented when Muslim women demanded that the gym wall off a co-ed aerobic center from their women-only section because men could see them working out.

•In Bridgeview, Ill., a Muslim school says it wants its girls' basketball team to play road games against non-Muslim schools provided the public schools ban men and teenage boys from the game.

•In North Seattle, Wash., a public pool set up a swim time for Muslim women in which men, even male lifeguards, are banned.

In all of the examples, businesses and public facilities were asked to accommodate followers of one interpretation of Islamic law that says the sexes must be separate if women are not covered with headscarves and modest clothing.

Meeting such demands could create a backlash against Muslims, says Zuhdi Jasser, chairman of American Islamic Forum for Democracy, which advocates separation of religion and government.

“In the long term it does not serve to build friends and bridges with the Western community,” says Jasser, a Muslim.

“You're not going to make your American, Christian and Jewish friends feel comfortable … which in the end could create a dislike for Muslims that is unnatural.”

DOJ_NMG_0033739

But other Muslims see the trend as an issue of civil rights.

Salam Al-Marayati, executive director of Muslim Public Affairs Council, says the right to petition for special accommodation based on religious beliefs is protected by the First Amendment.

“Whether a woman wants to cover her hair or not is her personal choice,” he says. “As long as it's not imposed on the rest of society then I don't see any problem.”

Walid Phares, a professor of Middle East studies at Florida Atlantic University, sees it as an early sign in the USA of a global Islamic movement to pressure Western society into abiding by Islamic laws.

“These demands exist because there is an ideology of a militant movement to slowly but surely demand more,” Phares says. “They will be building on it.”

Phares says the conservative Saudi branch of Islam, known as Wahhabism, is trying to assert itself as representing all Muslims in the USA and makes demands most Muslims disagree with.

But Ebrahim Moosa, professor of Islamic studies at Duke University, says the requests are attempts to integrate with U.S. culture. They show “that America can become their home,” he says.

Muzzled At The ACLU (USAT)

By Nat Hentoff

USA Today, June 14, 2006

Roger Baldwin founded the American Civil Liberties Union in 1920 after President Wilson, during World War I, practically suspended the right to publicly — and privately, if overheard — dissent from government actions. Years later, I met Baldwin toward the end of his life, and his solemn advice to me was: "Always remember that no civil liberties battle is ever won — permanently." But, by placing freedom of speech at the core of the ACLU's reason for existence, Baldwin believed that no civil liberties battle need be permanently lost. (Just published is a chronicle, pertinent today, of Baldwin's achievements and continuing relevance —Liberties Lost: The Endangered Legacy of the ACLU, by Woody Klein.)

While the staff of the ACLU has never been more essential to protecting the Constitution, the top leadership of the ACLU is working to prevent dissenting national board members from going to the news media with criticisms of ACLU policies.

With Executive Director Anthony Romero's backing, the board has issued a proposal for this week's agenda that I expect would have startled Baldwin. This could tarnish the invaluable work of ACLU staff members who are fighting to "keep America safe and free." (The ACLU's slogan.)

Here is that proposal, as reported last month in The New York Times: "Where an individual director disagrees with a board position on matters of civil liberties policy, the director should refrain from publicly highlighting the fact of such disagreement. ... There is always a material prospect that public airing of the disagreement will affect the ACLU adversely in terms of public support and fundraising."

Repercussions

U.S. newspapers found the irony irresistible. The Roanoke (Va.) Times, for one, noted that the proposal "appears to be a reaction by ... Romero to his failed effort to oust two board members who had criticized ACLU policies."

Actually, one principled dissenter: Michael Meyers, the director and founder of the New York Civil Rights Coalition and a longtime ACLU board member, has been forced out from the executive committee and the national board in punishment for going to the news media several times.

Wendy Kaminer, another recidivist dissenter and favorite target of ACLU's leadership, said the proposal "is preposterous — a violation of everything we're supposed to stand for."

The Times reported that in the board session, Romero furiously denounced Kaminer for having told a New York Sun reporter of her disagreement with the leadership's previous support of a bill in Congress that would regulate advertising by counseling centers run by anti-abortion organizations. Kaminer, who supports a woman's right to an abortion, was concerned with the legislation's free-speech problems. She told the Sun she was appalled "that the ACLU is actively supporting this."

After excoriating her for going to the news media, Romero demanded that another board member, Alison Steiner, "step outside the meeting room, where he chastised her for the look on her face when he was criticizing Ms. Kaminer," the Times reported.

In an e-mail to the board, Steiner wrote that Romero told her in the corridor that because "I ... did not appear ready to join him in 'getting rid of (Kaminer),' ... I was no better than she was, and then stormed off angrily," the Times recounted.

Romero, in a tepid letter to the editor that followed in the Times, did not deny that illuminating exchange but noted predictably that the ACLU "exists to defend the right of dissent and the free exchange of ideas." Then why has he not denounced the very concept of instructing board members to refrain from public dissent? And why is most of the board and ACLU President Nadine Strossen so compliant?

DOJ_NMG_0033740

Costly words

Previously, there was a public objection by then-board member Meyers when in a front-page story in 2004, the Times revealed that the ACLU, which has criticized omnivorous government data basing for national security, "is using sophisticated technology to collect a wide variety of information about its members and donors in a fundraising effort."

Said Meyers to the Times: "If I give the ACLU $20, I have not given them permission to investigate my partners, whom I'm married to, what they do, what my real estate holdings are, what my wealth is, and who else I give my money to."

The American Civil Liberties Union is now free of Meyers. Does that make its national membership, and the country, any more safe — or free?

Nat Hentoff is a former member of the ACLU's national board and, before that, the New York board. He is also an authority on free speech issues.

ANTITRUST:

Blockbuster Retaliates Against Netflix (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, June 14, 2006

Blockbuster Accuses Netflix of Manipulating U.S. Patent System

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Escalating a bitter legal battle, Blockbuster Inc. on Tuesday accused Netflix Inc. of manipulating the U.S. patent system in a devious effort to monopolize the booming market for online DVD rentals.

The antitrust allegations represent Blockbuster's counterpunch to patent infringement claims Netflix filed two months ago.

The wrangling eventually could affect the rapidly growing audience that's migrating to the Internet to rent DVDs through the mail.

About 6.2 million people currently subscribe to the online services of Netflix and Blockbuster, which both charge a flat monthly fee to rent DVDs for an unlimited time. Most subscribers pay $17.99 per month to check out up to three DVDs at a time.

Los Gatos, Calif.-based Netflix pioneered the concept in 1999 and ended March as the industry leader with 4.9 million subscribers.

Blockbuster launched its own online service in 2004 after losing hordes of customers who formerly rented movies in traditional stores. The Dallas-based company began the spring with about 1.3 million online subscribers.

Netflix obtained the first patent on its service in 2003, but didn't seek a court order to enforce its claims against Blockbuster until it received an even broader patent in April.

In its countersuit filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, Blockbuster framed Netflix's patent claims as a "sham" aimed at locking out competitors that will help protect consumers from price gouging.

The suit alleges that Netflix CEO Reed Hastings even described its first patent as a joke in a January 2005 meeting with Blockbuster's chief lawyer at the time, Edward Stead.

"Netflix is trying to monopolize this space on the Internet and restrain competition to the detriment of Blockbuster and the public," said Marshall Grossman, a Los Angeles attorney representing Blockbuster.

Netflix spokesman Steve Swasey declined to address Blockbuster's allegations. "We believe Blockbuster infringed on our patented business model and we are going to vigorously defend our patent," Swasey said.

Blockbuster's entrance in the market prompted Netflix to lower the price of its most popular service by $4 per month.

Tuesday's countersuit also alleges Netflix deceived the government by withholding information about earlier innovations that may have prevented the company from obtaining its patents in the first place.

NCR Corp. asserted its patent rights before Netflix received its first patent in 2003, Blockbuster's suit said. Blockbuster alleges Netflix never notified the U.S. Patent Office about NCR's claims.

Netflix sued NCR in March, seeking to invalidate those patent claims.

Net Neutrality Fight Returns To Senate (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033741

WASHINGTON--The political tussle over Net neutrality shifted back to the Senate's turf Tuesday, taking center stage at the last public hearing before a mammoth communications bill goes up for a preliminary vote.

As leaders of the Senate Commerce Committee continue negotiations over how to deal with the controversial concept, committee members and witnesses from advocacy groups took turns airing their positions yet again.

The latest draft of the sweeping bill, called the Consumer's Choice and Broadband Deployment Act, numbers 151 pages and covers everything from the digital television switch to city-run broadband networks to changes in the procedure by which video services operators seek franchises to serve new areas.

Arguably the most contentious portion has turned out to be Net neutrality, the idea that network operators should not be allowed to prioritize Internet content and services that travel across their pipes or to make deals with companies seeking special treatment.

Some Democrats and at least one Republican in the Senate have backed detailed regulations barring such practices, while several others, primarily from the Republican side, have voiced staunch opposition. The ongoing dispute clearly had some politicians concerned about the chances that the broader bill will pass.

"It would be a tragedy for our nation if Net neutrality is the basis for which this entire bill is taken down, and that's a very real possibility, the way I see this bill shaping up," said Sen. Gordon Smith, an Oregon Republican.

A committee vote on the final version of the bill is expected to occur June 22, with the last round of revisions expected to be released as early as Wednesday.

Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican, said he was confident that the politicians would reach a compromise but that they should favor a light regulatory touch. "We ought to talk about the FCC (Federal Communications Commission) having the right to deal with Net neutrality issues that affect consumers," he said, echoing remarks made last week. "When it comes to interfering with the marketplace in terms of major investments of capital, I think we should step away."

Stevens has been facing pressure from Democrats including Sen. Daniel Inouye, the committee's co-chairman, who said again Tuesday that the existing bill doesn't spell out meaningful enough enforcement powers to "prevent unfair discrimination by network operators." The current language directs the FCC to watch out for incidents that could be considered violations of Net neutrality and to report to Congress on its findings.

"What would be the impact with no legislation?" Inouye asked Ben Scott, policy director for the liberal advocacy group Free Press, who testified on a panel before the politicians.

"A structural change in the Internet which would, for better or for worse, change the way the Internet works," Scott replied, adding that nondiscrimination has been a "cornerstone" of Internet policy since the technology's birth.

Free Press is one of a wide array of consumer groups that have joined Internet companies like Google, Microsoft and Amazon.com in lobbying Congress to write Net neutrality requirements into law--though with little success so far. Major network operators from the telecommunications and cable industries, the wireless and hardware sectors, and Wall Street interests have mobilized against that idea, saying new regulations are premature and could stifle investment in new infrastructure.

"There are existing procedures at the FCC and in antitrust law to deal with anticompetitive issues," said John Rutledge, a consultant for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a pro-business lobbying organization. "I think the idea of trying to stop change or control prices is a (recipe) for disaster."

Sen. Byron Dorgan scoffed at that notion, saying attempts at enforcing antitrust laws "make glaciers look like they're speeding." The North Dakota Democrat joined Maine Republican Olympia Snowe, Committee Co-Chairman Inouye, and five other Democrats in proposing a bill last month that calls for detailed prohibitions against blocking, impairing, degrading and prioritizing Internet content.

A nearly identical Democratic-sponsored amendment met with definitive rejection by the House of Representatives last week. The broader communications bill that was approved authorizes the FCC to police violations of its broadband use principles (click here for PDF) and to levy fines if appropriate, but it bars the regulators from making new rules.

Sen. John Sununu, a New Hampshire Republican, said the House bill "steers in the right direction" and urged his colleagues against taking the approach favored by Democrats, which he said amounts to burdensome "Internet regulations."

"A heavy regulatory hand kills incentives to build products and develop new technologies, and that ultimately will be something that consumers feel and that they will respond to in a very negative way," he said, noting that the editorial pages of both The Washington Post and The Wall Street Journal--typically not aligned in their views--have discouraged imposition of new regulations now.

South Carolina Republican Jim DeMint, a vocal free-market proponent, likened new federal Net neutrality mandates to "the government telling retailers how to do their business"--that is, what to stock on their shelves and which merchandise to give more prominent placement. "We actually want some discrimination today to force better products and better prices," he argued, warning that new regulations would lead to "commercial suicide."

DOJ_NMG_0033742

Brussels Regulators Sharpened Their Teeth On Microsoft (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

If Apple is looking for advice on how to deal with regulators worried about "inter-operability" it need look no further than its old rival from Redmond in Washington state. Microsoft has been battling antitrust officials on both sides of the Atlantic for many years.

The software group's troubles culminated in March 2004, when the European Commission slapped a record €497m fine on Microsoft for violating European Union competition rules. Brussels found, among other abuses, that the group had failed to provide rival software developers with sufficient technical information to allow them to create inter-operable products.

Could Apple face similar pressure from the Commission in the future? Both groups have a strong grip on their respective markets. Apple's iTunes accounts for as much as 80 per cent of downloads in some EU markets, while Microsoft's Windows operating system boasts a market share of more than 90 per cent worldwide.

Moreover, while Microsoft at least claims that it is serious about inter-operability, Apple has unashamedly built its success on the concept of a "walled garden" - a closed world of proprietary technology.

Some experts point out, a key difference: few companies in the information technology sector can operate successfully without some form of interaction with Windows. And Micrssoft's strong position in a range of related markets from servers to media players gives it additional clout.

Music, by contrast, will continue to be distributed through various channels, the experts say. "If you want to do anything with a computer, you must have Microsoft Windows. The iPod and iTunes are not must-haves," says one Brussels-based competition lawyer.

For the time being, the Commission has not set its sight on Apple. But Ian Forrester QC, a partner at White & Case, the UK law firm that represents Microsoft, says the Commission's line on inter-operability leaves room for uncertainty. "I think it is difficult to find a consistent line in the Commission's cases regarding the duties on a manufacturer of a successful product and to what degree he can allow or prohibit interaction with a rival's product."

Related stories:

- Crunch time for Apple's music icon
- Norway sparks iTunes rebellion
- Technology: News and analysis

EU Accelerates Deadline On Suez-GDF (AP)

By Aoife White, AP Business Writer

AP, June 14, 2006

EU Regulators Accelerate Deadline to Rule on Suez-GDF Combination

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Commission on Tuesday brought forward to June 19 its deadline to rule on a French government-backed merger between Suez SA and Gaz de France SA even as French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy suggested the government delay the deal.

The Suez-Gaz de France merger would create a major new European player in energy, water and waste services, with a market capitalization of 72.6 billion euros ($86 billion), but its size and power have already raised antitrust concerns in neighboring Belgium and could force it to sell off part of its business.

Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt warned in March that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market, while the Belgian energy watchdog is worried that the new lineup would make the French government a part-owner of Belgian nuclear power plants.

EU regulators had earlier said they would decide by July 3 whether they would clear the deal, saying there was an automatic delay because Belgium had asked to take charge of part of the case.

However, they said they brought forward the deadline because Belgium had not made a formal request to look into the deal.

The commission must also decide if it will open an in-depth probe that could last four months.

DOJ_NMG_0033743

EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes has said that energy deals should expect "meticulous scrutiny" from antitrust officials. In February, she warned of continuing antitrust problems in Europe's energy sector, saying prices were too high and large firms had too much control over the market.

The deal would make the new firm the owner of the Belgium's main electricity supplier Electrabel and part-owner of the No. 2 power firm SPE. It would also become by far the most powerful player in the country's gas sector.

Suez unveiled the government-backed plan to merge with state-controlled Gaz de France in February, just days after Italy's Enel SpA signaled its interest in buying Suez, leading EU regulators to quiz the French government's role in pushing for the deal. The European Commission later dropped its informal probe.

Sarkozy told lawmakers Tuesday that the government should delay plans to privatize Gaz de France and merge it with Suez.

Under an alternative plan, GdF and Suez should each buy stakes in each other, Sarkozy told a group of 200 to 250 lawmakers from the ruling UMP party, three lawmakers who attended the meeting said.

However, Sarkozy did not say which of several "alternative formula" he would favor, the leader of the parliamentary party Bernard Accoyer told reporters.

UMP spokesman Luc Chatel said Sarkozy did not want to "open a front" against Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, who has said the merger would help preserve security of energy supply with the creation of a French industrial champion.

The state-directed business deal has split the party with two-thirds of UMP deputies planning to oppose the current plans in a parliament vote Wednesday.

Mittal Issues Growth Outlook To Raise Bid Pressure On Arcelor (WSJ)

By Juliane Von Reppert-Bismarck And Steve McGrath

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

Mittal Steel Co. raised the pressure on bid target Arcelor SA by publishing details of a midterm business plan that envisions strong growth.

Luxembourg-based Arcelor, meanwhile, stepped up its plan to woo shareholders by releasing more details of its planned merger with the OAO Severstal steel business owned by Russian entrepreneur Alexey Mordashov.

Mittal, the world's largest steelmaker by production, said it expects earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortization, or Ebitda, to reach $9.9 billion in 2008, 71% above the 2005 level. Ebitda is projected to rise 26% this year to $7.3 billion. The plan doesn't detail the benefits from an Arcelor deal.

"The outlook for the steel industry is positive, supported by strong global growth, especially from high-growth, developing markets," Chairman and Chief Executive Lakshmi Mittal said.

Arcelor countered by releasing its own figures. The company said its stand-alone Ebitda would rise to €8.9 billion ($11.21 billion) in 2008, from its previous forecast of €7 billion, based on market assumptions Mittal has given. Arcelor said the Ebitda of a combined Arcelor-Severstal would rise to €13.1 billion, from €10.3 billion.

Mittal's revised bid as of yesterday's close values Arcelor at €22.18 billion, or €33.40 ($42.08) a share.

Arcelor says its deal with Mr. Mordashov in effect values Arcelor at €44 a share, a claim Mittal has rejected.

A spokesman for Arcelor dismissed Mittal's outlook as a "very optimistic earnings forecast based on the upper side of the assumptions."

Mittal Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said at a news conference that he was confident of the company's assumptions, which had been checked and confirmed by its auditors and external independent consultants.

Arcelor's document, posted yesterday on its Web site, attempted to calm shareholder concerns about a merger with a Russian company, justifying the value of the merger and listing strict corporate-governance rules. Arcelor said the deal with Mr. Mordashov is more attractive to shareholders than being taken over by Mittal, offering higher profitability per ton and a better dividend-payout ratio.

The Arcelor documents revealed that Mr. Mordashov can walk away from the deal with a €140 million breakup fee if Mittal builds a substantial minority stake of more than 295 million shares.

Aditya Mittal said the company wasn't interested in taking a minority stake in Arcelor and was still confident that its offer would succeed.

Arcelor shares fell 1.9% to €32.66 in Paris, while Mittal fell 1% to €23.35 in Amsterdam.

Tech World Worries As Company's Patent Stockpile Grows (LAW)

By Lisa Lerer, IP Law & Business

DOJ_NMG_0033744

IP Law & Business, June 14, 2006

Last January a dozen of the world's most respected scientists gathered in a nondescript conference room at an office building outside of Seattle. They sat around a table cluttered with laptops and papers, snacked on bowls of beef jerky and Chex Mix, and plotted the next technological revolution.

The brainstorming session, practically unintelligible to those with a less-than-Mensa-level IQ, took place at the offices of Intellectual Ventures, a start-up founded in 2000 by former Microsoft Corp. chief technologist Nathan Myhrvold. No intellectual slouch himself, Myhrvold not only led the discussion, but was an eager contributor, sketching out flow charts on a large whiteboard at the front of the room. A handful of patent prosecutors, charged with translating "aha moments" into patent applications, desperately tried to follow along, noting every reference, pulling up obscure theorems on their computers and snapping photos of Myhrvold's scribblings. Finally, after two days of discussion -- over the merits of using new technologies in medical treatments -- the group had a breakthrough. Jumping out of his seat, Myhrvold exclaimed, "This is Star Trek-level medicine!"

This is the friendly face of Intellectual Ventures. At the Bellevue, Wash.-based company, the science hails from Star Trek but the business plays out like Star Wars. For the past six years, Myhrvold and his Jedi inventors have been brainstorming, developing and patenting their best ideas. The company doesn't plan on manufacturing, or commercializing, a product. "We are a pure play about invention," says Myhrvold with prototypical passion. "Really big ideas have to come from somewhere."

But at Intellectual Ventures, not all the big ideas come from the Jedis. Another arm of the 100-employee company, headed up by former Intel Corp. in-house counsel Peter Detkin -- a Darth Vader figure to many -- has been buying up thousands of patents through shell corporations. A $400 million investment from some of the biggest technology companies, including Nokia Corp., Intel, Apple Computer Inc., Sony Corp. and Microsoft, funds the shopping spree. (None of these companies would comment for this story.) Some in the IP asset management field estimate that Intellectual Ventures has amassed 3,000 to 5,000 patents.

As the patent stockpile grows, so does the speculation -- and the fear. IP lawyers and tech executives worry that Intellectual Ventures is less interested in changing the world with big ideas, and more focused on becoming an über-troll, wreaking litigation havoc across industries with its patents. So far the tight-lipped company hasn't revealed much about its plan. "We don't proactively tell our story." says Myhrvold, "There's little in telling our story that benefits us." But this winter Myhrvold seemed to change his mind, inviting IP Law & Business up to Bellevue. Intellectual Ventures promised candor, but delivered something a bit more translucent. While company management filled in some blanks in the Intellectual Ventures story, they refused to discuss financials or reveal details about licensing deals, citing confidentiality agreements. Still, these details may not have been enough to end the speculation. After only a few years in business, Intellectual Ventures may simply be too young to know whether it will turn to the dark side.

For now, Myhrvold's happy to strike back at critics who are crying troll. "They can't quite bring themselves to believe we are doing what we are doing," says Myhrvold. "[Critics think], 'They can't be screwing around with a bunch of ideas for that long,'" he adds with a quick laugh. But that, he says, is exactly what Intellectual Ventures is doing. The company focuses on creating new technologies. The rest -- product development, commercialization, manufacturing -- will be handled by joint ventures, licensing and spin-off companies.

Intellectual Ventures represents a natural economic evolution, says Myhrvold. As the United States changes from a manufacturing to an ideas-based economy, making patents more valuable to businesses, a company based solely around IP seems almost inevitable. But coming up with marketable ideas might take ten years, he says. Intellectual Ventures plans on keeping the creditors at bay by becoming the Wal-Mart of the licensing world -- a one-stop patent shop. To do that, the company needs a whole lot of intellectual property, says Myhrvold: "IP is a game where scale really matters. One patent could be worth nothing or $1 million. It's hard to plan on the economic value of a single patent." While Myhrvold acknowledges that Intellectual Ventures has "a lot of patents," he shies away from an exact number.

Few besides Myhrvold could lead a company with such a grand focus. The 47-year-old millionaire has had an intellectual life that would delight Da Vinci. He holds a Ph.D. in theoretical and mathematical physics, M.S. degrees in mathematical economics, geophysics and space physics. As a postdoctoral fellow at Cambridge University, Myhrvold researched quantum physics with Stephen Hawking. He's also a published nature photographer and has had his state-of-the-art kitchen -- and his recipes -- featured in The New York Times Magazine. Intellectual Ventures' offices reflect his fanatical inquisitiveness: Antique microscopes and typewriters line the halls, and a model of a full-scale Tyrannosaurus Rex head greets visitors in the lobby.

But even Da Vinci needed help. Along with co-founder and former Microsoftie Edward Jung, Myhrvold's recruited an all-star staff, including Detkin and Greg Gorder, previously a partner at Perkins Coie, who has more than 100 venture capital financings under his belt. According to a former Intellectual Ventures executive, who agreed to speak anonymously, these four managers get a little under 2 percent of the money they've raised -- including the $400 million brought in from the company's investors.

DOJ_NMG_0033745

Right now, Intellectual Ventures only has one homegrown patent. In November, the Patent and Trademark Office granted Myhrvold's company a patent for an image sensor that allows greater depth of field in photographs -- not exactly a big idea, but as the company is patenting a mix of ideas from "bold and risky," says Myhrvold, "to less ambitious, incremental ones." More are coming: Intellectual Ventures has filed about 400 applications at the PTO, as well as several dozen international applications, says chief patent counsel Casey Tegreene.

Many of the patent applications come out of the company's invention sessions. Intellectual Ventures has held about 60 over the past three years. The majority of participating scientists work for the company as outside consultants, including Leroy Hood, inventor of the DNA sequencer; W. Daniel Hillis, chair of R&D consulting firm Applied Minds, Inc.; and Massachusetts Institute of Technology professor Robert Langer.

After each session, a team of in-house patent lawyers comb through all the notes, papers, digital tapes and photos from the session looking for promising ideas. The review is detailed and confidential: Lawyers and patent agents spend two to eight hours per hour of tape. To prevent the recordings from being used as evidence in future trials, they're automatically erased after six months. Intellectual Ventures then examines the market potential of the flagged ideas. One session can lead to as many as 80 applications. And only about 10 percent of the patent prosecution work gets outsourced -- mostly to solo and small practitioners like Washington, D.C.-based Sterne, Kessler, Goldstein & Fox. With 15 in-house patent lawyers, Tegreene says that Intellectual Ventures is one of the biggest patent prosecution firms in the Northwest.

To figure out how to turn patents into profits, Myhrvold hired vice president Brent Frei, founder of Onyx Software Corp. and a former Microsoft programmer analyst. So far, Frei hasn't come up with much that he's willing to discuss. He speaks in generalizations, writing business school-type theories on his office whiteboard. The plan, he says, is to "invent across the spectrum." The hulking 6-foot-7-inch former Dartmouth football player draws a large graph, explaining Intellectual Ventures's business philosophy. At the bottom are emerging markets, like bioinformatics, and at the top, mass markets, areas like wi-fi, software, and cell phones. Presumably, Intellectual Ventures wants to be in all these spaces. "We're trying to get as much technology as possible and then figure out the best way to commercialize," says Frei. "We're not seeking $1 million to hold someone hostage," he says, instinctively answering the troll criticisms. With so much energy devoted to creation, Frei estimates that the first actual Intellectual Ventures-created business won't launch for at least six months to a year. "It's a long-term play," says Myhrvold. "Having patient investors is a key aspect."

Inventors won't have to be too patient. While the creative juices flow, the patent stockpile will pay the bills. "Today it's all about numbers and bulk," says Frei. Intellectual Ventures seeks out key patents in converging areas, like software, semiconductors, wireless, consumer electronics, networking, lasers, biotechnology and medical devices. For example, says Frei, a company working in online banking also needs security and e-commerce technology. Theoretically, Intellectual Ventures would offer them freedom to operate with a licensing package covering those key areas.

Ideally, says Frei, Intellectual Ventures will collect a huge patent library and, for a fee, license a variety of different technologies. Most licenses will be nonexclusive, an offer made particularly to the investors. Some industries, like biotech, will require more expensive, exclusive licenses. "We reserve the right to be smart," says Myhrvold, describing how Intellectual Ventures will tailor licenses to individual industries.

Of course, a patent licensing strategy only works when backed by the threat of litigation. And the company's critics are only too happy to speculate about that threat. Some have theorized that Intellectual Ventures is just a front for its investors -- a shield designed to protect them from patent suits. The tech giants can use Intellectual Ventures to buy small patent portfolios cheaply and pull them off the market, avoiding future litigation. Intellectual Ventures denies that its investors steer its acquisition strategy. "We are not controlled by anyone," says Frei. "We are amassing things that are valuable and going to get a market rate for them."

The former Intellectual Ventures executive claims that his former employer plans to hold entire industries hostage with high licensing fees, and the management team will be rewarded with a cut of the licensing revenue. Any company that refuses to take a license, or invest in Myhrvold's vision, says the executive, will face a lawsuit funded by some seriously deep pockets. Others paint a less nefarious picture, but fear that if Myhrvold's innovation model fails, the company, desperate for cash, will turn into a licensing monster -- and no one but those investors will be safe: "If the business model starts to fail, then they're sitting there with a huge portfolio and a relatively straightforward way of getting return by sending letters to a lot of people who aren't investors," says Dewey Ballantine patent litigation partner Anthony Shaw.

"These are the trolls that call other people trolls," says Raymond Niro, name partner at Niro, Scavone, Haller & Niro, who is known for representing clients considered by many to be trolls.

DOJ_NMG_0033746

Calling Peter Detkin a troll is like challenging a Grand Master to a quick game of chess. Detkin coined the term in 1999, after Intel was sued for infringing the patents of TechSearch, a small patent-holding company (now a subsidy of Acacia Technologies Group). When Detkin referred to TechSearch as a "patent extortionist," the company sued for libel. So the Intel team swapped in "troll," and an industry swear word was born. In 2001 Detkin told our sibling publication The Recorder "A patent troll is somebody who tries to make a lot of money off a patent that they are not practicing and have no intention of practicing and in most cases never practiced." Intellectual Ventures easily fits the bill.

Over dinner, at a trendy Silicon Valley restaurant a couple of blocks from his home, Detkin makes it clear that he doesn't like the tables being turned. "There's just no clear definition at this point," he says, pausing for a tortilla chip. "A troll has become just a word for 'A plaintiff I don't like.'" Detkin's updated definition: someone who takes a single patent or small portfolio of questionable value and asserts it purely for "nuisance value." That's not Intellectual Ventures, which seeks out quality patents, offering good inventors another avenue to monetize their work, he says. Intellectual Ventures, caring only about patents, has more alternatives to offer inventors than corporations. The company will incorporate royalty sharing, additional payment terms and clauses that allow inventors to continue to invent into deals.

While not much is known about Detkin's patent shopping, the former Intellectual Ventures executive gives some details. Intellectual Ventures, says the executive, forms a new shell corporation each time it acquires a new patent portfolio. A special computer program names the companies, making them difficult to hunt down. The former executive pointed us to past monikers, including Thalveg Data Flow, Orange Computer and Maquis Techtrix -- all were traceable only to Seattle-area post office boxes.

Using fake companies to conduct real business isn't new to Detkin. "This is a Detkin trademark," says Niro, who represented TechSearch in the Intel litigation. During that case, Detkin created a shell corporation, Maelen Ltd., which offered TechSearch $325,000 for its patent, a price far lower than the millions at stake in the trial. The ploy failed when a judge realized that Maelen was really operating in Intel's interest.

Detkin, who joined Intellectual Ventures in 2002 after spending a week helicopter skiing in backcountry Canada, says that using shell corporations is just good business practice. "When you acquire assets you want to hold them separately," he says. "There's nothing nefarious about it." Companies often buy all kinds of assets under shell corporations to limit potential liability, he says.

Two years ago, Detkin set up a shell corporation called Brissac Electronic Holdings, and, under that name, bid on a portfolio of e-commerce-related patents at an auction in a California bankruptcy court. But Detkin dropped out after bidding crossed the $14.9 million line, and the portfolio went to Novell Inc. "To date, I've found Intellectual Ventures to be professional and not overly aggressive," says James Malackowski, head of IP merchant bank Ocean Tomo, which ran the patent auction. But if Intellectual Ventures starts firing off lawsuits, says Malackowski, it will face a backlash and possibly even legislative regulation.

If that happens, Intellectual Ventures is ready: The company has already set up a lobbying presence in Washington, D.C., and is playing an active role in the legislative debate over patent reform. Myhrvold testified on the issue to the House subcommittee on the courts, the Internet and intellectual property in April 2005, and last year Detkin submitted a written report on reform to the Antitrust Modernization Committee of the Federal Trade Commission. Both have spoken at industry group meetings and universities across the country. Intellectual Ventures, naturally, argues that patents protect ideas, not just products. Patent holders of all stripes should be able to get a court-ordered injunction, stopping the business operations of an infringing company.

For now, patent injunctions are a theoretical matter for Intellectual Ventures, although the company isn't ruling out future patent lawsuits. "In some cases we'll have to sue," says Frei. But a suit is less lucrative, Frei maintains, than a small running royalty on a key patent paid by a lot of companies for 10 to 15 years.

Besides, Myhrvold's curiosity (and funds) seem to have limits. "If I sue everyone, I spend all the money on lawyers," says the invention king, exasperated. "I still spend all my money on lawyers because of filing those damn things."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Drops Part Of Charge Against Company (AP)

By Becky Bohrer, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 14, 2006

Judge Dismisses Part of Criminal Charge Against W.R. Grace, Some Former Top Officials

BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) -- A federal judge has dismissed part of a criminal charge against W.R. Grace & Co. and some former top officials that alleged they knowingly endangered miners and area residents through asbestos exposure in Libby, Mont., site of the company's former vermiculite mine.

DOJ_NMG_0033747

U.S. District Judge Donald Molloy concluded that the statute of limitations -- the time allotted under federal law to prosecute the case -- had expired.

A federal grand jury indicted Grace and seven one-time top officials in February 2005, accusing them of conspiring to conceal health risks posed by the company's now-closed vermiculite mine.

Molloy's ruling, dated last week, is a partial victory for the defense, which has been attempting to get a conspiracy charge thrown out or limited. The conspiracy charge itself was not thrown out, but the allegation that the defendants "knowingly endangered" residents and miners is a major foundation of that conspiracy charge.

Hundreds of people in the northwestern Montana town have been sickened, some fatally, by exposure to asbestos. The vermiculite mined at Libby contained harmful tremolite asbestos. The mine closed in 1990.

Several defense attorneys declined comment Tuesday, as did the U.S. attorney's office in Billings.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said, "We are considering our options at this point" and declined further comment.

The case is set for trial in September, though defense attorneys have sought to have that date pushed back. The defense also has asked for separate trials for the named defendants.

Conspiracy, Molloy wrote, requires an "overt act" within the limitations period. The clock on the five-year statute of limitations began in November 1999, court records show.

The defense argued the indictment didn't allege the defendants had undertaken any overt acts that knowingly endangered residents or employees from November 1999 through February 2005. Prosecutors countered with more than a dozen claims they said helped indicate otherwise.

Molloy, however, wrote that several of the claims raised by the government spoke more to allegations the defendants concealed wrongdoing from the Environmental Protection Agency, which was investigating the contamination, or acted to limit their liability.

As a result, they "cannot be construed as alleging acts in furtherance of the knowing endangerment object," he wrote.

An accusation that Grace failed to completely remove vermiculite contaminated with tremolite asbestos from school tracks and a skating rink over roughly a 19-year period, ending in 2000, also do not allege overt acts, Molloy wrote.

"The purpose of the overt act requirement is 'to manifest that the conspiracy is at work and is neither a project still resting solely in the minds of the conspirators nor a fully completed operation no longer in existence,'" he said.

"The failure to fully abate the schoolyard contamination more plausibly suggests a completed operation than a conspiracy still at work," he wrote.

Land-use Suit Becomes Federal Fight (LONGDTC)

By Victoria A.F. Camron, The Daily Times-Call

Longmont (CO) Daily Times-Call, June 14, 2006

Justice Department to defend RLUIPA against county

Neither Rocky Mountain Christian Church officials nor the lawyer representing Boulder County is surprised that the federal Department of Justice is stepping into a lawsuit between the entities.

“It’s not altogether unexpected that they would defend the constitutionality of a federal statute, the same way the Colorado attorney general’s office would defend the Colorado Constitution,” said David Hughes, the attorney representing the county on the lawsuit.

The federal government will defend the constitutionality of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, which Boulder County claimed in March is unconstitutional.

The church has asked the county to allow an expansion of 132,000 square feet that would include an education building, a multipurpose chapel building, a gymnasium and a gallery that would connect the new buildings with the existing church. The church also would add about 500 parking spaces. Church officials said construction would occur over the next 15 to 20 years.

RLUIPA, as the federal law is called, prevents local governments from placing a “substantial burden” on churches; when restrictions are made, they must be the “least restrictive” possible. However, federal courts have differed on the meaning of “substantial burden,” and none of the cases regarding land use has yet been heard by the Supreme Court.

Hughes could not say if the federal government’s involvement would complicate or lengthen the case. The government may raise different arguments than the church will, which Hughes acknowledged would cause him more work in defending the county.

The attorney representing the church would not comment, but church spokesman David Page said, “We’re not surprised Justice would step in at this point.”

DOJ_NMG_0033748

The federal government has plenty of cases to draw from while preparing its filing in the local case.

In Florida, the town of Surfside refused to let a synagogue locate in the town's central business district, prompting the synagogue to sue the town under RLUIPA. As in Boulder County's case, lawyers representing the town argued that neither the 14th Amendment nor the Commerce Clause of the Constitution authorized Congress to pass the law.

Surfside attorneys also argued that RLUIPA violated the 10th Amendment and the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

The Justice Department successfully argued the law is constitutional, writing, "RLUIPA has a permissible secular purpose of alleviating government-created burdens on religion, ... and RLUIPA's land-use provisions do not create excessive entanglement between government and religion."

After the federal appellate court ruled in favor of the synagogue, the Supreme Court refused to consider the town's appeal of the case.

Although constitutionality was not raised as an issue, the Justice Department argued that RLUIPA applied when a Michigan township denied a permit to a church to expand its building, just as Rocky Mountain Christian Church wants to do in Niwot.

No Vote On Mine Safety Nominee (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

Republicans scrapped a vote on President Bush's choice to head the agency in charge of mine safety after it became clear that he did not have enough support to win Senate approval. Democrats opposed the nominee, Richard Stickler, saying he had spent too many years as a coal mining executive and had failed to demonstrate that safety was his top priority. In his confirmation hearing earlier this year, Mr. Stickler declined to endorse several proposed changes to mine safety laws but said the enforcement of existing laws could be improved. Senator Robert C. Byrd, Democrat of West Virginia, used a procedure known as a legislative hold to block the nomination.

G.M. — Again (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

On May 31 I wrote a column accusing General Motors of acting irresponsibly by offering unlimited gasoline at $1.99 a gallon for one year to anyone who buys certain of its midsize sedans, big S.U.V.'s or gas-guzzling Hummers in California or Florida. At a time when we are at war in the Middle East, with an enemy who is indirectly financed by our energy purchases, it seems to me that every American, and every American company, has an obligation to reduce oil consumption. No one should be making a huge gas-guzzling Hummer, and no one should be driving one, and no one — certainly not G.M. — should be subsidizing people to drive them.

After the May 31 column appeared, G.M.'s vice president for global communications, Steven J. Harris, and his colleagues denounced my argument in a formal statement and on G.M.'s corporate blog. This is an important issue, so let me respond to their response.

To begin with, I would much prefer to see G.M. thriving and growing American jobs — not selling itself off, limb by limb. But as long as G.M. is giving away $1.99 gasoline for its gas guzzlers, I will be a harsh critic. Pardon me if — at a time when China is imposing higher mileage standards than America — I don't want to join the many congressmen and senators in drinking G.M.'s Kool-Aid and not demanding that it become the most fuel-efficient automaker in the world. If more people in Washington insisted that G.M. focus on building cars that could compete in a world of $3.99 gasoline, rather than creating an artificial universe of $1.99 gasoline, G.M. would not be worrying about bankruptcy today.

G.M. says that the cars chosen for its $1.99 gas giveaway were chosen because of "their outstanding fuel economy and great consumer appeal." It also says that G.M. makes more cars that get an E.P.A.-estimated 30 miles per gallon on the highway than any other company.

Fact: G.M. also sells more cars that get 9 to 11 m.p.g. — the Hummer — than any other company. And even though G.M. justified the $1.99 program as giving consumers a chance to drive some of its most fuel-efficient cars, it did not include its best-selling, most fuel-efficient model, the Chevy Aveo (35 m.p.g. highway), in the program, but did include seven gas-guzzling trucks. G.M. still does not have a family-friendly hybrid on the market (one is due this summer) — nine years after Toyota introduced the 45-m.p.g. Prius hybrid, which G.M. scoffed at at the time.

Stephanie Salter, a columnist writing in the Terre Haute Tribune-Star, did a spoof about G.M.'s $1.99 gas giveaway by imagining what other less-than-healthy consumer companies might now do: "Today R.J. Reynolds Corp. announced a new

DOJ_NMG_0033749

'smoke more/pay less' instant rebate program for most of its cigarette brands. Time-dated coupons will be included in every pack of RJR cigarettes. Tobacco consumers who collect 10 same-brand coupons in five days can redeem them for a pack costing $1. The only brands not covered by the coupon program are the company's cigarettes with very low tar and nicotine content."

Next, G.M.'s Harris asked: "How is offering a gas card that may be worth $1,000 any different or more sinister than the $2,000 cash rebate that Toyota's offering right now nationwide on its full-size S.U.V., the Sequoia?"

Fact: Reading that question you'd think that G.M. was giving away cheap gas instead of big S.U.V. rebates. The truth: We called G.M. dealers in California who said that under the new program they were authorized to offer $5,000 discounts on the 2006 Suburban and Tahoe S.U.V.'s — which are like the Sequoia — in addition to G.M.'s unlimited $1.99 gas for a year. I guess Mr. Harris just forgot that.

Yes, Toyota makes trucks and S.U.V.'s, just like G.M. I am not against either. Some people need them, others enjoy them. But I don't think we should be subsidizing gasoline so people who don't need them will buy them or buy the most gas-guzzling versions. G.M. says its full-size S.U.V.'s get better mileage than Toyota's. All I know is that Consumer Reports rates all size S.U.V.'s for fuel efficiency, reliability and performance. Toyota and Honda S.U.V.'s are its top picks in every size category.

Ah, says Mr. Harris, but we offer nine vehicles that can run on E85 ethanol-gas blends, and have made 1.9 million such cars and trucks. Toyota makes none. The truth: The Big Three U.S. automakers started making flex-fuel cars in the mid-1990's after they were given a shameful federal loophole.

As the Des Moines Register explained in an article on May 26: "The loophole works this way: A dual-fuel vehicle that can run on either gasoline or 85 percent ethanol, or E85, is credited with a much higher mileage rating than it really gets. That keeps the overall mileage of the cars and trucks that a company like Ford or General Motors makes in any given year within the government's mileage limits."

By agreeing to build flex-fuel vehicles credited with phony mileage, Detroit gets to make many more bigger, heavier gas guzzlers, the paper explained, "without having to pay fines for exceeding the federal mileage standards." For instance, the 2006 G.M.C. two-wheel-drive Yukon 1500 actually gets 15 m.p.g. city and 20 m.p.g. highway. But under this loophole it is rated as getting 33 miles per gallon for purposes of meeting the government's fleet fuel economy standards. "The Union of Concerned Scientists calculates that the loophole increased U.S. oil consumption by 80,000 barrels per day in 2005 alone," the paper said.

If G.M., Ford and Chrysler really care about saving oil and the environment, why exploit this loophole? And by the way, even though G.M. has made 1.9 million flex-fuel vehicles, it and the other automakers for a long time did little to inform customers that their cars could run on ethanol — because their real interest was the mileage loophole to make more big cars. Most people didn't know they were driving a flex-fuel car. "Until recently, the only way to tell was by checking the vehicle identification number," the paper noted. Recently, General Motors has put yellow gas caps on its dual-fuel vehicles to alert customers.

I'm not a car expert, so let me leave the last word to Automotive News, the industry's top trade magazine. Its June 5 editorial said: "General Motors' promotion that reimburses some buyers for gasoline purchases is ill-advised for an automaker that is trying to burnish its green image. The program should be dropped, not expanded. ... It's simply a subsidy for vehicles that burn a lot of gasoline. And it's one more example of G.M.'s tone deafness on environmental issues. ... Yes, G.M. can make vehicles that are as fuel efficient as anybody else's. But it acts as though its future depends on gas guzzlers."

Warming At The Court (WP)

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

AS EARLY AS this week, the Supreme Court will decide whether to hear a case that is now something of a dud but could become one of the most significant pieces of environmental litigation in a generation. The case is a challenge by states and environmental organizations to the Environmental Protection Agency's decision not to regulate the gases that cause global climate change. The justices should hear it, both because a lower court -- the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit -- could not produce a coherent opinion and because the issues it presents are of enormous importance. The agency is claiming that the Clean Air Act gives it no legal authority over what is probably the preeminent environmental issue of our time; and that even if it had authority, it wouldn't use it; and that nobody can force it to in court. If any part of that argument is correct, the justices -- not a splintered lower court -- should be the ones to say so.

Back in 1999 environmentalists petitioned the EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions in new motor vehicles. A few years later the EPA declined. The agency contended that it lacked statutory authority over greenhouse gases, though the law grants it power over "any air pollutant from any class or classes of new motor vehicle . . . [which] may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The law defines "air pollutant" as any "substance or matter which is emitted into or otherwise enters the ambient air" and defines "effects on welfare" as including effects on "climate." The agency further declared that even if it's wrong on the law, it prefers not to regulate greenhouse emissions at this time, because of scientific "uncertainty" as to global climate change's mechanisms and a desire to take on the problem by other means.

DOJ_NMG_0033750

In response, a three-judge panel of the D.C. Circuit split three ways: One judge ruled that the agency was, in effect, free to ignore the law's command because of the extraneous policy judgments it identified. A second contended that the states and environmental groups lacked standing to bring the litigation in the first place. A third judge contended that they did have standing and that the EPA had defied the law. The result is that the court affirmed the EPA's position, but for no coherent reason.

The justices now face three distinct questions: Can anyone challenge the EPA's decision? Do greenhouse gases count as pollution? And, if so, can the EPA decline to regulate because, well, it doesn't feel like it?

The second two questions are easy: The law does not give the EPA discretion to ignore its legal duties, and the legal definition of pollution clearly seems to encompass greenhouse gases. The first question is far harder; to establish standing to litigate the case, the challengers have to show that global warming is causing them injuries and that regulating one small corner of the problem -- emissions by new vehicles -- would redress those injuries. Clearly, however, it makes no sense for the justices to leave in place a muddled decision that establishes nothing while letting the agency bind its own hands.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Transfers Wales Slaying Case To Portland (SEATIMES)

By Steve Miletich, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, June 14, 2006

In a major rebuke, the FBI's investigation into the slaying of federal prosecutor Thomas Wales was removed from the bureau's Seattle office today in the wake of a decision to reduce the number of agents working on the case.

The case was assigned to Robert Jordan, special agent in charge of the Portland FBI office, who will handle daily supervision of the investigation, the FBI said.

Jordan will have the authority to add new agents to a longstanding task force investigating Wales' killing in 2001, officials said. Agents have focused on a Bellevue airline pilot as the prime suspect.

Laura Laughlin, the special agent in charge of the Seattle FBI office, had cut the numbers of agents investigating the case from four to two last month, prompting the special prosecutor in the case to appeal her decision to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C.

Wales, 49, who worked in the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle for 18 years, was shot at about 10:40 p.m. Oct. 11, 2001, while sitting at his computer in the basement of his Queen Anne home. He was hit by several shots fired from his backyard.

If killed because of his work, Wales would be the first federal prosecutor in U.S. history to be slain in the line of duty. A $1 million reward has been offered for information that helps solve the case.

Laughlin issued a written statement today calling the new moves the completion of a "strategic realignment" in the investigation. She said she also had appointed a special analyst in the Seattle FBI office to the case to bolster the investigation.

"I am hopeful that with this task force realignment and the new analytical focus as well as the unique perspective and depth of experience that Robert Jordan can bring to this case we can make new progress in this investigation," Laughlin said. "This is not a cold case."

Laughlin said when "someone takes the life a prosecutor whose job it is to uphold the law, it is more than a murder, is it an attack on society and our justice system."

Jordan recently completed a temporary assignment as Deputy Assistant Director of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division in Washington, D.C. In the Wales case, he will carry the title of inspector, a special designation used by the FBI in challenging, high-profile investigations. The FBI appointed inspectors amid previous high-profile investigations of the 1995 bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City and the 1996 bombing of Atlanta's Centennial Park during the Olympic Games.

The Bellevue pilot, who has been under investigation in the Wales case for more than four years, had been targeted by Wales in a fraud case that concluded in 2001.

Agents have twice searched the pilot's house, and his friends and associates have been called before a federal grand jury in Seattle that is investigating the case.

No charges have been filed against the pilot, who has refused to be interviewed by reporters.

Laughlin's decision to reduce the number of agents working on the case came shortly after the Seattle FBI office disclosed in April that it had received an anonymous letter written by a person claiming responsibility for killing Wales.

DOJ_NMG_0033751

The letter was mailed from Las Vegas in January, around the time the Bellevue pilot visited that city while traveling on business, according to sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

The letter was written by someone claiming he was hired to kill Wales, and it contained what the FBI described as misleading and unrealistic information meant to throw off investigators.

Agents have been trying to directly link the letter to the pilot, who could be charged with obstruction of justice if he wrote it.

Laughlin's decision stunned agents because they viewed the developments related to the letter as a significant breakthrough in the investigation, sources said.

FBI Shakes Up Management Of Wales Investigation (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, June 14, 2006

SEATTLE -- The FBI has put its Portland, Ore., field office in charge of investigating the 2001 assassination of Tom Wales, an assistant U.S. attorney in Seattle, saying it hopes the shakeup will bring a "fresh point of view" to the unsolved case.

Seattle Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin had recently faced criticism for trimming the number of agents assigned to the case from four to two. That decision was reviewed by FBI headquarters at the request of a special prosecutor assigned to the Wales case.

Under the change, Portland Special Agent in Charge Robert Jordan was named "inspector" for the case and will oversee day-to-day operations. In a Tuesday night interview from Washington, D.C., he told The Associated Press he anticipates increasing the number of people working the case, and that he will meet with the special prosecutor and the investigative team next Monday in Seattle.

"I'm going to put any and every resource necessary to work this case," Jordan said.

As part of the realignment, one analyst with the Seattle office's Field Intelligence Group has already been assigned to the case, joining the two remaining agents who will stay on to ensure continuity, the agency said in a news release.

In 2003, there were eight agents dedicated to finding Wales' killer.

Wales, 49, who mostly handled white-collar crimes, was shot the night of Oct. 11, 2001, while sitting at his computer in his Queen Anne neighborhood home. He was hit by several shots fired through a window.

The only publicly identified suspect in the case is a Bellevue airline pilot who had feuded in court with Wales. No charges have been filed. The pilot has not responded to numerous Associated Press interview requests.

The FBI recently has focused its investigation on an anonymous letter purportedly written by the shooter. The letter was sent to the agency from Las Vegas in January; shortly before the letter was sent, the pilot was in Las Vegas.

Members of the FBI's task force on the case have interviewed more than 2,500 people and followed more than 3,000 investigative leads through all 50 states and half a dozen countries, the agency's news release said. The task force also conducted a nationwide search for replacement barrels for a Makarov semiautomatic pistol, the weapon used in the killing.

"This is not a cold case," Laughlin said Tuesday in the news release. "We are adjusting our approach and bringing new energy to an investigation that has been long and difficult."

Grand Jury Indicts 6 Men On Drug Trafficking Charges (PROJO)

The Providence Journal, June 14, 2006

PROVIDENCE -- A federal grand jury has issued indictments charging six men with drug-trafficking offenses, according to the U.S. Attorney's office and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

One of the indictments, issued last Wednesday in U.S. District Court, charges Oscar R. Sandoval-Espana, also known as Eddie Alberto Ramos, of Pawtucket, and Manual A. Mendez-Herasme, address unknown, with possessing with intent to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine on May 25.

In another indictment, the grand jury charges that between December 2005 and May 27, Ancelmo A. Castillo, age and address unknown, and Roberto E. Olivo, 43, of Providence, conspired to distribute and possess with intent to distribute one kilogram or more of heroin.

The third indictment charges Sandy Baez and Manuel Alberto Nogueira-Reico, ages and addresses unknown, with conspiring to distribute and distribution of 100 grams or more of heroin on May 10. It also charges Baez with assaulting a drug enforcement agent that day.

All six men are in state or federal custody, authorities said.

If convicted, the penalty for possessing with intent to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine or one kilogram or more of heroin is 10 years to life in prison and a $4-million fine.

DOJ_NMG_0033752

The maximum penalty for conspiracy to distribute heroin and distribution of heroin is 40 years imprisonment and a $2-million fine; the maximum penalty for assaulting a federal law-enforcement officer is 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Convictions Upheld In Boxed Bodies Case (DA)

Daily Advertiser, June 13, 2006

A state appeals court has upheld the second-degree murder convictions of a man and a woman whose victims' bodies were cut up and put in boxes.

The 3rd Circuit Court of Appeal on Monday rejected appeals by Cynthia Anderson and Larry Surratt, who were found guilty of killing Larry Cook and his girlfriend, Sheila Kirby in January 2003.

ADVERTISEMENT

The bodies were found in Bayou Cocodrie in Evangeline Parish 10 days apart in January 2003.

According to authorities, both victims had been shot before their bodies were cut apart and stuffed in the rubber boxes. Surratt and Cook were members of the Banshee motorcycle organization.

The appeals court dismissed claims that the victims had been working from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and that other members of the motorcycle group were more likely to have killed them.

Anderson also unsuccessfully argued that the jury in Ville Platte should have been allowed to consider a lesser charge of accessory after the fact.

Cook and Anderson are serving no-parole life prison sentences.

WADA Calls NHL Doping Test Meaningless (AP)

AP, June 14, 2006

MONTREAL (AP) -- The NHL is trying to fool the public with a flawed anti-doping program, the chairman of the World Anti-Doping agency said Tuesday.

Dick Pound said league statements Monday that there were no positive tests among 1,406 administered during the season were meaningless given the loopholes in its anti-doping program.

"All we can do is keep drawing the attention of the public to its shortcomings and make sure the public understands that it's being fooled by the NHL when it says it has a serious testing program," Pound said.

He said the NHL does not test for stimulants and other banned substances and does not test at times when players are likely to be caught, such as during offseason training.

Pound did not back off a statement he made in November that up to a third of NHL players may be using performance-enhancing drugs "if you include the full range of drugs, most of which they don't test for.

"I think they should make clear what they test for and what they don't. And make it clear when they're testing out of competition and in competition. And make it clear they don't test before and after games. And they don't test in the offseason and that they only test for steroids."

NHL players, management personnel and representatives of the NHL Players Association expressed delight when it was made known that none of the tests taken since January were positive.

And many mentioned Pound, saying the results proved his estimate was wrong.

NHLPA executive director Ted Saskin said Pound "should be embarrassed by his baseless and uninformed allegations.

"I would hope that in the future he refrains from commenting on NHL players since his last remarks were so off-base."

Pound said the league's program lacked transparency and that it should make public its "whole testing protocol," including who is administering the tests, how they were taken and which players were tested at what times.

The league said each of the league's roughly 700 players was tested up to two times between Jan. 15 and the end of the regular season. The tests were administered by the independent lab Comprehensive Drug Testing of Long Beach, Calif.

The program is run jointly by the league and the players association. It is the first time the league has had anti-doping tests.

Players were not tested for the drugs on WADA's list of banned substances that are prohibited only during competition, such as stimulants. Some cold remedies that contain stimulants, such as ephedrine, are suspected to be widely used by hockey players.

Bill Daly, NHL deputy commissioner, said the test results showed that "doping is not a problem in our sport.

"We're pleased but not surprised by the results," he said.

Steroids Inquiry Must Start With Old Scars (NYT)

By William C. Rhoden

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

FOR the last two seasons, steroid use in baseball has been framed as a simple story of giants, and one Giant in particular: Barry Bonds. Steroid use became a celebrity issue, with Bonds as its poster child.

Baseball's problem goes far beyond Bonds. This is not a superstar issue, but an everyday, kid-next-door issue, with average players trying to keep up, young players trying to make it, old players like Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley trying to hang on.

Last week, federal investigators searched Grimsley's home in Scottsdale, Ariz. Just as baseball appeared to achieve a calm, just as Commissioner Bud Selig assured fans that baseball's steroids problem was under control, we have this. Grimsley, according to documents filed in the United States District Court of Arizona, admitted using anabolic steroids, amphetamines and human growth hormone.

Fay Vincent, a former commissioner of Major League Baseball, said he was surprised by the raid because federal agents had not seemed interested in aggressively pursuing illegal drug use by athletes.

"Somebody's taking it seriously," Vincent said Monday from his office in Connecticut. "They're investigating beyond San Francisco and out into baseball, where there's obviously been a lot of problems.

"My guess is there's a lot more to come, and we're going to be very, very depressed about how much cheating, how much misuse of drugs was going on in baseball."

Vincent was commissioner from 1989 to 1992. During the 1980's, on the watch of a previous commissioner, Peter Ueberroth, baseball endured an embarrassing cocaine scandal involving some of the biggest names in the game. In 1992, Vincent barred pitcher Steve Howe from baseball for life as a seventh suspension for drug and alcohol troubles. The players union appealed Vincent's decision, and Howe was reinstated.

Steroids were barely on Vincent's radar then. "All I heard were rumors that Canseco was using steroids," he said, referring to the former Oakland Athletics slugger Jose Canseco. "That was the earliest I ever heard of steroids; I had no idea what a steroid was."

Now Vincent calls steroids baseball's greatest disgrace since the Black Sox scandal in 1919. How will the sport come out from under this cloud? Vincent favors holding hearings with no penalties attached. He would assure players that baseball has no intention of punishing anyone.

In March, Selig appointed George J. Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader, to investigate steroid use in major league baseball. But baseball's problems are so full-blown that criminal prosecution may be the only way to get to the truth. Baseball needs its own truth and reconciliation hearings to get to the root of drug use and to determine guilt or innocence.

Fans want the truth. Let's get at the truth.

We thought baseball hit its low point last season, when a parade of the biggest stars went, most ungraciously, before Congress to testify about steroid use.

"Baseball's got to get back on the high ground," Vincent said. "It needs to establish some moral principals. The game's got to be played according to the rules, otherwise it becomes professional wrestling or a movie — it's entertainment, but it's not a game."

Vincent has completed the first installment of a baseball oral history project ("The Only Game In Town: Baseball Stars of the 1930's and 1940's Talk About the Game They Loved," 2006, Simon & Schuster). In the spirit of oral histories, we should examine how athletes in each generation used substances — from crude homemade concoctions to steroids and amphetamines — to get an edge. Call players from each decade, beginning with the 50's, to testify about cheating, about when and how they used, and why they used.

"As somebody wisely said, 'Babe Ruth used a prohibited substance when he played — it was called booze,' " Vincent said.

"All athletes in every sport have always looked for a competitive advantage. The track people have done it; I think it goes back to the Greeks. You're never going to get rid of that."

We always say this, but let's prove it. The Mitchell investigation is covering a period of only 15 years. That will provide a snapshot. The hearings I envision would follow the intricate web of cheating in baseball that goes back decades.

"I really think there's going to be a lot more Grimsleys," Vincent said, "because the feds are finally doing what they should do: they're investigating the misuse of these drugs by athletes."

Vincent said he did not like the idea of more hearings like the one Congress held last year.

"Congress doesn't want to do that," he said. "You get very popular guys up there saying, 'We're going to take the Fifth Amendment.' It becomes a circus. Everybody gets hurt — baseball gets hurt."

Baseball has hurt itself for decades by looking the other way. Now it's time for the sport — from owners to players to trainers to the men and women who cover the game — to look in the mirror and examine the soul of their sport.

DOJ_NMG_0033754

Vincent wants baseball to regain its moral high ground. At this point, I'll settle for truth and reconciliation.

UK Fears Record Afghan Heroin Output (GUA)

Guardian, June 13, 2006

The Afghanistan province being patrolled by British troops will produce at least one third of the world's heroin this year, according to drug experts who are forecasting a harvest that is both a record for the country and embarrassing for the western funded war on narcotics.

British officials are bracing themselves for the result of an annual UN poppy survey due later this summer. Early indications show an increase on Helmand's 1999 record of 45,000 hectares (112,500 acres) and a near-doubling of last year's crop.

"It's going to be massive," said one British drugs official. "My guess is it's going to be the biggest ever." UN, American and Afghan officials agreed.

"It could be over 50,000 hectares, or over 50% of the total [Aghan] crop," said General Muhammad Daud, the deputy interior minister for counter-narcotics. Helmand's bumper harvest highlights the dramatic failure of western counter-narcotics efforts that have cost at least $2bn (about £1.09bn) since 2001. It could undo progress made last year, when poppy cultivation dropped 21% after President Hamid Karzai's call for a "jihad" on drugs. And it spells particularly bad news for Britain, which is leading the anti-narcotics campaign and has deployed 3,300 soldiers to the large and lawless province.

As Afghanistan accounts for almost 90% of the world's heroin supply, that would mean Helmand supplies about one-third. Drug experts say the province is as central to Afghanistan's illegal economy as California is to America's legal one.

"If you took Helmand out of the picture, Afghanistan would fall from the world's top poppy grower to second or third place," said one US official. British and American officials cannot resort to the tactics of the Taliban, which slashed poppy cultivation to 8,000 hectares in 2001 by threatening to shoot farmers. But western efforts using less violent methods, such as encouraging farmers to grow legal crops, have proved fruitless.

The smuggling kingpins who control the £1.5bn trade have become rich, powerful and apparently untouchable. Although several hundred low-level couriers have been arrested, not one "big fish" has been tried in Afghanistan - a critical failing according to analysts. "Until Karzai arrests and jails one big dealer, people will not believe the central government is behind this drive," said a former American anti-narcotics contractor.

The most damaging allegations swirl around the minister charged with counter-narcotics, Gen Daud. Several western officials allege Gen Daud, a former Tajik warlord, has historical and family links to smuggling. Gen Daud denies the allegations as "politicking" and blames the British embassy for trying to slur his reputation.

"It is very shameful for a big country with such a good reputation to make allegations like this. They should first investigate, and if they have any proof bring it forward," he said at his office.

As proof of his modest wealth, Gen Daud said the government paid his rent, his children walked to school and one of his brothers worked as a taxi driver in Saudi Arabia.

Sour relations with the drugs minister are not the only problem facing British officials in tackling this year's bumper crop. American congressmen are ratcheting up pressure to start poppy eradication using pesticide-spraying planes, a controversial tactic. Aerial spraying has been used extensively against coca plantations in Colombia but is trenchantly opposed by British and Afghans officials, who say it would be disastrous in Afghanistan. "It could drive farmers into the hands of the insurgents," said one.

But an American official predicted that without a dramatic drop in next year's crop, spraying could lead to a UK-US rift by 2008. "Spraying will continue to be a cloud on the horizon and it will get darker," he said.

In Helmand British commanders insists the 3,300 soldiers will avoid tackling drugs in favour of providing security and development funds. "We have to put the things in place that will make it no longer necessary to grow poppy," said a senior officer.

But drug experts say it will be impossible to avoid the drugs war. Britain's main enemy, the Taliban, has developed close links to drug smugglers, sometimes providing them with weapons and vehicles. On Sunday a British soldier, named as Captain Jim Philippson, became the first combat fatality in Helmand after a battle with suspected Taliban forces.

Chateaugay Native Selected To Head U.S. Marshals Service (PLATTSPR)

By CASEY RYAN VOCK, Staff Writer

Plattsburgh (NY) Press-Republican, June 14, 2006

PLATTSBURGH — A Chateaugay native is directing the U.S. Marshals Service, placing him in the highest-ranking position in the country's oldest law-enforcement agency.

DOJ_NMG_0033755

"Growing up on a dairy farm gives you an appreciation for hard work," John F. Clark Jr., 45, said in an interview with the Press-Republican.

"That has conveyed with my life and my career."

The 1978 graduate from Chateaugay Central School was appointed by President George W. Bush and sworn in March 18 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Clark is the agency's ninth director but the first to have had a career as a marshal.

PRISONERS, FUGITIVES

The U.S. Marshals Service was founded by President George Washington in 1789, when he appointed the first 13 marshals.

The agency is responsible for the custody of federal prisoners and the apprehension of fugitives.

"I had a desire to enter law enforcement really as a small child in the first or second grade," Clark said.

His father, John Clark, was a Chateaugay town justice for about 12 years.

"From the time I was a small child, I knew it was a career path I wanted to enter into."

And what a career that has been.

After graduating from Hudson Valley Community College in 1980, Clark took a job with the U.S. Border Patrol along the border with Mexico.

The next year, he joined the Capital Police in Washington, D.C.

He became a U.S. marshal in 1983, serving tours of duty in San Francisco; San Jose, Calif.; and Richmond, Va.

In 1990, Clark was promoted to work in the Office of Internal Affairs at the agency's headquarters in Arlington, Va.

He was further promoted in 1993 to chief inspector of the International Fugitive Investigation Branch and spent three years in the position.

In 1996, Clark became the chief inspector for the Office of Internal Affairs.

He has also served in other positions such as Acting Marshal and Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal for the Eastern District of Virginia.

Through the mid 1990s, Clark worked on his bachelor's degree in criminal justice, which he received in 1997 from Syracuse University.

MOUSSAOUI TRIAL

Then, in 2002, Bush appointed him to the post of U.S. marshal for the Eastern District of Virginia. In that role, he oversaw the security of terrorist Zacarius Moussaoui during his trial.

"There was a lot of press contingent at that trial every day — worldwide press," he said.

Now Clark oversees about 5,000 employees and every national law-enforcement mission, but he rarely finds himself in the courtroom.

"Things are different now. I have much more contact with Congress, and I have testified before Congress. I interact with the Department of Justice, including the attorney general and his staff.

"And, of course, I am required to do a lot more travel, which does interfere with my occasional trips back to the North Country.

"I have a more national scope of responsibility over the entire U.S. Marshals Service."

Clark, as director of the agency, presides over the agency's budget and its resources.

TORONTO TERRORISTS

Clark said he was in Toronto recently, where 17 suspected al-Qaida sympathizers were arrested for allegedly possessing three times the amount of explosives used in the Oklahoma City bombing.

"They have a great police department there," Clark said.

But the discovery of suspected terrorists that close to the U.S. border was a wake-up call, he said.

"I think it just shows how vulnerable everyone still is in the world. Our U.S.-Canadian border is still something that we need to pay close attention to securing.

"This shows that terrorism is conveying to North America."

small-town values

Clark now resides in the Washington, D.C., suburb of Oak Hill, Va., with his wife, Luci, who also has had a career with the Marshals Service.

To escape the fast-paced life he now leads, Clark returns to Chateaugay to visit his mother, Louella Clark, and his two sisters who still live in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0033756

"I get out as much as I can to fish in that area. I get home two or three times a year and more if possible. That seems to be the limit lately, regrettably."

Growing up in the North Country gave him an appreciation for the simpler things in life, he said.

"I still like small-town northern New York, where people still know your name and your family, and they wave to you.

"Those kinds of things stick with you. It gives you good values. That has conveyed with my life and my career here."

Fugitive Gunman Makes Appearance In Federal Court (GBPG)

By Paul Srubas

Green Bay (WI) Press-Gazette, June 13, 2006

Barentson captured in Grand Chute in early morning

A federal fugitive who allegedly shot a Nebraska jeweler about a month ago appeared in federal court in Green Bay this morning after his arrest earlier today in an Appleton-area hotel.

Steven Barentson, 57, was arrested without incident about 5:15 a.m. at the hotel after a citizen tip put authorities on his trail in Calumet County, where he was spotted in a tavern near the Calumet and Outagamie county lines. He was the target of a manhunt in the area after his vehicle was discovered abandoned Sunday at a Calumet County farm near Forest Junction. Green Bay police assisted in the hunt.

Barentson, brought in by federal marshals to the federal courtroom in Green Bay, bowed slightly to media gathered in the corridors as he was led before U.S. Magistrate James Sickel.

He was arrested on charges of possession of a firearm by a felon and failure to appear for a federal jury trial in August 1992 in Grand Forks, N. D.

Sickel scheduled him for an identity hearing Friday and ordered him held without bond. The hearing Friday requires prosecutors to prove, probably through fingerprints, that Barentson is indeed the man wanted in North Dakota for a variety of federal charges, said Tom Phillip, associate federal defender appointed to Barentson, who claims indigency.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Roach said no charges are likely to arise out of Barentson's presence in Wisconsin, and federal action here will involve nothing more than the formal process needed to send him back to North Dakota.

Paperwork concerning charges against Barentson in Nebraska had not arrived in Green Bay this morning, and Nebraska authorities likely will work with federal authorities in North Dakota concerning the May 9 shooting of a jewelry store owner in Omaha. The store owner survived.

Barentson allegedly has been on the run since failing to make that August 1992 court appearance in Grand Forks. He was convicted of armed robbery in Cook County, Ill., in and Polk County, Iowa, in 1980, and escape in Jasper County, Iowa, in 1988.

IMMIGRATION:

Bail Set At $340,000 For Customs Officer (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, June 14, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A judge Tuesday set bail at $350,000 for a Customs and Border Protection officer accused of allowing illegal immigrants to be smuggled through his border inspection lane in return for cash and a Lexus.

Richard Elizalda, 55, will be back in court June 20 for a status conference.

If the defendant makes bail and is released, he will be required to wear a Global Positioning System device to monitor his whereabouts, said Magistrate Judge William McCurine Jr.

Elizalda is charged with 11 counts, including bribery by a public official, conspiracy to bring in illegal aliens for financial gain and bringing in illegal aliens for financial gain.

Seven co-defendants, Raquel Arin, Perla Centella, Carmen Alvarado, Sandra Munoz, Kenneth Web, Victor Gomez and Jorge Gomez, are also charged with conspiracy.

Victor and Jorge Gomez are additionally charged with trying to smuggle 200 pounds of marijuana across the border.

Alvarado and her daughter, Munoz, are also accused with filing a false tax return with the Internal Revenue Service.

According to the 15-count indictment, Elizalda arranged specific times with Arin and others to allow vehicles to pass through his primary inspection lane for the purpose of alien smuggling.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Frakes alleged last week that information on the defendant's lane assignment was passed on to the smugglers via pager, cell phone or in person during one of his breaks.

DOJ_NMG_0033757

Stewart Roberts, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Diego, alleged that Elizalda received between $500 and $1,000 per smuggled immigrant.

Most of the defendants face a mandatory minimum sentence of five years in prison if convicted, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Joanna Baltes said last week.

At Elizalda's arraignment, Baltes said the defendant was a flight risk because he had access to large amounts of cash. At least $36,500 was found in a briefcase in a closet during a search of his residence, Baltes said.

Investigators also found five cell phones under Elizalda's name and five other cell phones in his home, the prosecutor said.

Baltes told the judge that Arin paid $54,000 in cash for a BMW and had made other large purchases. Her bail was set at $75,000.

Elizalda was the second Customs and Border Protection officer to be arrested last week for alleged immigrant smuggling.

U.S. Customs and Border Protection Inspector Michael Gilliland, 44, who worked at the Otay Mesa Port of Entry, was arrested last Tuesday.

More than $500,000 in cash was recovered in the homes of the defendants in that case, code-named "Operation Midnight Express," said U.S. Attorney Carol Lam.

McCurine set Gilliland's bail at $750,000 and told him he would be under house arrest if he was released.

High-Tech Titans Unite On Lifting Visa Caps (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

Bill Gates and Scott McNealy, long-warring titans of the software world, don't agree on much. But they are united in the effort to get the U.S. government to lift the caps on immigration visas for highly skilled workers.

"The U.S. has succeeded because the right people have come from all over the world to be here," says Mr. Gates, the chairman of Microsoft Corp. By keeping them out, the nation "is taking our greatest asset and throwing it away with both hands."

"This is all-important," agrees Mr. McNealy, chairman of Sun Microsystems Inc. "A greater influx of talent definitely changes the balance of power here in the U.S."

As Washington bogs down in debates over whether to build a wall on the Mexican border or grant amnesty to illegal immigrants, the plight of skilled workers has become a sideshow. Current law limits so-called H-1B temporary visas for highly skilled workers to 65,000 a year, plus an additional 20,000 for those who have earned advanced degrees from U.S. educational institutions. It also limits permanent visas for highly skilled workers. The limits are favored by labor unions and others who fear foreign workers may take jobs from U.S. citizens -- although tech companies say the visas are used only for jobs when qualified Americans are unavailable.

With the tech industry booming, those caps are biting: the H-1B visas for 2007 are already spoken for.

Mr. Gates says the visa pinch is hurting his company's ability to complete new products. "We have product meetings where someone will say: 'This is when it will get done with immigration changes, and this is when it will get done without,' " he says.

So he and Mr. McNealy and a steady stream of other high-tech leaders have traveled to Washington in recent weeks, calling on Congress to lift the caps -- even if the broader immigration bill, as expected, falls victim to election-year politics.

There's an irony here. Microsoft and Sun build the computer systems that allow people, in theory, to work anywhere, anytime. They are masters of the virtual world, in which national boundaries supposedly melt away. Who cares if researchers are in Silicon Valley or Redmond, Wash., or Siberia and Timbuktu?

But the visa fight shows these tech leaders do care -- a lot. And it highlights an often overlooked reality of the new economy. Geography still matters. Distance isn't dead. The world isn't flat. At least, not yet.

Mr. McNealy says Sun does 75% to 80% of its research and development in the U.S. Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp., says his company also employs most of its researchers in the U.S. and wants to keep it that way.

The reasons? Patriotism, says Mr. Barrett, is one. Self-interest, says Mr. McNealy, is another. "If engineering is happening here in the U.S., I think my children will have a richer work environment."

But the business reasons, I suspect, are more powerful. Mr. Barrett points out that locating researchers in the U.S. keeps them close to the world's leading research universities. The U.S., by one ranking, is home to 18 of the world's top 20 research universities.

Moreover, Messrs. Barrett, McNealy and Gates all say that it helps to have a concentration of researchers in the same place, where they can interact over the water cooler and at the baseball game, as well as on the computer screen. "We are the leaders in mobile work force," says Mr. McNealy. "But absolutely, you need some level of critical mass."

And then, of course, there's the fact that many of the world's best and brightest want to live and work in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0033758

The per capita output of the U.S. is now about $36,700, according to the World Bank, while per capita output globally is $5,500. That's a big difference -- Americans earn 6.7 times as much as the world average. And for all the talk of a flattening earth and all the fears of outsourcing U.S. jobs abroad, the pay advantage Americans enjoy is getting bigger, not smaller. The ratio was 6.2 to 1 in 1990, 5.8 in 1980, and 5.4 in 1970.

The fact that leading-edge companies like Intel, Microsoft and Sun want to do their leading-edge work within U.S. borders certainly contributes to that American advantage. And it's hard to imagine why the U.S. government would want it any other way.

A smarter national policy, says Mr. Barrett, would be to staple a green card to the diploma of every foreigner who earns an advanced degree in the U.S.

Mr. McNealy goes further: "Why aren't we telling people, if you want an education in our universities, you must stay and work here for 15 years after you graduate?"

"Most of these guys don't end up in jail," Mr. McNealy says, warming to his argument. "They don't end up on entitlements. They tend to pay taxes. They keep their yards nice and clean. They drive Priuses. They recycle."

"What are we thinking?" he adds.

Spitting Into The Wind On Immigration (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

Fuss in Washington notwithstanding, there's an easy way to reduce illegal immigration. It doesn't involve building fences or spending hundreds of billions to create an intrusive bureaucracy to hunt down illegals one by one and deport them. Just introduce a fraud-proof national ID card with biometric information; make it illegal, with real penalties, for employers to hire anyone, citizen or immigrant, who doesn't have one.

Presto. Businesses would no longer be able to profess the impossibility of judging who's legal and who isn't. Most of the jobs illegal immigrants do would disappear, and many if not most of the immigrants would leave for the same reason they came -- better opportunities elsewhere.

Before we go down this road, however, would we really like the consequences?

With 12 million illegals in the country, whole sectors of our economy exist only because of immigrant labor. Farms would shut down along with jobs for suppliers of seeds, packaging and ancillary services. Jobs for waiters, maitre d's and chefs would vanish, not just those of immigrant busboys, kitchen hands and cleaners. Some 1.2 million illegals are believed to work in construction. If the cost of home building goes up, demand goes down: Less wood is sold, fewer nails, fewer power tools, fewer pickup trucks. Contractors would make less profit; ergo, Harley-Davidson would sell fewer Road Kings with all the chrome and finery.

Armchair wonks say, "Enforce the law and damn the consequences." Every time the government does, however, a few of those couch warriors suddenly become vocal activists on the other side. It's their employer, their brother-in-law, their neighbor who finds himself facing criminal charges. It's their house that doesn't get finished. Don't be surprised if some of the latest politically inspired crackdowns end the same way. Blowback in the Cincinnati area is already growing against the arrest last month of four foremen for Fischer Homes, a well-liked local home builder.

In search of a respectable argument, liberal enthusiasts for a border clampdown have lately adopted the obnoxious and condescending reification of "unskilled labor" popularized by some economists. It may be true in some sense that illegals hold down the wages of low-wage workers, but it tells you nothing useful. It tells you only that the supply of immigrant workers has an impact on the wages of mostly immigrant workers for jobs that mostly would not exist if immigrant workers weren't available to fill them.

The very category "unskilled labor" is misleading. Any American worker, however backward, has one important skill advantage over most illegal immigrants: English. And all workers have a skill that leads to more skills: They can learn.

In turn, a decently functioning job market rewards people for acquiring skills, not for remaining unskilled -- perverse is the idea of wanting to reduce labor competition for unskilled jobs in order to make unskilled jobs more desirable. OK, let's ban unskilled immigrants altogether. Let's welcome all the doctors and engineers who want to come but reserve the no-skill jobs for Americans. Let's make it so attractive for Americans not to acquire skills that we can close our schools. Think of the money we'd save.

If this is crazy, it's only so because of the crazy premise. Immigrant workers are a resource -- no economy is better off for taking resources away.

Mexicans -- let's admit this is largely about the Mexican wave -- have crossed the border for jobs ever since there was a border. And amnesty was once routine because the statute of limitations on illegal entry ran out in five years. If the hypocrisy of our current system bothers you -- and it should, because it allows workers to come and toil for us without granting them legal status -- it's no denigration of the idea of law and lawfulness to admit to ourselves we have a bad law on our hands.

DOJ_NMG_0033759

What's a better approach? Even guest worker solutions are artful fudgery -- a guest worker won't go home any more reliably than an illegal will. So how about just open the door to anyone willing to put down a refundable entry deposit (say, $2,000) in return for a biometric work card? At a stroke, this would take the profit out of a vast underground industry. Chinese "snakeheads" cadge upwards of $40,000 per illegal immigrant. Latin "coyotes" get $2,000 or more. Not to mention the sizeable business done by document forgers and traffickers in stolen Social Security numbers.

This deposit could be charged off against future income tax liability (note, not payroll taxes), an incentive for immigrants to stay legal and move up into the bracket-worthy classes. It could be refunded when he or she leaves the country -- an incentive to return home if jobs become scarce in the U.S.

Polls say Americans want immigration cut down and they don't want amnesty for illegals, yet the Senate just passed an immigration reform that would increase immigration and proffer amnesty. The system works! -- at least it works better than it did when Congress jumped off a cliff with the Volstead Act, knowing that though Americans liked the idea of liquor prohibition, they'd end up hating the consequences.

This doesn't please the border warriors, but they're spitting into the wind. In his table talk, a certain German dictator observed that religions have far more stability than states, which tend to come and go, swept away by the tides of history. The U.S., a young nation but already one of the world's longest-lived political states, has a chance to beat the odds thanks to our freedom from any of the usual fatal exclusivisms. But it will have to accept that it exists on a continent whose fastest-growing cultural force is Spanish speakers.

TAX:

Campbell Gets 30 Months In Prison Sentence Is An 'Abomination,' Former Atlanta Mayor Says (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, Jeffry Scott And Beth Warren, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 14, 2006

A federal judge scolded former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell for leading an office riddled with corruption. Then he sentenced him to 30 months in prison.

"As the trial progressed, I was overcome, almost appalled, by the breadth of misconduct in your administration," U.S. District Judge Richard Story told Campbell on Tuesday during the sentencing hearing in federal court. Later, Story looked Campbell in the eye and said, "I am going to send you to prison, and I do not take that lightly. Within my heart I am not sure you have accepted responsibility for what has transpired."

With the sentence, the judge put the final stamp on a six-year-long federal investigation into Campbell's behavior while he was mayor. Prosecutors claimed he ran his office as a corrupt enterprise, taking cash bribes to fund a lavish lifestyle of gambling and international trips with girlfriends.

Campbell remained stoic as the sentence was handed down. The 52-year-old, who served two terms as Atlanta's mayor from 1994 to 2002, was convicted in March on three counts of tax evasion but acquitted on racketeering charges and taking thousands of dollars in bribes.

Under federal law in determining the sentence, Story was able to consider evidence and testimony presented during the trial about Campbell taking bribes, even though he was acquitted on those charges.

In addition to prison time, Story ordered Campbell to pay the government almost $63,000 in back taxes, a $6,000 fine and to serve a year on probation following his prison term. Prosecutors contended Campbell had evaded paying taxes on about $200,000.

Story alluded to the frequent, impromptu news conferences Campbell held on the courthouse steps during his trial in which he proclaimed his innocence and disputed the testimony of government witnesses in detail. The judge implied that Campbell's lack of contrition was one reason he gave the former mayor such a stiff sentence.

Campbell, who did not speak in court, called the sentence an "abomination" as he left the courthouse. He also claimed the judge was trying to undo the jury's verdict. "This is not justice," he said.

Campbell has frequently called the federal investigation into his dealings "racist," "an inquisition" and a "witch hunt."

Campbell vowed to file an appeal, which he must do in the next 10 days.

DOJ_NMG_0033760

If the judge grants him an appeal bond, he will stay out of prison while his appeal is pending. Otherwise, he will report to a federal facility when ordered by the federal Bureau of Prisons.

Mark Kadish, professor at Georgia State University's College of Law, said Story seemed to follow federal guidelines. "I don't think Campbell will have much of an issue of appeal," he said, "and I don't think the judge will give him an appellate bond."

He said Campbell will probably serve his time in a minimum-security prison camp.

U.S. attorney responds

U.S. Attorney David Nahmias, radiant with victory, said Campbell would have gotten a lighter sentence if he had accepted responsibility for his actions in office. Nahmias said a finding Tuesday by the judge that Campbell obstructed justice probably resulted in an extra six months of prison time.

He also responded to charges that his office was out to get Campbell.

"Bill Campbell may believe that he has been the center of our universe, and his case was indeed important because of the position he held and the conduct he engaged in," Nahmias said. But to give some "perspective," Nahmias said that his office had prosecuted and convicted over 6,000 people since 1999, when the Campbell investigation began.

"Like them, Bill Campbell broke the law, and like most of them, he is going to prison. And we are going back to work," Nahmias said.

Campbell supporters were horrified at the sentence. When court was adjourned, many gathered in the federal courthouse and formed a prayer circle.

Steve Labovitz, an attorney who served as Campbell's chief of staff and testified for the defense, said he was shocked the former mayor got so much jail time.

"I absolutely do not think it's fair," he said. "Michael Childs, the one who started this whole investigation, who committed arson, was only given 33 months."

Before the trial, Childs told investigators he paid thousands of dollars in bribes to a Campbell aide because he was promised the mayor would get him a liquor license for his strip club. But prosecutors feared that Childs, who had pleaded guilty to arson in another case, would be a liability, and never called him to the stand.

Labovitz noted that Campbell was acquitted on all the substantive charges, except for tax evasion. "All the government witnesses who testified against Campbell had tax issues. None of them are going to jail," Labovitz said.

Although Campbell's attorneys claimed any failure to pay taxes resulted from "sloppy bookkeeping," prosecutors told the judge this wasn't a case of a man forgetting to pay his taxes. They contended that Campbell worked hard to conceal his illegal activities and then tried to obstruct the investigation.

Gabe Pascarella, once a close friend and gambling buddy of Campbell's, testified Tuesday he gave Campbell records detailing the former mayor's spending and travel after learning investigators were asking about those subjects. He also secretly taped investigators when they questioned him and turned over to Campbell a rough transcript of the interview.

Pascarella owned a travel agency and kept a credit card account to pay for some of Campbell's travels with girlfriends. During the trial, he testified that Campbell repaid him in cash for those expenses. The arrangement was set up to keep the affairs from Campbell's wife, he said.

Judge finds bribery

Prosecutors hammered at Campbell's voracious appetite for spending cash, which nearly tripled from 1996 to 1999, when he spent $23,600. At the same time, cash withdrawals from his personal bank accounts shrank each year to just $69 for all of 1999.

Prosecutor Sally Yates, who led the Campbell investigation from the beginning, told the judge that Campbell failed to pay taxes on thousands of dollars in speaking fees, rent from former aide Dewey Clark, who lived in Campbell's basement, and the campaign funds he used for personal expenses. Campbell paid bills ranging from electricity to school tuition in cash to hide his ill-gotten gains, she said.

Outside the courthouse, Yates shook her head and said, "He [Campbell] still seems to be placing blame on others."

Though the jury found Campbell not guilty of corruption, Story didn't, saying he believed Campbell accepted $55,000 in illegal bribes from city subcontractor Dan DeBardelaben. The jurors were confused by different dates given for the DeBardelaben bribe. After the trial, several jurors said they would have convicted Campbell on racketeering if they had known the dates were not contradictory.

Juror Renita L. Stowers said she and fellow jurors believed Campbell was corrupt, but couldn't put the money in his hands.

"I'm pleased with how it turned out," Stowers said. "He deserves his punishment like everybody else. Just because he was the mayor doesn't mean he should get away with what he done. I think the judge done good."

DOJ_NMG_0033761

Lead defense attorney Billy Martin, who argued for a probated sentence, called the government's arguments "outrageous" and "desperate."

Defense attorneys tried to show that Campbell won money at casinos and in high-stakes Friday night poker games with friends, including Pascarella.

Defense attorney Jerry Froelich criticized prosecutors for speculating about how much cash Campbell had and how he got it.

"Winning at a casino is not illegal and I don't know anyone prosecuted for Friday night card games," Froelich said. He later said that no one knows how much Campbell won. "Gamblers just don't keep track," he said. "It's just bad luck."

According to defense calculations, Campbell owed the government $11,346 in back taxes, based on about $40,500 of unreported income, Martin said.

For the first time, Campbell attorneys argued that one of the sources of cash he used to fuel his lifestyle was his late mother, June, who, they said, gave Campbell $20,000 in cash while he was in office. They included a letter from Campbell's mother in the pre-sentencing report as evidence that she gave her son money.

Yates said that the $20,000 gift from June Campbell would have taken about "half her income" in a given two-year period, and therefore it was incredible to think Campbell's mother provided him with that much cash.

Defense attorney Martin retorted: "It's not for them [prosecutors] to say that his mother is so poor she can't afford to give her son $20,000."

After the sentencing, Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, Campbell's successor in office, wished the former mayor's family well. She added that it was unfortunate that there was "a sense that people can't trust the government."

Angelo Fuster, who served two years as Campbell's communications director, said the sentencing "seems like a sad, inevitable ending to a story that should have ended so differently. It's a cautionary tale that no matter how talented you are you need to keep a sense of reality. I thought he was the leader of the future. But it came to a crashing end."

Former Atlanta police Deputy Chief Lou Arcangeli was blunt when he commented on the sentence.

"The words that come to mind are sordid, hedonistic, squalid, self-centered and selfish — and I voted for him," Arcangeli said. "There's a Dirty Dozen of convicted city officials [during his years in office] and he's the chairman of the board. What a legacy."

-- Staff writers Mae Gentry, Shelia Poole and S.A. Reid contributed to this article.

-- Bill Torpy's e-mail address is btorpy@ajc.com; Jeffry Scott, jlscott@ajc.com; and Beth Warren, bwarren@ajc.com.

Ex-Atlanta Mayor Given 30-Month Term And Financial Penalty In Tax Case (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

ATLANTA, June 13 — Saying that presiding over the corruption trial of former Mayor William C. Campbell made him feel like "Diogenes looking for an honest man," Judge Richard W. Story sentenced Mr. Campbell to 30 months in prison and one year of probation for convictions on three counts of tax evasion.

Mr. Campbell also has to pay almost $63,000 in back taxes on $160,000 of unreported income and a fine.

"I was overcome and almost appalled with disappointment in terms of the breadth and depth of corruption in your administration," Judge Story, of Federal District Court in Atlanta, said to Mr. Campbell, who sat stone-faced as the sentence was pronounced.

The trial capped a seven-year investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Internal Revenue Service into corruption at City Hall that led to the convictions of 10 contractors and officials, many of them Mr. Campbell's close associates.

The sentence fit squarely within federal guidelines, but sending Mr. Campbell to prison was a blow to the former mayor who had said he felt "vindicated with regard to any allegations of corruption" in March, after a jury failed to convict him of charges of racketeering and bribery.

Based on the new verdict and his record of service, defense lawyers had asked the judge to give Mr. Campbell probation or home confinement.

Instead of speaking to reporters on the courthouse steps, as he has throughout the trial, Mr. Campbell and his wife left through an underground garage.

"I disagree vehemently with the sentence," Mr. Campbell said, stopping briefly. "This is, I think, an abomination in terms of what we expected and certainly in terms of what the jury's verdict was."

DOJ_NMG_0033762

On March 10, a jury found there was sufficient doubt that Mr. Campbell had headed a criminal enterprise and accepted illegal bribes and campaign contributions, the conditions that had to be met for a determination of guilt under the Racketeering Influenced Corrupt Organizations statute, or RICO. He was found guilty on the tax evasion counts.

On Tuesday, Judge Story said the law allowed him to determine guilt based on a "preponderance of evidence," a somewhat less stringent standard than the jury had to meet with "reasonable doubt." He found that Mr. Campbell had taken more than $50,000 in bribes from an executive who wanted a computer contract with the city.

Judge Story also found Mr. Campbell guilty of obstruction of justice based on new testimony from a witness who regularly played poker with him.

The witness, Gabe Pascarella, a travel agent who was a gambling buddy, told F.B.I. agents in April, after Mr. Campbell's trial, that Mr. Campbell had taken financial records from him that included travel records and gambling tally sheets.

A defense lawyer, Jerry Froelich, tried to discredit Mr. Pascarella's recollection by pointing out that he had been questioned six to eight times before the trial without disclosing that Mr. Campbell had ever taken any records from him.

In another twist, prosecutors disputed the credibility of a newly discovered letter from Mr. Campbell's mother that defense lawyers presented to Judge Story as part of a sealed "presentence report."

The letter, Mr. Campbell's lawyers argued, showed that his mother, June Campbell, had given her son $20,000 in the tax years in question, a gift that would not have qualified as taxable income, possibly making him eligible for a lighter sentence.

The defense team had argued in the trial that the large sum of cash that Mr. Campbell spent could be explained by his gambling winnings.

As he had throughout the trial, Judge Story listened to the arguments impassively. As he began to rule on points of law that influenced the penalties, it seemed clear that the prosecution's case had carried more weight.

After a break, Judge Story said, "I'm going to send you to prison, and I do not take that lightly."

Mr. Campbell has 10 days to file an appeal and has indicated that he will.

A judge will then decide if Mr. Campbell can remain free on bond or must await his appeal in prison.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Funds For Wars And Hurricane Aid (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — The House of Representatives approved a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill on Tuesday to provide more money for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and to finance the recovery of Gulf Coast states battered by hurricanes last year.

The Senate is expected to approve the measure in the next few days, clearing the legislation for President Bush to sign.

House and Senate negotiators reached agreement among themselves and with the White House by reducing disaster assistance to stay within the limit set by Mr. Bush. Still, legislators from Louisiana and other Gulf Coast states praised the final bill, saying it would provide money desperately needed by their constituents to repair damage done by the hurricanes of 2005.

The vote on the bill was 351 to 67. The no votes came from 19 Republicans, mainly fiscal conservatives, and 48 Democrats, including some of the party's more liberal House members.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, said that in negotiations with the Senate, he made clear that the House would not accept $1 more than the president had requested.

"We made good on this promise by rejecting some $14 billion in unnecessary, nonemergency spending added" by the Senate, Mr. Boehner said.

Spending in the final bill was closer to the level originally approved by the House, $91.9 billion, than to the amount endorsed by the Senate, $108.9 billion.

The final package includes $65.8 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, $3.9 billion for foreign aid, $19.8 billion for hurricane relief and $2.3 billion to prepare for a potential avian flu epidemic, with much of the remainder intended for border security.

The bill provides money to upgrade Humvees, Abrams tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles, as well as nearly $2 billion for new technology to counter the roadside bombs that have become the leading cause of death for American troops in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0033763

Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, the senior Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, voted for the bill, as did the House Democratic leader, Nancy Pelosi of California. But Mr. Obey denounced financing the war in Iraq with emergency spending bills, which are outside the regular budget and appropriations process.

"Such emergency spending is simply a gimmick that masks the full cost of the war, and it does not fool anybody except the American people," Mr. Obey said.

Representative Jeb Hensarling of Texas, a fiscally conservative Republican who voted against the bill, echoed this concern. "I support our troops, I support the war on terror, but I do not believe we should finance the war through emergency supplemental appropriations," Mr. Hensarling said in an interview. "That approach evades whatever spending discipline we have."

Mr. Hensarling said some items did not meet his definition of emergency spending. For example, he said, the bill includes $38 million to reseed oyster reefs, $400,000 to assist sugar cane growers in Texas and $27.6 million to upgrade steam tunnels under the United States Capitol.

Congress provided new authority to the secretary of defense to shift money between accounts to meet the military payroll and to offer bonuses to new recruits. Lawmakers allowed $3.75 billion in such transfers in December and have now agreed to increase the limit to $5 billion, as the armed forces have had difficulty meeting enlistment goals.

The bill provides $1.9 billion for border security, including $708 million to deploy 6,000 National Guard troops along the Southwest border to thwart illegal immigration from Mexico. Congress also provided money to hire 1,000 Border Patrol agents and to build detention space for 4,000 illegal immigrants. But House and Senate negotiators dropped $648 million that had been recommended by the Senate to increase port security.

The House and Senate bills included similar provisions intended to prevent the United States from establishing permanent bases in Iraq. The provisions were dropped from the final version of the legislation. Some Democrats, like Representative Jan Schakowsky of Illinois, cited the change as a reason for voting against the measure.

The bill provides $20 million for activities to promote democracy in Iran. It forbids American assistance to the Palestinian Authority unless a future Palestinian government agrees to forswear violence and recognize Israel.

Under the bill, the Federal Emergency Management Agency will receive $6 billion for its main disaster relief fund. That is $1.2 billion less than the president requested, $3.5 billion less than the House wanted and $4.4 billion less than the Senate proposed. The money will be used to remove debris, repair public works and provide housing for hurricane victims.

The bill also provides $550 million for a new veterans hospital in New Orleans, $50 million for higher education, and $235 million to help elementary and secondary school students displaced by the Gulf hurricanes.

The Army Corps of Engineers will receive $3.7 billion for flood control projects and levee repairs in Louisiana.

Reassessing Rehnquist (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 14, 2006

Pausing from its headlong rush toward adjournment, the Supreme Court will meet in special session this week to honor the memory of the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died last September.

Following long-standing tradition, the Supreme Court Bar on Thursday will convene a program of praise and reminiscence from friends and former clerks, then offer a memorial resolution for submission to the Court.

But even as Rehnquist's admirers prepare to praise him, his legacy is unsettled. After a respectful mourning period, his opinions and those of the Rehnquist Court are taking a beating, with even Republicans and conservative academics critiquing his record in ways that could pressure his successor and former law clerk, John Roberts Jr., to complete what he left undone.

Meanwhile, new information has emerged about Rehnquist: His long-private 1948 master's thesis has been published, a former aide has confirmed that Rehnquist once planned to retire in 1991, and the originator of his early nickname, the "Lone Dissenter," has stepped forward.

Most striking in the nine months since Rehnquist's death at age 80 has been the steady tide of academic symposia and law review articles that are taking him and his Court to task. Liberals criticize him for taking the wrong path, while conservatives say he did not travel far enough on the right one, allowing major doctrinal shifts on federalism, property rights, and other areas to fizzle or fade.

Even federal appeals Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III, a conservative who was considered a possible replacement for Rehnquist, mounted a detailed attack in the latest Stanford Law Review on the Rehnquist Court's "split-the-difference" jurisprudence -- allowing, for example, one Ten Commandments display to remain in a public place but not another, and upholding one University of Michigan affirmative action program but not the other. Though Wilkinson, who sits on the 4th U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0033764

Circuit Court of Appeals, noted that Rehnquist usually disapproved of the practice, the effect of splitting differences was to leave the impression of "a Court in a no-man's land -- a Court that has lost the legitimacy conferred by law."

In the same law review, University of Chicago law professor Richard Epstein, an iconoclastic libertarian, said that Rehnquist and retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor "should have pushed harder and moved farther" to limit federal power in the Court's federalism decisions. Jay Bybee, recently appointed by President George W. Bush to the 9th Circuit, also weighed in with a co-authored article, describing Rehnquist's approach to separation of powers as "sphinxlike."

"It's less criticism than disappointment," says Pepperdine Law School professor Douglas Kmiec, a Rehnquist fan who also wrote in the Stanford publication and dismisses the current criticism as academic carping. "It is very seldom that law professors get together to offer bouquets of praise." The Stanford publication does, however, also include articles from former colleagues and clerks praising Rehnquist.

Much of the scholarship, pro and con, divides Rehnquist's tenure into two or three phases, the major dividing point being his ascension from the position of associate justice to that of chief justice in 1986 -- when principle may have given way to a greater interest in compromise and incremental decision-making. "He could have spent his life as a lone ranger, or he could bring Tonto along with him, as he did," says Kmiec.

But small compromises have a way of turning into major, anti-democratic decisions, argues Wilkinson, pointing to the incremental decisions that culminated in Roe v. Wade. Rehnquist, he says, presided over a Court that was too willing to chip away at basic principles.

In Wilkinson's view, Bush v. Gore in 2000 was another turning point. "The Court may have been so shaken by the criticism over Bush v. Gore that it sought to reassure the country with a display of centrist evenhandedness," he wrote.

Wilkinson and Bybee also suggest that in his final years Rehnquist lost his earlier "vigor and vim," as Bybee puts it, and fought less to win over the votes of O'Connor and Justice Anthony Kennedy.

A REVOLUTION ON HOLD

The promise of a revolution in federalism contained in Rehnquist's 1995 decision United States v. Lopez, which struck down a federal law banning guns near schools as exceeding congressional power, faded in recent years, critics say. Even Rehnquist voted for federal power in 2003, in Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, a ruling that applied the federal Family and Medical Leave Act to state employees. By his final days in office, only two other justices joined him in dissenting from Gonzales v. Raich, which upheld federal authority to regulate in-state cultivation of marijuana for medical uses.

Conservatives give Rehnquist credit for making progress in limited areas such as restricting habeas corpus in criminal cases -- with a strong assist from Congress -- and winning support for school vouchers. But in many other areas, including hot-button issues such as abortion and affirmative action, the Rehnquist Court was a disappointment to the right.

"Rehnquist didn't get everything he wanted, but he did not have the votes," says Rutgers University law professor Earl Maltz, the editor of a Rehnquist retrospective book. "We'll see what happens now."

As Maltz's comment suggests, the current scholarship on the Rehnquist Court may intensify scrutiny on Roberts as the successor and heir apparent to Rehnquist's unfinished doctrines. Kennedy, likely the new swing vote, and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., O'Connor's replacement, will also be key, but it may take another new justice, and a few more years, to see if Rehnquist's doctrines are revived or remain short-lived.

"It might be a mistake to end the chapter on the Rehnquist Court with the chief's death," says Notre Dame Law School professor Richard Garnett, a former Rehnquist clerk who earlier this year participated in a Rehnquist symposium at Indiana University School of Law that included both criticism and praise.

One addition to the Rehnquist public record came along with the criticism in the Stanford Law Review: the first publication of Rehnquist's youthful but erudite Stanford master's thesis in political science, titled "Contemporary Theories of Rights," written in 1948.

"It was a great, overlooked find, a work of genius for someone aged 24," says Pepperdine's Kmiec, who first noticed a brief reference to it in one of Rehnquist's own books. He tried to obtain a copy, one thing led to another, and, months later, after obtaining approval from Stanford's archives and Rehnquist's family, the law review decided to print the thesis in full. A lengthy analysis by Kmiec, charting its impact on Rehnquist's later thinking, is included.

TALK OF RESIGNING

The Journal of Supreme Court History, published by the Supreme Court Historical Society, has also weighed in with a Rehnquist retrospective that offers several nuggets of interest.

In one article, former Rehnquist clerk John Nannes reveals the origin of Rehnquist's "lone dissenter" moniker. Nannes, now a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, was assigned to think up the entertainment for a Rehnquist reunion in 1975 and impulsively bought a Lone Ranger doll at a Maryland toy store. The doll symbolized Rehnquist's already noticeable trend of writing solitary dissents. So that evening, with his wife humming the "William Tell Overture," the theme song of the long-running 1950s TV show, he and other clerks read from Rehnquist's dissents and presented him with the doll. It remained on the fireplace mantle in Rehnquist's chambers until he died.

DOJ_NMG_0033765

In another article, Noel Augustyn, Rehnquist's administrative assistant from 1987 to 1989, reminisced about his time with the late chief justice, confirming what many have long suspected -- that Rehnquist planned to retire long before he died in office. Augustyn says that Rehnquist told him he planned to retire in 1991, before the re-election campaign began for President George H.W. Bush. Rehnquist had no confidence that Bush could win. He and his wife, Nan, "had long looked forward to retirement," Augustyn wrote.

But Nan died in 1991, prompting Rehnquist to put off retirement because he could no longer share it with her. "For a man who could be simultaneously shy and gregarious, it would not be enjoyable entering retirement alone," Augustyn wrote. "It was Nan Rehnquist's death, then, that in effect changed Supreme Court -- and American -- history."

New GC Appointed To The Department Of Agriculture (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 14, 2006

Washington is a town where who you know often matters more than what you know. That, at least, is what seems to matter in the appointment of Marc Kesselman as general counsel for the Department of Agriculture.

Kesselman, who was sworn in earlier this month, has little background in agriculture, but he comes from the Office of Management and Budget, where as associate general counsel he became intimately familiar with the maneuvering between federal agencies' legal offices.

"I don't pretend to be an expert in veterinary medicine or in farming, but USDA has many experts in those fields," says Kesselman, 34, who on occasion helped USDA lawyers draft regulations in his previous post.

His appointment comes at an important time for the agency, which will be a key player in the upcoming farm bill as well as in coordinating policy for avian flu and mad cow disease.

Before his move to the White House, Kesselman spent three years at the Justice Department, including a stint working under Viet Dinh in the Office of Legal Policy.

Kesselman isn't the only lawyer leaving OMB. General counsel Raul Yanes headed to the West Wing last week as staff secretary and assistant to the president, following his boss, Joshua Bolten, who took over as chief of staff for the president in March. Yanes replaces Brett Kavanaugh, who was sworn in this month to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

Though the position will undoubtedly bring Yanes, 40, closer to the president, he is no stranger to the inner workings of the White House. He served as associate White House counsel from 2003 to 2005, where he was one of the middlemen between the administration and investigators probing the outing of former CIA agent Valerie Plame.

Yanes then headed over to Justice, where he spent seven months as counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Progress Noted In Welfare Reform (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

The landmark 1996 welfare-reform law has done a lot to "break the cycle of dependency" on public assistance, but it has "unfinished business" in moving more people into self-sufficiency and stable, two-parent families, Health and Human Services (HHS) Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday.

More single mothers are working, child-support collections have nearly doubled and more than 1 million fewer children live in poverty, Mr. Leavitt said at the Heritage Foundation.

"Self-sufficiency is a powerful influence in the lives of us all," he said, citing an example of a welfare mother who now has a stable job, bought a car and a home and helped her child succeed in school.

However, welfare reform needed a midcourse correction, which was included in the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005, said Mr. Leavitt.

States now are required to put at least half their welfare recipients into work or other productive activities, as well as renew efforts to discourage unwed childbearing and encourage two-parent families and healthy marriages.

"You might say we've rebooted the system and we're starting welfare reform all over again," said Mr. Leavitt, who as Utah's governor lobbied for and implemented reform in his state.

Welfare reform was written by the Republican majority in Congress, passed with strong bipartisan support and signed into law by President Clinton on Aug. 22, 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0033766

Its unprecedented mandatory work rules for recipients, 60-month time limit on benefits and state flexibility to tailor welfare programs to low-income populations led to a 57 percent reduction in the number of families on welfare. About 1.9 million families were on welfare last June, compared with 4.4 million families in August 1996, HHS data show.

The Republican-led House Ways and Means Committee has been publishing 10-year anniversary reports on the 1996 welfare reform law this year.

One "untold story" about welfare reform is that it saved taxpayers billions of dollars by ending welfare checks to prisoners, fugitives, drug addicts and alcoholics, as well as legal aliens who signed pledges not to collect welfare when they came to this country, said Rep. Wally Herger, California Republican and chairman of the House subcommittee that wrote the welfare law.

But old patterns die hard and the 1996 reforms haven't led to a lot of change in many welfare bureaucracies, Heritage welfare analyst Robert Rector said yesterday.

The new $150-million-a-year allocation for marriage skills and responsible fatherhood programs isn't going directly to states like other welfare funds, but is being made available to applicants, including government agencies, who are clear that they are committed to such programs, Mr. Rector said.

The goal is to avoid having funding recipients "slap" a marriage class "on their job-training program and call it a marriage program," he said.

Meal Plan For Hungry Kids, 'Backpack Clubs' Try To Fill A Gap (WSJ)

By Roger Thurow

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

TYLER, Texas -- Seven-year-old Cody Lozano and his 9-year-old sister Cherokee hurried into their house on a recent Friday afternoon and emptied their school backpacks. On the kitchen table, next to a family Bible and a pile of bills, each child laid out a box of Special K cereal, a carton of milk, a package of peanut-butter crackers, a cup of fruit cocktail, a bag of animal crackers, a carton of apple juice, a pull-top can of beans and franks and one of rice and beans.

It wasn't a weekend homework assignment. It was their weekend breakfast, lunch and dinner. 1

"Without this food, I don't know what we would do," says their mother, Karen Lozano. In a town where the oil boom once created dozens of millionaires and where azaleas and roses now attract tourists, Ms. Lozano, 41, and her two youngest children sit in a living room beneath a bare light bulb dangling from the ceiling. Family health problems and sporadic work for her husband have reduced their income and increased their expenses, she says.

"Last week it was, 'Do we buy groceries or pay the water bill?' This week, it is groceries or the gas bill," she says. "With the backpacks, I know that at least there's something for the kids to eat."

Cody and Cherokee are members of the Backpack Club at Douglas Elementary School. Every Friday during the school year, just before the final bell, they and 70 schoolmates from low-income families rush into the auditorium and wait in line for backpacks filled with food. In the past year, thousands of other children have begun forming similar Friday afternoon lines in schools across 30 states, from big cities like Chicago, to postcard places like Sonoma County, Calif., to rural hamlets surrounded by corn and wheat fields like Hawkeye, Iowa.

On their shoulders, the children carry the backpacks as well as the weight of America's hunger paradox: want amid plenty. The backpacks are an emergency fix to a problem that has defied solution, despite a rising economy and tens of billions of dollars of government spending on nutrition programs, including food stamps, school lunch and aid to mothers and young children.

The war on poverty has ebbed, flowed and changed direction in the four decades since Lyndon Johnson launched it in 1964, and in the decade since Bill Clinton signed a bill that he said would "end welfare as we know it." With little appetite in Washington for costly new government-administered efforts to address poverty, all sorts of small-scale efforts are springing up: some privately funded, entrepreneurial efforts, others government-funded experiments. None are sufficiently large to cure poverty, nor do they pretend to such an ambitious goal. Instead, they are attempts to make life better for those who live in poverty or to test new approaches to a very old problem.

The fraction of Americans living below the official poverty line fell significantly during the booming economy of the 1990s. Then it turned up in the recession of 2001 and an ensuing recovery that lifted the fortunes of the best-off Americans more than it did those at the bottom. Alternatives to the official measure show much the same pattern.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture says government surveys show that 11.9% of U.S. households -- 13.5 million in all -- were uncertain they could afford to feed their families at some point during the year in 2004. About a third of those, or 4.4 million households in all, said that at least one household member went hungry at least some time during the year because the family couldn't afford enough food.

DOJ_NMG_0033767

At the same time, the economy has been growing in many regions around the country. Tyler, Texas, for example, with its oil, retail and medical-services base, has hummed along with the entire state recently. Yet the USDA report also shows Texas has become the hungriest state in the country. In the 2002-2004 period, 16.4% of Texas households were food insecure, up from 13.9% in 1999-2001.

"There is a rising tide, but it's not one that lifts all the boats," says Ray Perryman of the Perryman Group, an economic-analysis firm that tracks the Texas economy. "Some sink along the way."

A recent survey by America's Second Harvest, a network of more than 200 food banks across the nation, indicates that those relying on pantries and emergency kitchens include a large number of working families who aren't making enough to make ends meet, particularly with high heating and gas prices and medical bills. Mr. Perryman says the adults in such families generally don't have the education or skills demanded by high-tech jobs being created.

"Hunger is a hidden issue, particularly in Tyler, where unemployment is low and there's a lot of economic activity," says Robert Bush, executive director of the East Texas Food Bank. "But every day, we touch people who have to make hard choices about food: pay medical bills or buy food, repair car or buy food."

The Second Harvest survey also paints a portrait of the hungry at odds with common stereotypes: Only 12% of those served by the nation's food banks are homeless; 93% are American citizens; 40% are white; nearly half live in rural or suburban areas; and, more than one-third of the hungry households have at least one working adult. In these households, the survey found, parents are often working nights and over the weekends, meaning children sometimes must fend for themselves at mealtimes.

And there are a lot of those children. Second Harvest estimates that of the 25 million people served at its network of food pantries and feeding centers last year, nine million were children.

The federal government appropriates about $12 billion annually for child nutrition programs, meant to provide a safety net, says a spokeswoman for the USDA. But when gaps develop, efforts of community groups and food banks are welcome, she says. "We cannot do it alone."

For decades, Washington has funded free and reduced-price lunches and breakfasts in schools. In the last school year, 17.5 million children received free or reduced-price lunch and 7.7 million participated in the breakfast program.

In more recent years, the government began supporting after-school snack and dinner programs as well as summer feeding centers, which are essentially day camps for hungry children with recreational activities scheduled around lunch.

"As a nation, we figured that should take care of the problem," says Lisa DeYoung, Second Harvest's director of programs. "But it doesn't. There are gaps in the system."

Like the weekends.

"On Friday at lunch, I see a kind of panic in some children that I didn't see before. They eat as much as they can," says Kim Matthews, youth-services coordinator in the Chapel Hill, Texas, school district. "Then on Monday at breakfast, they not only eat the food on their tray, but the food on the trays of the five kids next to them."

While some backpack-carriers say they jealously guard their food -- one boy says he hides it under his bed -- others say they share it with their families. At Annie Sims Elementary School in Mt. Pleasant, Texas, a 10-year-old named Low said he shared his milk with his grandmother, his crackers with an aunt and his Apple Jacks cereal with his older sister. Seven-year-old Leonard asked the school counselor for an extra jar of peanut butter for his mother.

The Arkansas Rice Depot, a food bank, started stuffing backpacks with food in 1995. A school nurse at Martin Luther King Elementary School in Little Rock told the food bank she was seeing a growing number of children with dizziness and stomachaches -- not from illness, but from hunger. The group sent food to the school, which sent it home with some students. When children carrying food reported they were being teased for being poor, the Depot put the food in backpacks that look like the ones most students use to lug books and supplies.

The teasing stopped, and the food bank took the backpack idea to schools around the state. As word spread, food banks and schools in other states began designing take-home meal packs for the neediest students. Kids are chosen for the backpack program by teachers and school counselors, nurses and social workers based on knowledge of the family backgrounds and the behavior of the children in the classroom. This year, Second Harvest says at least 70 food banks are distributing backpacks -- tens of thousands of them in an average week. Those numbers are expected to multiply next school year as Second Harvest rolls out the program across its nationwide network.

The backpacks are for the most part filled with child-friendly food: nutritious, easy to open and nothing requiring stove-top cooking. Empty backpacks are returned by students and refilled for the next week. The food in each backpack costs between $2 and $3, and, once filled, each weighs seven to 10 pounds.

DOJ_NMG_0033768

"It's heavy," said a fifth-grader named Jocelyn as she hoisted her backpack at Jewett Elementary School in the Waterloo, Iowa, school system. "But it's a good heavy."

Funding for backpack programs -- to reimburse food banks that usually have to buy child-specific food -- has mostly come from local businesses, churches and community organizations such as the United Way in Waterloo and the Junior League, a women's group, in Tyler. In 2003, Hasbro Inc., the Pawtucket, R.I.-based toy and game maker, supported pilot programs in eight rural areas. Since then, it has donated more than $700,000 to help 36 programs get started. A few corporations, such as Beam Global Spirits & Wine Inc., based in Deerfield, Ill., are funding programs in counties where they have operations.

The pitch for support often takes donors by surprise. By the time Peggy Berry of the East Texas Food Bank finished her appeal to the Junior League in Tyler last year, many in the audience were in tears, according to several people who were there. "I had no idea that the city I lived in had such needs," says Stacy Panfil-Parsley, a Junior League member and a gymnastics coach. Now she volunteers to deliver backpack food to the schools. * * *

On a spring day, the farmers of Iowa were preparing their fields for planting. At the food pantry in Waterloo, here in the nation's breadbasket, a line formed for food assistance. Families stream in for help at the rate of 1,100 a month. Five years ago, it was 500 a month. Throughout the 16-county area of northeast Iowa, 35,700 people a year are served by the food bank. Forty percent are children.

At Lowell Elementary School in Waterloo, three children explain why they are waiting for their backpacks. Third-grader Shaquia says her mother cleans buildings and "doesn't have enough money at home for food." Fifth-grader Ashley says her parents both work at a bakery and are now facing added expenses after a house fire. Jonathan, another fifth-grader, says his mother works the overnight shift at a hotel and often isn't home in time for breakfast.

LaTina Roby, the single mother of another backpack child, says she lost her job at a fast-food restaurant after she got sick. "A lot of times, the backpack gets us through the weekend," she says. "The milk is the best. Milk is expensive." Children are given milk in cartons that don't need refrigeration.

Across town, at Jewett Elementary, another mom, Michelle Morehouse, prepares 25 backpacks. The blue sacks are stuffed with four cups of applesauce, a can of spaghetti and meatballs, a can of beef stew, a jar of creamy peanut butter, two vanilla puddings, three cartons of strawberry milk, a box of reduced-sugar Cocoa Puffs and a pack of Scooby Doo baked graham-cracker sticks.

"I don't normally buy these kinds of things," says Ms. Morehouse, whose fifth-grade son Jacob brings a backpack home. Her husband is an hourly worker at a metal-fabrication plant. After paying the bills, she says she has about $75 a week left to buy groceries for her family of four at a discount supermarket and, once a month, at a meat locker.

In its report issued last year, the USDA said the typical U.S. household spends $40 per person each week for food.

Ms. Morehouse says she lost her job as an assistant manager at a gas-station convenience store in March. "Before then, I said, 'We don't need a backpack, give it to someone else'," she says. "Now it's a big help." * * *

In east Texas, where the high price of oil is reinvigorating old fields, Steven Young, a music teacher at Douglas Elementary, played a classical-music CD as the Backpack Club kids jostled in line. "It calms them down," he says.

Cody and Cherokee Lozano patiently waited their turn. "I used to run into school on Mondays, I was so hungry," Cody said. Now he runs home on Fridays with his backpack.

At home, their mother ticked off the bills: Gas, $117. Water, $110 every two months. Rent, $300 a month. "How do they expect the average Joe to pay the bills and still eat?" she says.

Ms. Lozano once worked as a nurse but stopped to care for her children. Her seventh-grader suffers from a joint and bone ailment, she says, and Cody has epilepsy. She hopes to start classes at the local junior college to gain work as a specialized nurse.

Her husband and older son are construction workers, making as much as $13 an hour. But work can be sporadic and health problems also limit their earnings, she says. The family tries to set aside at least $50 a week for groceries, she says.

"We may be eating stuff you don't really want to eat all the time," she says. "The kids eat a lot of fried egg sandwiches. They hate beans. They're good, but not if you eat them every day."

The family cat saunters through the living room. Cody looks at his mom and asks, "Do we have tuna for him?"

She laughs. "He doesn't get tuna. We don't get tuna. If he wants to eat, he's got to catch a rat."

Lawmakers Send Mixed Signals On Timing Of Medicare Bill (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033769

The heavy lifting is still months away, but a package of Medicare bills that Congress may take on late this year is beginning to take shape.

Lawmakers were consumed for the first half of this year with politicking over the controversial new Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit, which made the congressional leadership and the White House strongly averse to tackling any legislation related to the healthcare program for the elderly and disabled. But with several of the program's perennial problems due to resurface in 2007, many healthcare lobbyists say a drive in Congress for Medicare legislation is inevitable.

The GOP leadership in both chambers, not to mention the Bush administration, is said to be wary of opening the door to a wider debate on Medicare this year. A Medicare vehicle also would not enjoy the procedural protections against amendment that helped the leadership avoid such a debate during budget reconciliation last year.

Just as lobbyists are worried and unsure about what items might be addressed and what might be left out, the Hill is sending mixed signals about the timing of any move to work through a Medicare bill in 2006.

Although there is widespread agreement that no measure will move until after the August congressional recess, speculation is rampant that the leadership may opt to take final action on a bill during a lame-duck session after the elections.

Any Medicare legislation would create winners and losers, as lawmakers likely will look to offset billions of dollars of new spending with reductions in other areas of Medicare.

This prospect makes healthcare providers of all stripes nervous as their lobbyists are watching closely for developments on Capitol Hill. So far a smattering of bills have been introduced by rank-and-file members of the House and Senate and by key committee leaders, but a clear strategy has yet to emerge.

The biggest driver behind Congress's tackling Medicare this year, yet again, is a strong desire by many lawmakers to prevent a cut in Medicare's payments to physicians. On the other hand, the physician-payments provisions would be the most expensive to enact. The Congressional Budget Office has projected that even maintaining the current payment level for one year would cost about $10 billion.

With the failure of medical-malpractice tort reform in the Senate last month, blocking these cuts has become the physician lobby's top priority.

Under a complex mathematical formula almost universally regarded as flawed, doctors are staring at an estimated 5 percent pay cut next year. Year after year, Congress has moved to prevent the cuts from taking effect, most recently by enacting a one-year fix as part of the Deficit Reduction Act that President Bush signed in February.

The nursing-home and physical-therapy sectors are pushing Congress at least to postpone strict limits on how much physical, speech and occupational therapy beneficiaries can receive in one year. Caps on the services are due to take effect Jan. 1.

Few lawmakers believe the caps are the appropriate policy, but eliminating them would cost more than $500 million. Rep. Phil English (R-Pa.) and Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) have sponsored bills to deal with the issue and, together, have attracted more than 300 co-sponsors, including House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.). Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has tried for several years to get rid of the caps.

Pharmacies also have gained the support of a growing contingent of lawmakers for legislation to require Medicare Part D plans to pay drug claims within two weeks.

On a more politically sensitive issue, Grassley and Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) are waging a campaign to enact legislation that would prevent beneficiaries who missed the May 15 deadline to sign up for Part D from being assessed a financial penalty if they enroll later.

The administration and the congressional leadership have been cool to the idea, despite enthusiasm among many rank-and-file Republicans, especially those vulnerable in the midterm elections, such as Johnson.

The question of the penalty is expected to be raised today during a House Ways and Means Committee hearing on the implementation of Part D. Johnson chairs the panel's Health Subcommittee and held a hearing of her own in April, but Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) has not publicly backed her effort.

Lawmakers have few realistic options available to pay for a package containing these or other costly provisions.

The most commonly cited source of savings is the so-called $10 billion "stabilization fund" that was created in 2003 as an inducement for health-insurance plans called preferred-provider organizations (PPOs) to do business with Medicare.

The health-insurance lobby has kept a watchful eye over some lawmakers' interest in taking away this pool of money and has enjoyed the steady support of the administration. Grassley's attempt to strip the fund during budget reconciliation was stymied in large measure by White House resistance.

DOJ_NMG_0033770

The home-healthcare providers also have reason to worry, as Congress has frozen their payment rate for several consecutive years, behind the political cover of reports by the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, which makes annual recommendations to Congress.

Hospitals are at relatively lower risk, but lobbyists continue to keep close tabs on the discussions about how to pay for the doctor payments and other provisions. This sector is particularly mindful of its vulnerability because the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services is in the process of undertaking a massive overhaul of the formula used to calculate payments for medical procedures performed in hospitals.

Minimum-Wage Boost Wins Support (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Breaking with its Republican leadership, the House Appropriations Committee approved a $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage as part of a budget bill that adds $4 billion to President Bush's requests for domestic programs.

The 32-27 vote is certain to be challenged when the $596.5 billion measure comes to the House floor. But the seven Republican defections underscored the growing prominence of the wage issue going into the November elections.

The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, hasn't been increased since 1997. The $2.10 increase would be phased in over three years in 70-cent increments, beginning in January. "Every day the minimum wage is not raised, it loses to inflation," said Rep. Steny Hoyer (D., Md.), the minority whip.

While admitting that the wage provision didn't belong on the spending bill, Wisconsin Rep. David Obey, the committee's ranking Democrat, said his party would raise the issue in whatever forum is available. "We all know that the fix is in, and there will be no minimum wage coming out of any committee unless it's forced out," Mr. Obey said.

The wage fight capped a day in which Republicans completed an election-year shift of billions of dollars within the president's budget, first cutting from defense spending and then reinvesting the money in education and health programs that the administration targeted for cuts.

The Appropriations Committee approved a $427.4 billion Pentagon budget bill that took $4 billion from the president's request for core military accounts. Hours later, it approved a budget for the departments of Labor, Education and Health and Human Services that added $4.04 billion in discretionary spending beyond what Mr. Bush proposed.

The additional funds will finance increased spending for community-health centers and Pell Grants to help low-income college students. But lawmakers also set aside close to $1 billion for local projects to help win votes at home.

Despite grumbling from conservatives, the practice of earmarking remains common. While less than in previous years, the House committee estimates that among all the annual spending bills, about $9.6 billion, or a little more than 1%, has been set aside for items favored by individual lawmakers.

The defense bill alone accounts for about half of the $9.6 billion. One reason Republicans enjoy some flexibility is that so much of the military's total operations are treated as emergencies -- outside the budget caps -- because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The $427.4 billion measure approved by the panel yesterday, for example, includes $50 billion in such emergency funding. And even as the committee was meeting, a $92.2 billion emergency spending bill, much of it for operations overseas, passed the House 351-67 and is slated to clear the Senate tomorrow morning.

With the election weighing heavily on both parties, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) was skeptical whether immigration legislation can pass if an agreement isn't reached before August. And he told a business audience that he expected a long postelection session running into December.

Tomorrow, the House will put aside its appropriations bills for debate on the Iraq war. "I think we can lay out where we're going and why we're going there," said Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), who will deliver the opening remarks.

Mr. Boehner has long promised an opportunity for members to speak on the war, but Republicans face criticism for being restrictive -- and some say too partisan -- in limiting what alternative resolutions may be presented.

"Republicans want to portray the greatest foreign-policy challenge of a generation as simply a choice between staying the course and cutting and running," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D., Ill.). "Everyone has equal time," Mr. Hastert said, but even rank-and-file Republicans worry the exercise could hurt their party if it is seen as too political.

"We are not running the war out of the House," Mr. Boehner told reporters. "I think winning is the issue. We spent over $300 billion in waging this war and nearly 2,500 lives. It would be a disgrace to those who gave their life in defense of their country to walk away from this."

DOJ_NMG_0033771

House Lawmakers Accept $3,300 Pay Hike (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

The Associated Press, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Despite record low approval ratings, House lawmakers Tuesday embraced a $3,300 pay raise that will increase their salaries to $168,500.

The 2 percent cost-of-living raise would be the seventh straight for members of the House and Senate.

Lawmakers easily squelched a bid by Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, to get a direct vote to block the COLA, which is automatically awarded unless lawmakers vote to block it.

In the early days of GOP control of Congress, lawmakers routinely denied themselves the annual COLA. Last year, the Senate voted 92-6 to deny the raise but quietly surrendered the position in House-Senate talks.

As part of an ethics reform bill in 1989, Congress gave up their ability to accept pay for speeches and made annual cost-of-living pay increases automatic unless the lawmakers voted otherwise.

The pay issue has been linked to the annual Transportation and Treasury Department spending bill because that measure stipulates that civil servants get raises of 2.7 percent, the same as military personnel will receive. Under a complicated formula, the increase translates to 2 percent for members of Congress.

Like last year, Matheson led a quixotic drive to block the raise. He was the only member to speak on the topic.

"I do not think that it is appropriate to let this bill go through without an up or down vote on whether or not Congress should have an increase in its own pay," Matheson said.

But by a 249-167 vote, the House rejected Matheson's procedural attempt to get a direct vote on the pay raise.

The pay raise would also apply to the vice president -- who is president of the Senate -- congressional leaders and Supreme Court justices.

This year, Vice President Dick Cheney, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Chief Justice John Roberts receive $212,100. Associate justices receive $203,000. House and Senate party leaders get $183,500.

President Bush's salary of $400,000 is unaffected by the legislation.

House Accepts $3,300 Raise (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

House lawmakers accepted a $3,300 raise that will increase their salaries to $168,500. Lawmakers easily squelched a bid by Representative Jim Matheson, Democrat of Utah, to vote on the cost-of-living raise, which is automatically awarded unless lawmakers vote to block it. Last year, the Senate voted 92 to 6 to deny the raise but quietly surrendered the position in negotiations with the House. As part of an ethics bill in 1989, Congress gave up its ability to accept pay for speeches and made annual cost-of-living pay increases automatic unless blocked.

COLA Survives Matheson's Challenge (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, June 14, 2006

House lawmakers defeated an attempt to curb their annual cost-of-living pay increase Tuesday, all but guaranteeing Members will receive a sixth salary hike in as many years.

Both House and Senate lawmakers are slated to receive an increase of 2 percent, about $3,330, in their paychecks beginning in 2007, bringing rank-and-file Members' annual salary to $168,500. Elected members of the leadership are paid slightly more.

Under a federal law enacted in 1989, Members automatically receive an annual cost-of-living adjustment unless legislation is passed to block the COLA from being implemented.

Utah Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson, a fiscal conservative and persistent opponent of the automatic pay raise, sought to block the annual increase on the House floor Tuesday, arguing that Members should be required to vote on growing their own paychecks.

"Here we are in a circumstance where we continue to swim in a lake of red ink," Matheson said, citing the $8 trillion federal deficit. "I don't think it's appropriate to have this cost increase, this increase in Member salary, go through without an up-or-down vote."

Matheson raised his objections as the House prepared to debate the fiscal 2007 Transportation, Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, the judiciary, the District of Columbia and independent agencies appropriations bill.

DOJ_NMG_0033772

The Utah lawmaker had hoped to introduce an amendment to that spending bill requiring an up-or-down vote on the pay increase, but he was defeated on a procedural measure, 250-166. The House continued to debate other amendments to the legislation Tuesday night and is expected to vote on the measure as early as today.

In the event the House does receive its pay raise, Matheson has vowed to donate the additional pay to Utah charities.

Although Matheson, along with Rep. Todd Platts (R-Pa.), introduced legislation in December seeking to kill the automatic salary increases, that bill has stagnated in the House Administration and Government Reform committees.

Across the Capitol, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) is the sponsor of companion legislation, which has likewise been dormant in the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee since its introduction in March 2005.

While Senate lawmakers did vote in 2005 to forgo their annual raise — a largely symbolic gesture used at the time to highlight the need for emergency spending on hurricane cleanup efforts as well as the conflict in Iraq — that amendment to the Transportation, Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, the judiciary and the District of Columbia spending bill did not survive a House-Senate conference.

It remains unclear whether Members could attempt a similar maneuver during the fiscal 2007 cycle.

In the meantime, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) touted legislation Tuesday that would tie Congressional pay raises to increases in the federal minimum wage.

Clinton raised the proposal, introduced in early May, during an appearance at the progressive Campaign for America's Future's "Take Back America 2006" conference.

The measure would require increases in the minimum wage each time the Congressional pay rate went up.

"If Members of Congress need an annual cost-of-living adjustment, then certainly the lowest-paid members of our society do too," Clinton said on the Senate floor in May. The federal minimum wage was last increased in 1997.

Opponents last opportunity to derail the COLA will come when the Senate takes up the spending bill.

Murtha Halts Bid For Leader (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 14, 2006

A campaign for Majority Leader that began with plotting by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and a small clutch of Democrats more than two weeks ago suddenly moved to the back burner Tuesday when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) convinced the Pennsylvanian to set aside his effort until after the November elections.

Four days into a brash effort that threatened to pit factions of the Democratic coalition against one another at the height of midterm election season, Pelosi abandoned the neutral stance she had taken on the potential battle between Murtha and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and asked Murtha to put his bid on hold until November. He agreed.

"I appreciate Mr. Murtha's continuing cooperation and leadership in our effort to win a Democratic House to take America in a new direction for everyone," Pelosi said in a statement.

The statement came shortly after Pelosi sat down with Murtha and two other Democrats, one of whom was Rep. Robert Brady, also a Pennsylvanian.

Hours later, Murtha himself issued a one-sentence statement: "For the unity of the party and to focus on Democratic victory in November, I have suspended my campaign for majority leader until after the election."

To some, Tuesday's turn of events simply underscored the sway Pelosi holds over her Caucus and the influence she figures to exert should Democrats win the House and the Hoyer-Murtha fight comes to pass.

When Murtha, a 73-year-old defense hawk who has emerged as a leading symbol of opposition to the Iraq war, plunged into the race last Friday, suspicions immediately sprouted that the hand of Pelosi was at work. She and Hoyer have a history of antagonism, dating back to their almost nonstop two-year battle for a leadership post in 2000 and 2001, and Murtha has emerged as one of her most trusted allies. Even Hoyer partisans admitted that the only Democrat in position to rein in Murtha was Pelosi.

But others took Murtha's suspension as a sign that he had over-reached, mistakenly calculating that Murtha's entry into the race would create such a splash that Hoyer would fold within days. Instead, Hoyer stood his ground and many Members — even some who sided with Pelosi over Hoyer in the past — expressed concern that the campaign was needlessly dividing the Caucus at a time when unity is a precious commodity.

"I think it's clear that the reaction from Members was so negative that Mr. Murtha had no choice but to suspend his campaign," a Democratic aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0033773

Pelosi's initial public silence and refusal to stop Murtha led Hoyer, who spoke with her over the weekend, to conclude that the race was on and to ramp up his operation, securing commitments and leaning on some of his fellow Democrats to give him cover publicly.

"I am talking to Members," Hoyer acknowledged at a session with reporters early Tuesday afternoon, just hours before Murtha suspended his effort.

Murtha began laying the groundwork for his campaign two weeks before announcing his plans, quietly seeking out 10 or so of his friends and allies in the Caucus and asking for their help. Those core supporters, sources said, then branched out to take the temperature of their fellow Members, assembling a road map for Murtha outlining which Members were most ripe for a personal sales pitch. Before he suspended his bid today, Murtha's informal Whip team — which sources indicated included Reps. Mike Capuano (Mass.), Mike Doyle (Pa.), Anna Eshoo (Calif.), John Larson (Conn.), Bill Pascrell (N.J.) and Linda Sanchez (Calif.) — had communicated with about 120 of the 205 House Democrats.

While Eshoo is one of Pelosi's closest friends, sources insisted Pelosi was not involved in Murtha's effort except to the extent that she refused to talk him out of it last week.

At a late afternoon press conference on minimum wage legislation with Rep. George Miller (Calif.), another top Pelosi lieutenant, Hoyer sidestepped a question about whether the Minority Leader might have been sending a message by sitting idly by during the first four days of Murtha's campaign.

"I think this was Mr. Murtha's decision and I'm pleased that he suspended his efforts," Hoyer said.

If Pelosi was trying to make a point by keeping Hoyer squirming for a few days, she also made a point by bringing the intraparty fight to a temporary halt: that the election-year message and fundraising efforts of Democrats could be undermined by a full-throttle leadership fight.

Pelosi and Hoyer are two of the party's fundraising stars, each the overseer of a unique and personally loyal network of donors — in Hoyer's case, donors who might feel apprehension in investing in a man whose own future in leadership seems tenuous.

With Murtha poised to re-enter the fray as soon as the final Congressional ballot is counted in November, some wonder if the truce is little more than a facade, forcing what was already an underground campaign to further subterranean depths. Even if they don't formally ask colleagues for support, every interaction between Murtha and Hoyer and their fellow Democrats through the election will in some way constitute a form of campaigning.

"Knowing human nature, I don't know if this will actually change anything," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (Calif.), the chairman of the Blue Dog Coalition and a Hoyer backer who called Murtha's campaign divisive last week.

Cardoza called Murtha's decision "an acknowledgement" that sentiment within the Caucus was decidedly against a fight right now.

The suspension of Murtha's campaign probably ensures that next few months will be devoid of dueling supporter lists, solicitation letters from the candidates to their colleagues, efforts to cultivate free media by the Murtha and Hoyer camps, and even appeals for support by the contenders in private conversations. Beyond that, what constitutes campaigning will be a subjective matter, but one aide likened the situation to a "Cold War" with the potential for one false move by either side provoking an all-out war.

Murtha's move, the second surprise he sprung on his colleagues in four days, could benefit him in the long run, since some would-be supporters seemed dismayed by the timing of his entry, believing it would make Democrats appear presumptuous about winning back the House.

"It is [a distraction] for me," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, a group Murtha hopes to make inroads with through his Iraq war outspokenness. "I'm not going to pay attention to it until we get the House under control."

But most likely the only constant between now and November will be the guessing games, with insiders trading theories about which candidate has put together the winning coalition.

Hoyer backers play up their man's core bloc of conservative and moderate supporters, to which they say he's poised to add progressives disgruntled by Murtha's staunch social conservatism and California pragmatists, who previously backed Pelosi over Hoyer out of home state loyalty. Hoyer, a more active fundraiser and campaigner than Murtha, may also do well with the incoming freshmen whose campaigns he's boosted.

Murtha will depend on his strong personal ties with Members, forged in his first 31 years in the House, when he quietly accrued power on the Appropriations Committee and won immense respect from both sides of the aisle while operating mostly in the shadows. That reputation, coupled with what is a sometimes conservative voting record, could help Murtha appeal to the centrists who make up Hoyer's base, while his forceful opposition to the Iraq war could conceivably convince progressives to look the other way when it comes to social issues.

DOJ_NMG_0033774

Rep. Murtha Abandons Leadership Bid — For Now (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 14, 2006

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) temporarily abandoned his bid for majority leader yesterday afternoon after it became clear that an open battle with House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) could reignite long-smoldering feuds and complicate Democrats' efforts to win back the House.

Word of Murtha's retreat came shortly after he met with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), a close ally, who had cultivated a studied silence on the issue during the Pennsylvanian's four-day campaign.

Pelosi issued a brief statement after the midday meeting with Murtha and Rep. Robert Brady (D-Pa.) signaling the race's postponement until after the election.

"In the spirit of unity to achieve our goal of winning a Democratic majority in November, Congressman John Murtha has informed me that he will suspend his campaign for majority leader until after we win a Democratic majority of the House," Pelosi said.

Murtha echoed her sentiments.

"For the unity of the party and to focus on Democratic victory in November, I have suspended my campaign for majority leader until after the election," he said in a statement.

Hoyer learned of the decision during a series of afternoon roll-call votes when Brady, a low-key former carpenter, found him on the House floor and invited him out to a sun-drenched, second-floor balcony.

The two spoke for five minutes, with Hoyer listening intently, before they returned to the floor and Brady ventured back to his usual perch in the Pennsylvania corner with Murtha.

Hoyer would not discuss the encounter later. "It was a private conversation," he said.

Why Murtha called off the campaign as abruptly as he started it is an open question. Many Democrats, including Hoyer, had been caught by surprise when Murtha announced his candidacy Friday with five months and many obstacles to overcome before the November elections.

Some members, such as Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), had shared with Pelosi their concerns that a raucous contest could divide the caucus at a time when they had boasted of the greatest unity in 50 years.

Waxman made public his support of Hoyer early this week to protest the race for a hypothetical opening, he said.

"He's been a good whip. I know he's worked actively to recruit candidates around the country," Waxman said. "I don't think this is the right time to be having this fight."

Waxman has typically supported Pelosi or her allies in leadership races. "I don't think there are many people here who are closer to Nancy Pelosi than he is," said Rep. Mike Capuano (D-Mass.).

Yet Waxman said he rejects the idea that the caucus coalesced into two opposing camps around Pelosi and Hoyer. He said he hoped other members would join him in protesting a leadership race now.

"Others ought to be supporting Hoyer as well [for the same reasons]," Waxman said.

Still, others said they welcomed Murtha's entrance in the race.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) called it "democracy at its best."

"[Murtha] has been in this institution for a long time. I wouldn't question his timing. I haven't run up on anybody being negative about having a choice."

A Democratic aide said postponement was the best possible outcome for Democrats.

"Now you have two high-profile members who will be working their hearts out like never before," the aide said, indicating that Hoyer and Murtha would be auditioning for a role as majority leader, should the Democrats take the majority, in the months leading up to the election.

Others speculated that Murtha, a renowned backroom dealmaker, may have had other motives for launching the short-lived campaign than simply seeking higher office and may have been trying to intimidate Hoyer to some unknown end.

Hoyer was unusually subdued earlier in the day before Murtha backed off, perhaps owing to the daunting political calculus he faced in pulling off a win against the formidable Pennsylvanian.

Murtha-backed candidates have twice defeated Hoyer or his chosen candidate in recent leadership elections. Murtha helped orchestrate Pelosi's victory over Hoyer for whip in 2001. Earlier this year, he masterminded the win of Rep. John Larson (D-Conn.) over Rep. Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.) for vice chairman of the caucus.

DOJ_NMG_0033775

Hoyer's weekly press briefing was rescheduled twice and then shortened by a third yesterday before he said he would not entertain questions on the race, which he called a distraction.

Hoyer wrote colleagues Friday to solicit support after it became clear Murtha was running.

"For the last three and one-half years as your Whip, I have been focused on one overriding, principal goal: working with every Member of our Caucus to do everything within our power to regain the Majority," Hoyer wrote. "However, that objective is not a foregone conclusion, and I will continue to focus my energies on helping our Party achieve success in November. ... If we do regain the Majority, and I would like to ask for your support for [majority leader].

Murtha and Hoyer have reversed the roles they played in 1999 when Hoyer launched a bid for majority whip on the expectation that Democrats would take control of the House in the 2000 elections. At the time, Murtha criticized Hoyer's presumptive action.

"I can't believe we're getting into this now," Murtha told a Capitol Hill publication. "We don't have a goddamned vacancy for a whip. We don't even have the majority yet."

McConnell Prepares For Top Job (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 14, 2006

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell's new hire of Don Stewart, one of the most admired communications strategists in the Senate, is one of several indications that the lawmaker is readying his expected takeover as majority leader next year.

McConnell (R-Ky.) is also closing the Senate at the end of legislative day and negotiating the unanimous-consent agreements needed to move business forward on the floor, aides say. He is working closely with colleagues facing reelection races to make sure amendments important to them politically are considered on the floor in the run-up to the November election.

McConnell has been trying to raise his visibility in the press, addressing what has been the chief criticism of his performance in the leadership: that he has not played a big enough role in communicating the Republican message and countering Democratic attacks.

McConnell's whip office does not have its own press secretary. Rob Steurer, who works in McConnell's personal office, handles press matters. And McConnell often gives terse replies, when he replies at all, to reporters' questions in the Senate halls.

In contrast, Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, has two senior aides handling national press and a television and radio booker in his whip office and interacts aggressively with the press.

McConnell's hire of Stewart is seen by colleagues as an effort to narrow that disparity. Republicans say the ability to communicate effectively will be important for the successor to outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Some GOP senators say that Frist has been a weak messenger.

Stewart, who has made a name for himself raising the national profile of freshman Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), is considered by several Republican senators one of the best communications aides on the Hill.

He developed a rapid-response operation in Cornyn's office during the controversy over judicial nominations to respond to Democratic attacks. His aggressive style was on display this week when U.S. forces killed al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Cornyn's office was the first in the Senate to send out a press release, at 6:20 a.m. By 9 a.m. Cornyn was on Fox News talking about the big event.

McConnell is taking other steps to raise his visibility. He spoke at the microphones set up outside the Senate chamber after a GOP conference luncheon two weeks ago, and during last Tuesday's luncheon McConnell fielded questions from a gaggle of reporters, said a GOP press secretary who was there.

McConnell has also courted more press coverage recently both in print and broadcast. He is scheduled to sit down for an interview with CNN today.

Frist's aides acknowledge that the transition to a new majority leader is under way.

"There is no doubt that McConnell has always been an active participant in the leadership process," said Alex Vogel, an adviser to Frist who is a partner in the firm Mehlman Vogel Castagnetti. "There's a natural and organic evolution where McConnell is taking over and that's under way."

Amy Call, Frist's spokeswoman, agreed, saying, "Frist and McConnell have worked together very closely. McConnell has done an excellent job as assistant leader, and I'm sure he will transition well into the leader's slot."

Several Republican senators said that they can see McConnell preparing for the top leadership slot and that having a strong communications shop will be important. They say Democrats have gained political traction from the war room that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) set up, staffed by about eight Democratic aides.

DOJ_NMG_0033776

"I think he's preparing himself for that transition," Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said of McConnell. "He knows that's not far away, and one of the things he knows is necessary is a very robust communications operation."

Thune also said McConnell is very involved in defending the Republican majority.

"McConnell has a very good political antenna. He's becoming more sensitized to what issues we're putting on the floor," Thune said.

Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), one of the most endangered Senate Republicans, said McConnell helped with legislation important to him, citing the highway bill, which "was very good to Rhode Island."

McConnell, who chaired the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 1998 and 2000, has also been active raising money and campaigning for Senate candidates.

"The senator has participated in over 40 events in the 2006 cycle on behalf of candidates," said Steurer, McConnell's spokesman. "He's traveled to Washington, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Missouri and New Jersey, and he's expected to do more for the candidates."

A GOP strategist said McConnell has traveled more than Frist to campaign for candidates recently — for example flying to campaign with Mike McGavick in Washington State last week.

This past weekend, McConnell but not Frist attended the Warner golf tournament in Williamsburg, Va., a participant said. About 20-30 GOP senators attended the fundraising event, which is named after Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) and is held to raise money for Senate GOP candidates, the source said. Several senators there expressed enthusiasm for McConnell's future as leader.

Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho) said McConnell has begun to assert himself more in the leadership in subtle ways.

"In the last few months he's been more involved than before," Craig said. "In the past six months compared to the previous year."

McConnell led last week's effort to defeat the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act sponsored by Sen. Daniel Akaka (D-Hawaii). Conservatives loathed the bill, saying it was unconstitutional, and they feared it might have had the votes to pass because of behind-the-scenes dealmaking by Sen. Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii), a powerful member of the Appropriations Committee.

McConnell played a lead role in pushing the nomination of Richard Stickler, a mining-safety official, this week. Despite his efforts, the nomination was put on hold because of unexpectedly stout Democratic opposition.

But while McConnell has played a bigger role in negotiating agreements on the Senate floor and closing the chamber at the end of the legislative day, Frist still controls the Senate Republicans' big-picture strategy.

"I got a feeling that Reid is still negotiating the bigger unanimous-consent agreements with Frist," a GOP aide said.

The aide said that while McConnell may be more active in handling the logistics of the Senate floor, "the strategy is from Eric," referring to Frist's chief of staff, Eric Ueland.

"The real vision and strategy is emanating from Frist's office," the aide said.

McConnell Bides His Time (RC)

By John Stanton And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 14, 2006

While Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) may be the presumptive favorite to lead the Senate GOP next January, don't expect to see crews of Louisville-based interior decorators scurrying about Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) office measuring drapes just yet.

While political observers predict that short of catastrophic GOP losses on Election Day, McConnell's ascension to the Majority Leader's chair this fall is a sure thing, he has consistently rebuffed questions from reporters about the future and has issued strict instructions to his staff to maintain their focus on the day-to-day operations of the Senate, lawmakers and Senate aides say.

McConnell's allies say the No. 2 Senate Republican refuses to get too far ahead of himself on his next position, believing he still cannot take his support for granted and that it would be inappropriate to speed up any transition.

Those allies also insist that McConnell doesn't need to assume any of Frist's duties in the interim, simply because he, more than most, understands his fellow Senators and how the chamber operates.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said McConnell "has been preparing for a couple of decades for this job" and doesn't need or want to assume any extra responsibilities prematurely.

DOJ_NMG_0033777

McConnell, who was first elected to the Senate in 1984, also served as chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 1998 and 2000. Prior to his time in the Senate, McConnell served as the county judge-executive of Jefferson County and was a deputy attorney general under President Gerald Ford.

"There's a united front of leadership," added Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), McConnell's close friend and Chief Deputy Majority Whip. "Mitch is a team player. You won't see any special new delegation [of duties] or handoffs. There's no need to bring him behind the curtain. He already is behind the curtain."

An aide to Frist said neither the Majority Leader nor McConnell is inclined to begin a transfer of power before the end of the session, noting that since Frist came to power in 2003 the two have worked closely on major policy and political initiatives. "They are locked at the hip on every strategic decision that gets made around here," the aide said.

A GOP leadership aide agreed, noting that, "Coordination between the two offices runs from the top down — the two talk almost non-stop, they are clear about their roles and responsibilities, and the smoothness and integration is so high that it's clear Sen. McConnell will be ready from day 1 when he moves down the hall and around the corner."

A former aide to ex-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) also said that in many ways McConnell has a leg-up over some of his predecessors in both parties. Unlike many recent Senate leaders who have been thrust into leadership without warning, McConnell will have about three months from November to January to officially formulate a transition plan and craft a leadership operation.

"McConnell has it all set up," said this former Daschle staffer. "All he has to do is bide his time and not screw anything up, keep his mouth shut and his head down and become Leader."

A key aspect in the likely ease in transition to a McConnell-led GOP is longtime aide Kyle Simmons. McConnell's chief of staff and someone who, like his boss, generally demurs when it comes to the press, Simmons is widely considered one of the Senate Republicans' sharpest minds and someone with a strong understanding of the institution.

Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff, said Simmons is "a great asset" to McConnell and the Conference overall, saying that without him "the Republican team would be much weaker."

"He brings a keen strategic insight, a powerful tactical sense, and excellent political instincts to work every day, and Sen. McConnell and our leadership are much the better for that," Ueland said.

Republicans also point to McConnell's notoriously reserved nature, arguing that while he is extremely calculating, he is patient enough to allow events to fully unfold this fall before beginning his transition.

"Mitch is one of the least presumptuous people I know," Cornyn said. "I don't think he'd see it as appropriate. He is loyal to the leader, just as he was to Sen. [Trent] Lott (R-Miss.)."

Arguably, Frist and McConnell have worked well as a pair, in part, many say, because both Senators are extremely respectful and supportive of each another. The two have starkly different personalities, however, with Frist seemingly more comfortable in the spotlight and McConnell content to work the GOP's agenda behind the scenes.

"Mitch is very methodological," Bennett said. "He's very long-headed. He doesn't react just to today's crisis, but to what it will mean next week, next year, next election."

Lott, a former Senate GOP Whip, Majority Leader and longtime McConnell ally, said that for his Kentucky colleague, "the learning curve is not that steep" to becoming Leader. "He has a pretty good feel for it," Lott said.

Privately, Republicans also noted that while McConnell's prominence in the Conference and reserved personality make an expectation of a shift in duties unlikely, McConnell is also showing deference to Frist's future political ambitions. Frist is considered a likely contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, the chances for which may depend on his stewardship of the Senate.

While the Whip is responsible for marshalling votes, the history books generally place the credit — or blame — on the Majority Leader, and fairly or not, the reviews have not been good for Frist.

Despite racking up a string of victories on legal reform issues, Supreme Court nominees and energy and transportation legislation, Frist's leadership has been criticized in many corners. Although sources close to Frist downplay the impact his future ambitions may have on his decision to actively lead his party until the end of the session, they have in the past acknowledged that he is aware of his legacy and is looking to end his tenure on an upbeat note.

Even so, Lott and other Republicans say they already sense that McConnell is beginning to quietly spread his wings in anticipation of becoming the top Republican next year. GOP sources and Senators say that in recent weeks McConnell has taken steps to increase his visibility both in and outside of the Conference to begin preparing for the new post.

"He's showing a bit of an imprimatur of himself," Lott said. "He's spending more time on the floor, making a point on different issues. He's good when he does that."

DOJ_NMG_0033778

Added a senior GOP Senate aide: "He's got his training wheels on and he's testing them out now so that he can hit the ground running come January."

Perhaps the most outward signal of that came in recent days when McConnell tapped one of the most aggressive GOP press aides in the Senate, Donald Stewart, to become his communications director. Stewart has worked for Cornyn since 2002 following a stint in former Sen. Phil Gramm's (R-Texas) office, and in the past four years he has helped make Cornyn one of the leading spokesmen in the Conference.

Although well known in Texas political circles, Cornyn was a virtual unknown outside of his home state. But particularly since last year's judicial confirmation fights, Stewart has helped vault his boss to national prominence and played a key roll in Frist's efforts to more effectively combat Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) communications "war room."

Although Stewart has not yet officially moved over to McConnell's shop, his influence already can be seen. For instance, following the GOP weekly luncheon on May 30, McConnell — who is so notoriously hands-off with the press that he typically can move freely through the throng of reporters that stake out the meeting — held court for more than 10 minutes in an impromptu press gaggle before answering even more questions in front of television cameras. While McConnell quickly reverted to his traditionally reserved approach to the press following the session, his sudden openness took many veteran reporters by surprise.

McConnell's office, which rarely sends out e-mails and press releases to national reporters, also marked the death of the Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and Republican aides predict a significantly more aggressive communications and message operation under Stewart.

Sources say Stewart's hiring shows that McConnell understands he will have to embrace the press more openly in his next position. And they say Republicans know the job of advancing their message will be even more important in the 110th Congress if the GOP sees its margin of control shrink after the midterm elections.

Still, McConnell's office refuses to even engage in talk about his near certain climb to power, what he's doing to prepare or how he plans to handle the Majority Leader post. Robert Steurer, McConnell's spokesman, would only say: "As Whip, Sen. McConnell remains focused on doing the people's business in the U.S. Senate and keeping our Republican majority."

Congressman Offers Papers To Rebut Claims (AP)

By Lawrence Messina

The Associated Press, June 14, 2006

CHARLESTON, W.Va. -- Answering allegations from a watchdog group that have spawned a federal investigation, U.S. Rep. Alan Mollohan said on Tuesday that he was correcting or amending 19 items on his financial disclosure reports dating to 2000.

But the West Virginia Democrat said the "relative handful of unintentional and immaterial mistakes" fail to amount to the more than 250 "misrepresentations and omissions" the group alleged he had made in the reports.

The 12-term congressman also released several documents to rebut those allegations, including a statement from one of his accountants explaining the jump in personal worth seized on by the group in its complaint.

The National Legal and Policy Center, a conservative ethics watchdog group, has said Mollohan's assets grew by a minimum of $6.1 million between 2000 and 2004.

In a May 9 letter to Mollohan, the accounting firm of Braund Eiler & Vasko, based in Allison Park, Pa., credited skyrocketing real estate values for the rapid growth.

The firm has done accounting work for Remington LLC, which owns rental units in Washington, D.C., and whose shares are held by Mollohan, his wife and another couple.

"When the underlying asset of that stock investment is real estate, and when that real estate is located in a market that is experiencing rapidly escalating values, it really doesn't take much appreciation in a single unit to greatly affect the value of a block of units," Managing Partner Blair Eiler said in the letter.

To further show the effect of rising real estate values, Mollohan released his disclosure report for 2005.

That year, the congressman's assets increased by at least $1.6 million to a minimum of $7.9 million, and his non-congressional income rose by at least $113,801 to a minimum of $331,012. Real estate holdings in West Virginia's Canaan Valley and North Carolina accounted for the increases.

"The documents prove that the National Legal and Policy Center (NLPC) has wildly exaggerated the inadvertent errors on my past financial disclosure statements," Mollohan said in a release. "They also show that NLPC is dead wrong in implying that I have improperly benefited from my office."

The NLPC filed a complaint against Mollohan with federal prosecutors in April, but has declined to release it to The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0033779

The organization's chairman, Ken Boehm, questioned whether a booming real estate market can explain the jump in Mollohan's assets, and called Mollohan's disclosures on Tuesday a "quasi-validation" of the allegations.

"These are not isolated, inadvertent mistakes," Boehm said. "He has not begun to address all of the problems."

Some of the changes Mollohan asked the House Clerk's office to make to his reports reflect incorrect dates for financial transactions.

Others correct income from Remington to Mollohan and his wife that had been underreported by a total of $30,794 between 2000 and 2001. But other changes show Mollohan overstated that income by $40,820 in 2002.

The addendums also show that Mollohan borrowed $2.3 million in 1999 to refinance loans. But Mollohan said such loans are normally exempt from disclosure, citing advice he said he received at the time from counsel to the House ethics committee.

Besides Mollohan's assets, Boehm's group has targeted the federal appropriations he has secured for nonprofits in his district. The FBI has subpoenaed records from at least some of those nonprofits since Boehm's group filed its complaint.

Afterward Mollohan, facing re-election this year, was pressed by House Democratic leaders into stepping down as the ranking minority member of the House ethics committee. He is also on the House Appropriations Committee, and is a ranking member of one of its funding subcommittees.

Mollohan Reveals Finances (CHGAZ)

By Paul J. Nyden

Charleston (WV) Gazette, June 14, 2006

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, D-W.Va, released detailed financial information on Tuesday about his recent real estate transactions and financial disclosure reports.

Mollohan was responding to the National Legal and Policy Center, a conservative political group that accused him of hundreds of errors in those reports.

“The documents prove that the National Legal and Policy Center [NLPC] has wildly exaggerated the inadvertent errors on my past financial disclosure statements,” Mollohan stated in a press release.

“They also show that NLPC is dead wrong in implying that I have improperly benefited from my office....

“NLPC has raised questions and I have answered them — fully, honestly and openly. The only people hiding anything are the members of the group, who continue to conceal the 500-page complaint they have prepared against me,” Mollohan stated.

The NLPC sent the full report to the U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, and leaked excerpts to some newspapers.

Last month, Ken Boehm, chairman of the nonprofit NLPC told The Charleston Gazette he would not release the report.

“We were providing information we thought would be useful to the U.S. attorney in their investigation — it is up to them to decide what is true or not true,” Boehm said.

“I promised to release information about all of [wife] Barbara’s and my real estate transactions and I have done it,” Mollohan said during a telephone interview on Tuesday.

“People are welcome to go through this and to analyze it. It answers any and all questions a reasonable person could have about our real estate transactions.

“It is all there,” Mollohan said. “In contrast, the NLPC is not releasing their information.”

Mollohan provided his latest financial reports to the Clerk of the House of Representatives on Tuesday and challenged the NLPC to release its full report to the public.

Rep. Mollohan Admits Errors In Disclosure (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.), under federal investigation for blending his commercial investments with his duties as a congressional appropriator, acknowledged yesterday that he misstated more than a dozen transactions on his financial disclosure forms.

The 12-term lawmaker said he recently discovered "a limited number of inadvertent errors" in his public reports from 1999 through 2004. He said he has amended those forms "to correct any inaccurate impressions about my finances." He also released a chronology to explain how his assets grew from no more than $565,000 in 2000 to at least $6.3 million in 2004, primarily through heavily leveraged real estate transactions.

Mollohan resigned earlier this year as the ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee after a federal probe was begun into his personal finances. The investigation started soon after the National Legal and Policy Center, a small, conservative research institute in Virginia, turned over 500 pages of documents to the FBI in March. The NLPC alleged that the documents showed that Mollohan engaged in nine years of false reporting and the appearance of impropriety in his business contacts with federal contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0033780

Mollohan strongly denied any wrongdoing. "NLPC is dead wrong in implying that I have improperly benefited from my office," Mollohan said yesterday.

"The group also has ignored that we received a sizable inheritance, took on considerable financial risks and had the good fortune to be investing in a rising real estate market," Mollohan said. "It is those factors that are responsible for the increase of our assets."

The NLPC noted that one recent change in Mollohan's filing that the congressman did not highlight yesterday was a $35,000 loan in 2004 from Laura K. Kuhns and her husband. Kuhns, a former Mollohan aide, has invested in real estate with Mollohan and also heads a West Virginia foundation that benefits from appropriations targeted to the group by the lawmaker. The congressman's filing in 2005 indicates that he repaid the loan in full.

Mollohan's review of his reports, sparked by the federal probe, found many other errors as well.

He and his wife together have a 50 percent stake in a company that owns condominiums in a Foggy Bottom building. For 2000 to 2002, Mollohan said he understated his income from that company twice and overstated the income once -- in each case by several thousand dollars -- and amended his reports accordingly.

He also failed to report $2.3 million in loans that he took out to benefit the business, Remington Inc., from 1999 to 20002. Mollohan said that he did not have to disclose the loan under a strict interpretation of House rules but that "in an abundance of caution" he decided to do so. He also amended his public record to include a note receivable from Remington in 2003 of between $1 million and $5 million.

Mollohan added to his 2001 report his wife's purchase for $37,461 of a one-third interest in a company that owns the Ramada Inn in Morgantown, W.Va. She bought the share from Mollohan's brother. Mollohan and his sister own the other two-thirds of the firm, which had been owned by their now-deceased father, former congressman Robert H. Mollohan.

In 2003, Mollohan said he understated the size of a $1.5 million construction loan from Central Carolina Bank as "up to $1 million." The next year he said he misstated several dates on which he took out loans to buy property in North Carolina, and he also incorrectly listed the amounts of some of those loans.

In North Carolina, the Mollohans invested in four lots on Bald Head Island with Kuhns and her husband and also built neighboring beachfront houses there. Kuhns heads the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, which focuses on refurbishing real estate in Mollohan's district and uses money that Mollohan has earmarked for the purpose.

One of the lots was sold in January and the three others have been contracted for sale, Mollohan said in a statement. Mollohan has also said that he is selling his beachfront home in order to reduce his debts.

In his latest financial disclosure report, Mollohan said he values 12 separate properties at about $6.6 million and he added that they have mortgages of more than $4.4 million.

Rep. Mollohan Restates Filings On Disclosures (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Alan Mollohan, whose real-estate deals and financial disclosures have drawn federal scrutiny, restated six years of House financial-disclosure filings to correct what he called "a limited number of inadvertent errors."

The amendments answer some questions about his finances but raise others. For example, they reveal that the West Virginia Democrat borrowed $35,000 from a business partner who has won tens of millions of federal dollars directed by the congressman to the nonprofit groups she operates. Loans to lawmakers from political supporters and federal contractors are subject to special scrutiny under federal election-commission and House ethics rules.

In a letter to the House clerk, Mr. Mollohan said he misstated some of the income from his investment in Remington Inc., which owns condominiums here, and that he and his wife failed to disclose a $2.3 million bank loan for that investment. He also said he misstated the purchase or mortgage dates or amounts of other properties, including some bought with his real-estate partner, Laura Kuhns, who runs a nonprofit group funded by targeted spending items -- known as earmarks -- from the federal budget inserted by Mr. Mollohan.

Ms. Kuhns didn't return calls yesterday. A spokesman for Mr. Mollohan said the loan was repaid in full with interest.

Mr. Mollohan's disclosures came under scrutiny after a conservative legal group, the National Legal and Policy Center in Falls Church, Va., sent a letter to the U.S. attorney in Washington raising questions about what it has called a "pattern of misrepresentations and omissions" that accompanied a rapid and unexplained rise in the congressman's wealth in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0033781

During this period, Mr. Mollohan pumped federal funds into a network of nonprofit groups in West Virginia that he created and that are run by Mr. Mollohan's business partners or political supporters. This network, detailed in a Wall Street Journal article1 April 7, got more than $200 million in earmarked spending from the congressman in the past six years.

A federal investigation has widened to include an examination of Mr. Mollohan's earmarks to these groups, some of which have said they received grand-jury subpoenas. Mr. Mollohan, who stepped down from the House ethics committee in April, has said he welcomes an impartial investigation and is confident he will be able to answer any of the allegations.

In his statement yesterday, the 12-term congressman said that the initial claims of the conservative research group "wildly exaggerated the inadvertent errors" in past disclosures. "They also show that NLPC is dead wrong implying that I have improperly benefited from my office," he said.

Mr. Mollohan said he and his wife "received a sizable inheritance, took on considerable financial risks, and had the good fortune to be investing in a rising real-estate market." The focus on disclosures have become a heated issue in Mr. Mollohan's re-election campaign, where he faces a Republican opponent with active backing from the White House.

Mr. Mollohan's pattern of earmarking federal funds to real-estate partners and campaign contributors became public amid rising scrutiny of earmarks. These narrowly targeted spending measures figured in the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randall Cunningham, a California Republican, and the continuing investigation into lawmakers' relationships with Jack Abramoff, once the most powerful Republican lobbyist on Capitol Hill.

Congressman In F.B.I. Inquiry Corrects Errors In Financial Disclosure Forms (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren And Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — Nearly two months after stepping down as the top Democrat on the House ethics committee, Representative Alan B. Mollohan on Tuesday filed some two dozen corrections to his past six annual financial disclosure forms, saying his accountant had uncovered "a relative handful of unintentional and immaterial mistakes."

Mr. Mollohan, of West Virginia, is facing his most intense electoral challenge since he was first elected in 1982, fueled in part by an F.B.I. investigation into possible links between his real estate investments and five nonprofit groups he founded and supported with special federal appropriations known as earmarks.

In releasing the long-awaited financial report, Mr. Mollohan said it "shows that government money has never been used" and "no money has ever been diverted from the nonprofits" to his investments. He compared the National Legal and Policy Center — a conservative group whose written complaint prompted the F.B.I. inquiry — to Senator Joseph R. McCarthy for publicly describing "250 misrepresentations and omissions" in his financial forms but refusing to release the 500-page complaint detailing the accusations.

"It has been obvious for some time that N.L.P.C. is not really interested in learning the truth," Mr. Mollohan said in a statement. "It is not a public watchdog. It is an attack dog controlled by, and linked to, national political operatives who are desperate to unseat me."

Most of the amendments Mr. Mollohan filed with the clerk of the House are minor matters of sloppiness, switching closing dates on real estate deals or tweaking income totals from rental properties. But the congressman also acknowledged that from 1999 to 2002 he failed to include a significant transaction relating to the Remington condominiums he and his wife own with Rosemary and Joseph Jarvis, distant cousins who have a history of bankruptcy and failed federal contracts.

Mr. Mollohan said he did not report the $2.3 million "back-to-back loan" — in which the couples borrowed money from a bank and then loaned it to their corporate entity that owns the condominiums — because he believed it was not required and because the net value was zero.

The report also revealed that the Mollohans borrowed $35,000 last year from Laura Kurtz Kuhns, executive director of one of the nonprofits whose records were subpoenaed by the F.B.I., and her husband, Don. The Kuhns were partners with the Mollohans in a $2 million purchase of five empty lots on Bald Head Island, N.C., where they also have side-by-side beachfront vacation homes.

Ken Boehm, president of the National Legal and Policy Center, said Mr. Mollohan's report proved the "pattern of misrepresentations and omissions" his group had alleged. He noted that Mr. Mollohan said he could not correct financial forms from 1996 to 1998 because the records remain officially on file for only six years, and Mr. Boehm said those earlier reports include "even more embarrassing disclosures."

"If N.L.P.C.'s allegations were all false, why is he amending six years worth of financial disclosure reports involving millions of dollars worth of assets?" Mr. Boehm asked in an e-mail message.

DOJ_NMG_0033782

The report shows the Mollohans are highly leveraged real estate investors, refinancing properties in Washington, West Virginia and North Carolina, and taking cash out to buy more.

In 2005, the couple's assets swelled to $8 million to $31 million, up from $6 million to $25 million in 2004 (and under $550,000 in 2000). Their reported income remained in the same broad range used by these Congressional forms, $200,000 to $1.3 million, and their liabilities grew slightly, to $4 million to $15 million, up from $3.6 million to $13.5 million.

Mollohan Amends Finance Reports (WHINT)

By Joselyn King

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, June 14, 2006

U.S. Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., now has amended his financial disclosure statements for the years 1999-2004, and he submitted these changes to the clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives on Tuesday.

Mollohan requested 19 changes to his reports, and the number of his admitted errors was significantly less than the 250 "misrepresentations and omissions" the National Legal and Policy Center has reported finding in his reports.

Mollohan stepped down as ranking Democrat on the House Ethics Committee in late April after the conservative group raised questions regarding great increases in his personal wealth that were reported in his financial disclosure statements.

The values of his investments in real estate were shown in the reports to have increased 6,000 percent.

On Tuesday, Mollohan submitted the amendment statements and provided alongside them a letter from the accounting firm of Braund Eiler and Vasko of Allison Park, Pa., explaining the changes.

Mollohan stated in a separate letter to the House Clerk's Office that he and his wife, Barbara, each own a 25-percent share in the Remington condominiums in Washington, D.C.

"For the years 2000 to 2002, I inadvertently understated on two occasions — and overstated on one occasion — our income from the Remington Inc. by one reporting category," Mollohan wrote. He requested that the following changes be made:

? For his 2000 financial report, Mollohan stated that while he checked the box indicating "income up to $50,000" for each of his and his wife's shares in the Remington, the box he should have checked was for the "$50,001-$100,000" value range. He had the same request for his 2001 report.

But Mollohan noted he over-reported his income from the Remington in 2002, having checked the box for indicating income "of at least $100,001."

"In fact, the income for each interest was $80,410," Mollohan wrote. "Accordingly, the income for each 25-percent interest should have been shown in the lower $50,001 to $100,000 range."

Mollohan next claimed that he and his wife, along with Remington co-owners Joseph and Rosemary Jarvis, refinanced loans related to the Remington by personally borrowing $2.3 million from the United Bank of Virginia. The refinancing was accomplished when the four owners immediately loaned the money to Remington Inc., according to Mollohan.

"Neither the loan nor the offsetting note was reported on my financial disclosure form from 1999 to 2002," he stated. "Upon reviewing the facts, I believe the reason they were not reported was that the proceeds of the loan were loaned to Remington Inc., which guaranteed the loan and made the payments directly to the bank."

The loan was considered a business loan and wasn't required to be disclosed under House financial disclosure rules, Mollohan wrote.

For each of his reports submitted between 1999 and 2002, he asked that a "liability in the reporting category of $1,000,001 to $5 million" be listed, with the liability being listed as "financing for Remington Inc., Washington, D.C."

After the loan was refinanced in 2003, Mollohan said he began listing the loan.

"That refinancing, which was in the amount of $4.1 million, was made possible by an increase in the market value of the apartments owned by Remington Inc.," he said. The four owners withdrew an amount exceeding $1.5 million.

Mollohan added that he inadvertently didn't report the loan in 2003 and asked that it be added.

Mollohan stated he inherited a one-third share of the Ramada Inn property in Morgantown after the death of his father, former U.S. Rep. Robert Mollohan, D-W.Va, and that his wife purchased a second third of the ownership from his brother. His sister owns the remaining third, he states.

"Although I reported my wife's interest, I did not report her purchase transaction," Mollohan said. "While matters involving family members are generally exempted from reporting, I am informed that the family member exception for transactions does not extend to transactions with one's brother or brother-in-law."

He asked that his 2001 report be changed to reflect his wife's purchase.

? Mollohan also requested changes on his 2003 financial disclosure form pertaining to the closing date of his purchase of the Winterset Lot in Canaan Valley, W.Va.

DOJ_NMG_0033783

He also asked that the amount of a subsequent construction loan for repair work to the property be moved from the "up to $1 million amount" to the "$1 million to $5 million" category.

Other requested changes pertain to changing listed closing dates on property the Mollohans purchased in Bald Head, N.C., and Canaan Valley, W.Va., in 2004.

Mollohan's challenger in the Nov. 7 general election, current Delegate Chris Wakim, R-Ohio, released a statement in response to Mollohan's actions Tuesday.

"This may be how career politicians do business in Washington, but it's not how we do business in West Virginia," Wakim said. "Here in West Virginia, it doesn't take 200 pages to claim your innocence.

"Alan Mollohan's problem has nothing to do with forms. His problem is that he used his public office to enrich himself and his political cronies at the expense of the people he was elected to serve — the citizens of the 1st District of West Virginia. West Virginians were forced to accept excuses from their leaders for far too long. It's time for new leaders who will honor the office and the public trust without requiring a 200-page declaration of innocence,ï" he added.

Former Clients Fueled Firm (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, June 14, 2006

At least 33 former clients of a top GOP staffer on the House Appropriations Committee hiked the fees they paid to the aide's lobbying firm after he returned to Capitol Hill, providing his firm with more than $1.1 million in additional revenue in 2005.

The increased cash from the former clients of Jeff Shockey, deputy staff director of the panel, came largely from longtime clients who increased their payments dramatically in the first six months after his departure — which coincided with the time frame his former partners projected for increased revenue and led to a nearly $2 million buyout from the firm.

Shockey's role with the firm Copeland, Lowery, Jacquez, Denton & White and its connections to Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) are part of a burgeoning federal investigation into the lobbying-for-earmark industry that serves as the financial lifeline of many defense contractors and has expanded in recent years to include municipalities and localities across the country.

Lewis has denied any wrongdoing on his part, while Shockey's lawyers have claimed that his buyout from the firm was ethical and legal, and something required by law rather than a parting gift. The firm has said it has acted completely within bounds of all laws.

"Throughout my career, I have also made every effort to meet the highest ethical standards, and I am absolutely certain that any review of my work will confirm this," Lewis said in a statement earlier this month.

This spike in revenue from Shockey's former clients came after Copeland Lowery played an active role in financially underwriting Lewis' campaign for the Appropriations gavel.

In 2003 and 2004, when the chairmanship race was in full swing, the firm's partners, their relatives, its clients and lobbyists affiliated with the firm contributed about $215,000 to Future Leaders PAC, the political action committee that Lewis used to dish out contributions to colleagues. All told, the firm and those connected to it were responsible for more than 26 percent of all donations to Future Leaders over the two-year cycle, according to federal election records.

Lewis contributed $583,000 from Future Leaders to candidates and party committees in the 2004 cycle.

Copeland Lowery has long had close ties to Lewis, given the decades-old friendship of the lawmaker and former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.). Those connections grew in 1999 when Shockey left Lewis and joined Copeland Lowery as a partner, giving him proprietary rights to his clients in a payout scheme that meant he kept whatever revenues he earned minus 18 percent, according to disclosure forms. He became a named partner to the firm in February 2003.

While the departure of such a prominent rainmaker is usually bad news for lobbying firms, Shockey's return to Capitol Hill and the ascension of Lewis to full committee chairman in January 2005 has proven to be even better business for Copeland Lowery.

Even though his disclosure forms show he held a 26 percent stake in the firm, Shockey's clients were responsible for more than 33 percent of all its revenue in 2004. According to a Roll Call analysis of Shockey's former clients, his book of work grew in worth to $2.9 million in 2005 while he was on Lewis' staff — up to 39 percent of the firm's $7.4 million in revenue.

Copeland Lowery went from the 54th largest revenue earner among lobbying firms in mid-2004 to the 32nd largest by the end of 2005, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com.

The firm's ties to Lewis remain strong, as Shockey's name was replaced in January 2005 with that of Letitia White, who served as a top Appropriations subcommittee on Defense aide for Lewis until 2003. She left the Hill and joined Copeland Lowery, focusing much of her initial work on defense contractor clients.

DOJ_NMG_0033784

As Roll Call reported last week, the FBI has pulled the financial disclosure forms of Lewis, Shockey and White. In addition, federal investigators have subpoenaed the records of seven Copeland Lowery clients, all of whom at one point had Shockey as their lobbyist and at least four of whom have since had White take over their account.

Liberal activists and government watchdogs have questioned the nature of Shockey's financial separation agreement, which was included in a financial disclosure form he filed with the House ethics committee in early 2005. His lawyers wrote the committee regarding the buyout, as did Lewis.

However, the committee never responded in writing officially approving the arrangement or the financial package.

Shockey's lawyers released his new financial disclosure form Friday, showing that his total buyout was not $600,000 — as initially reported in the 2005 forms — but actually $1.96 million in a series of five different payments that ended in August 2005.

In addition, the largest portion of the buyout package was determined not on the past performance of his clients. But, his lawyers said it was based on projections for how much revenue they poured into the firm in the first six months of 2005.

Shockey's lawyers and a media adviser vigorously defended this practice in a conference call Friday, saying that someone else on the panel's staff was in charge of handling the earmarks that his former clients were seeking. "He cut all links with the Copeland Lowery firm," one lawyer said, requesting anonymity.

His lawyers initially said that the increase in revenue that the firm saw from Shockey's old clients was "not unreasonable" and based on new clients he was signing up late in 2004 before he returned to Lewis.

However, lobbying records show that Shockey signed up just four new clients late in 2004, the fees for which accounted for $60,000 in the first half of 2005.

Rather, the overwhelming lion's share of growth in fees came from already existing clients. Shockey's old clients paid $1.46 million in fees for the first half of 2005.

That represented almost triple the amount of revenue, $580,000, his clients paid the firm in the first half of 2004, according to lobbying records, and represented 84 percent of the amount his clients paid Copeland Lowery in all of 2004.

In effect, the dramatic uptick in fees paid to the firm in early 2005 had the double benefit of increasing Copeland Lowery revenue totals and increasing the final total of the financial buyout package for Shockey. But advisers also noted that his severance package was set in stone even if his old clients abandoned the firm.

For all of 2005, 33 of 49 ex-Shockey clients paid more money to Copeland Lowery than in 2004, with another 11 paying the same amount in both years, according to Roll Call's review of records.

Just a handful had a downturn in fees paid to Copeland Lowery.

At least 19 of Shockey's clients have been taken over by White, while an unreported amount have been subcontracted by the firm to Alexandra Shockey, the aide's wife, who has her own firm and rents space from Copeland Lowery. Shockey informed the ethics committee — in a letter signed in April 2005 by his lawyer William Oldaker — that he has recused himself from any clients and work connected to his wife's business.

'New Direction' Is New Theme For Democratic Plan (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic House and Senate leaders are planning to reduce the cost of student loans and prescription drugs, raise the minimum wage and launch an effort to develop alternative fuels if they win back control of Congress.

In an interview Tuesday with USA TODAY, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi previewed the "New Direction for America" platform hammered out by Democratic members of Congress, mayors and governors. She and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid plan to formally unveil the plan today.

"The American people need to know, if you win, what are your priorities," she said. Reid said the party is standing "with the people we have always stood with: seniors, students and the hardworking families of America. We intend to tackle the issues that matter most."

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats in November to regain control of the House of Representatives. In the Senate, picking up six seats would give Democrats control.

Pelosi discouraged comparisons with the Republican "Contract With America," a 10-point pledge that GOP lawmakers and candidates signed six weeks before the 1994 election. That campaign manifesto helped the GOP win control of both the House and Senate for the first time in 40 years.

She said Democratic candidates will be "independent representatives for their districts," a nod to the differing views within the party on issues such as abortion, gun control and Iraq. They are points on which Pelosi of California and Reid of Nevada haven't always agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0033785

The Democrats' plan would increase the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15, grant authority to the secretary of Health and Human Services to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices with pharmaceutical companies for those in Medicare's drug program and cut student-loan interest rates — rising to 6.8% in July — by half.

The agenda also calls for enacting recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, formed after the 2001 terror attacks, to boost national security and funding for it, and for eliminating about $18 billion in tax breaks and subsidies for oil companies. Pelosi said savings would go to develop alternative fuels.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, a New York Republican who chairs his party's House campaign committee, said Democrats' agenda would amount to “bumper sticker slogans.” He demurred when asked whether the GOP plans to respond with a second contract.

The parties' role reversal reflects the political landscape. President Bush's 38% approval rating in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last weekend is encouraging Democrats to sound national campaign themes and Republicans to avoid them. The same poll found 51% of registered voters would vote for a Democratic congressional candidate; 39% for a Republican.

Ex-House majority leader Dick Armey, a 1994 contract author, says his former colleagues “need to do some serious substantive legislation” to improve their electoral chances. Armey, a conservative Republican, says his GOP colleagues are “wasting time” debating constitutional amendments to ban gay marriage and flag burning. “They're not doing real work. They're making political statements,” he says.

'Serious Misconduct' By NIH Expert Found (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

A world-renowned Alzheimer's disease researcher at the National Institutes of Health took advantage of the agency's lax oversight by improperly forwarding valuable tissue specimens to a pharmaceutical company and then accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in consulting fees from it, according to congressional investigators.

Trey Sunderland, chief of the geriatric psychiatry branch at the National Institute of Mental Health, failed to tell agency officials about his arrangement with the drug giant Pfizer Inc., as required by federal rules, the investigators concluded in a 27-page preliminary report released yesterday.

Sunderland also did not properly disclose arrangements with another company, said the report, which found no wrongdoing by the drug companies. And though the NIH has not released the findings of its own investigation, the House report said the agency has concluded that Sunderland committed "serious misconduct, in violation of HHS ethics rules and federal law and regulation."

"I wish we were holding this hearing to congratulate him on some great discovery," said Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, at a hearing yesterday of the oversight and investigations subcommittee. "Instead, we're going to have to discuss how he used his position to use NIH spinal fluid samples to further his own undisclosed personal consulting."

Sunderland, who has been subpoenaed to testify at a follow-up hearing today, has conceded that some disclosures were not properly filed -- in part, he has said, because of paperwork errors by office staff members.

"There was no effort to conceal this in any way," Sunderland's Washington attorney, Robert F. Muse, said yesterday, adding that "his failure to file was not unusual."

Until the NIH recently strengthened its conflict-of-interest rules, Muse said, many NIH doctors saw the requirements to disclose outside consulting as "basically a bureaucratic nuisance." They let their superiors know what they were up to through other channels, Muse said.

Several researchers linked to such failings have avoided closer scrutiny by leaving the NIH in the past two years. But Sunderland's request to retire has been denied -- an option the agency had because, unlike most NIH scientists, he is part of the commissioned corps, one of the nation's seven uniformed services.

Muse said that the denial is evidence that he is being made a scapegoat.

The congressional report builds on findings of conflict of interest among NIH researchers in 2004 and 2005, which led Director Elias A. Zerhouni to institute restrictions last year on drug company consulting and other outside activities by NIH employees.

The new focus is on blood and other tissue samples collected by NIH scientists for clinical research, and on the NIH's alleged lack of an inventory system or clear policies to ensure that those federally owned samples are used only for the purposes for which they were donated.

DOJ_NMG_0033786

"It's important to remember that each of these samples originated in a person . . . that chose to make a gift so research could progress," Rep. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.) said at yesterday's hearing. "What is most shocking to me is the carelessness in the way in which some at NIH seem to be treating such a precious commodity."

At the heart of the investigation is Sunderland's use of spinal fluid collected in the early 1990s by an NIMH scientist, Susan Molchan, who later left the institute. When Molchan -- who once filed sex discrimination charges against Sunderland that were unsuccessful -- sought to resume her research in a different lab in 2004, she learned that many of her 10- to 15-year-old samples, which she hoped to retrieve, were no longer in the NIMH's freezers.

Acting on a complaint from her, House investigators found that Sunderland had sent thousands of specimens -- including some of Molchan's -- to Pfizer under an agreement not approved by NIH officials. Pfizer used the samples in its search for biological markers of Alzheimer's progression, which could have led to a potentially lucrative test. Sunderland ultimately received at least $285,000 in consulting fees for work relating to the specimens, investigators said, as well as more than $300,000 for giving talks and other activities.

"In sum, the records and interviews conducted in this investigation raise serious questions of misconduct in connection with, and inadequate oversight and control over, human tissue samples" at the NIH, the report concluded.

NIH spokesman John Burklow said the agency is "evaluating the process of material transfer out of NIH and will be clarifying current rules." Under the clarifications, he said, "all transfers of human samples will require an appropriate agreement signed off by a senior official."

The NIH's Office of Human Subjects Research in January also revised its guidance on the use of stored tissue samples. The new language requires careful tracking of all specimens and documentation of their fate.

NIH Researcher Gave Samples To Pfizer, Pocketed $600,000 (LAT)

By David Willman

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senior Alzheimer's disease researcher at the National Institutes of Health pocketed more than $600,000 in fees from Pfizer Inc. while providing the drug company with thousands of samples of spinal fluid drawn from patients who were studied for his government work, congressional investigators said in a report made public Tuesday.

The new details about the conduct of the scientist, Dr. P. Trey Sunderland III, drew bipartisan criticism from members of an investigative panel of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

The House members said Sunderland's conduct raised broad questions about how the NIH accounted for materials harvested from patients — materials that hold promise for finding cures or ways to better diagnose serious diseases.

Lax record-keeping regarding samples of human tissue leaves NIH laboratories "vulnerable to the risks of theft and abuse," said the committee chairman, Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas). "It would really be a shame if we find out that the National Institutes of Health has more control over its paper clips and trash cans than it has over its human tissue samples."

The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan, said: "NIH lacks adequate controls for human tissue samples, human subject protection and the scientific conduct of many of its senior employees. Accountability must be restored to NIH's own research programs."

Documents presented at a panel hearing Tuesday showed that from 1996 to 2004, Sunderland accepted consulting, speaking and advisory fees from Pfizer totaling about $612,000. The committee staff found that nearly half of the money, $285,000, was for his consulting related to the search for scientific clues in 3,245 samples taken from 538 patients who participated as volunteers at the NIH.

The committee staff estimated that, assuming a cost of $12,000 per research patient, it cost the government $6.45 million to collect the samples that Sunderland shipped to Pfizer.

An attorney for Sunderland, Robert F. Muse, said Tuesday that his client "did not conceal his relationship with Pfizer." However, the committee staff noted that Sunderland did not obtain required written authorization from the NIH before he entered into paid arrangements with Pfizer and other drug companies.

The Los Angeles Times reported in January 2005 that, based on an internal review at the NIH, officials had referred Sunderland's conduct for investigation by the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

The NIH last year banned all employees from accepting consulting fees or stock options from pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies.

A spokesman for the NIH, John Burklow, said Tuesday that officials could not discuss the Sunderland case because "it remains under investigation." But Burklow said that even under the NIH's earlier, more permissive ethics rules, federal employees were prohibited from outside arrangements that overlapped with their government work.

DOJ_NMG_0033787

"It is important to note that the specific consulting arrangements in question, had they been known to NIH, would not have been approved under the present or previous ethics regulations," Burklow said, adding: "We share the committee's concerns in regard to the ethical management of human tissue samples and the development of rigorous and uniform policies to protect the public's trust and interests."

Newbie Local Political Activist (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 14, 2006

Plain old American citizen Tom DeLay (what else are we supposed to call the fallen former Majority Leader?) seems a little disoriented since resigning from the House last week.

DeLay, now a permanent resident of Alexandria, Va., put his name to good use by doing a round of get-out-the-vote "robocalls" on behalf of Mark Ellmore, one of two GOP candidates who ran in Tuesday's Republican primary to oppose Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.) this fall.

DeLay began his message by saying, "Hello, this is Tom DeLay." He mentioned that as Majority Leader, he "battled Jim Moran in Congress for 14 years." Then, for some reason, he continued, "I recently re-registered to vote in Northern California."

A House GOP aide who lives in Alexandria and who played for HOH the voice mail message she saved from DeLay's robocall said, "My husband made me listen to it three times, he thought it was so funny."

Whoops. Clearly, or so we assume, DeLay meant to say that he recently re-registered to vote in Northern Virginia. Though we just can't help but wonder if perhaps he was dreaming of the day that hippy dippy Marin County takes a hard turn to the right.

Believe. If you've always dreamed of talking to Cher, today's your big chance (if you read this in time). She's scheduled to be the guest on C-SPAN'S "Washington Journal" show from 9 to 9:30 a.m. to talk about sending better helmets to the troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Nobody is more excited about the sultry pop star's in-studio interview than the executive producer of "Washington Journal," Peter Slen, who happens to be Cher's biggest fan in all of Washington, D.C. Slen is due to host this morning's show, which means he gets to interview the goddess of ecstasy-fueled dance music.

While Slen will be talking to Cher about Operation Helmet, an organization that supplies troops with helmet liners to protect soldiers from head injuries, he'll be wishing they were on tour together.

"My iPod has her 'Living Proof' and 'The Very Best Of,' her most recent. I said farewell to her a couple of times at her concerts," Slen told us Tuesday, trying in vain to remain all C-SPAN calm for us. His absolute favorite Cher tune is the cover she does of Elton John's "When the Money's Gone," which is on "Living Proof." (He even played it for us over the phone.) "She does a beautiful job with it," he said.

Though this will be the first time Slen has ever interviewed Cher in person, he remembers the first time he talked to her. Exactly. "It was Oct. 27, 2003, at 7:16 a.m. when I was hosting," he said. (That's 4:16 a.m. California time.)

Cher has called into the show a couple of times since then, most recently over Memorial Day weekend. Slen will never forget what she said to him during that 2003 call: "I see you every morning."

And we can imagine what Slen must have been thinking: Yeah, and I sing a duet in the shower with you every morning.

Turd Blossom's Free. Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) was, as always, quick to hold a news conference Tuesday to react to word that Karl Rove has escaped indictment in the CIA Leakgate probe. But he was stumped when it came to Rove's nickname.

Typically quick on his feet, Schumer wasn't quite prepared for the question he got from MSNBC reporter Tom Curry, who began his question saying, "Senator, as you know, the president has nicknames that he applies to people. And one of the nicknames he applied to Karl Rove was Turd Blossom."

Schumer looked clueless. "Was what, Cherry Blossom?" Schumer asked quizzically as the room burst out laughing.

"Turd Blossom," Curry explained amid the uproar.

"I didn't know that," Schumer said as reporters continued howling. "Even my nickname is better than that. My nickname is 'Ellis,' which is my middle name."

Curry finally asked his question: "Do you think this will lead to — in terms of Rove's career as a political strategist in the fall campaign — will this lead to a new flowering of Turd Blossom?"

Proving that there's first time for everything, Schumer replied, "I'm not going to comment."

Rep. Says VA Is F'd Up. Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) was so fired up Tuesday over the Veterans' Affairs' handling of stolen military personnel files that he dropped the F-bomb at a news conference outside VA headquarters.

After a VA "spin doctor," as Filner calls him, ran outside and accused the Congressman of staging a "publicity stunt," Filner, who has been filling in as ranking member on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, let her rip.

DOJ_NMG_0033788

"You guys f---ed it up!" the Congressman yelled. "Stop covering your ass and figure it out!"

Asked about his outburst, Filner told HOH that he's furious with the VA for waiting three whole weeks before responding publicly to the burglary of a laptop containing 26.5 million military personnel members' personal records. "I call this the Katrina of the VA," Filner said. "They haven't done anything to help veterans."

Filner wants VA Secretary Jim Nicholson to hire cyber experts and "sit down with the credit bureaus" and figure out a way to help the military personnel, whose stolen information included birth dates, addresses, Social Security numbers and disability codes.

The Congressman said he wonders whether we're going to hear President Bush very soon uttering the fatal phrase, "Mr. Nicholson, you're doing a heckuva job."

As for his potty mouth, Filner joked about the vice president, who's also been partial to the F-Bomb. "Cheney might offer me a job now," Filner said.

Bill Would Limit Consumers' Credit Rights (USAT)

By Byron Acohido

USA Today, June 14, 2006

SEATTLE — Congress is considering pre-empting laws in 17 states that allow anyone to freeze their own credit and instead restricting the privilege to ID theft victims.

The proposed Financial Data Protection Act of 2006, expected to be voted on by the House as soon as next week, comes on the heels of the recent theft of sensitive data for 26 million veterans and active duty military personnel. If it becomes law, vets and military personnel who live in states that permit unrestricted credit freezes would lose that option.

A credit freeze cuts off access to your credit history. Since most banks and merchants insist on seeing a credit report before issuing credit, identity thieves can't open bogus accounts using ill-gotten data. Under the bill, backed by the financial services industry, simply having your data lost or stolen isn't enough. You must file a police report describing a specific instance of it being used to commit a crime.

"It's like telling someone you can't put a deadbolt on your front door until after you've been burglarized," says Washington state Attorney General Rob McKenna.

Rep. Steven LaTourette, R.-Ohio, the bill's co-author, says credit freezes must be held in check to keep the financial system from unraveling. "Even the simplest process of buying groceries with your credit or debit card will break down if we allow a patchwork of competing and conflicting state laws," he says. Evan Hendricks, editor of Privacy Times, and other critics counter that the bill abolishes the rights of citizens who live in states that permit anyone to request a credit freeze. "It's a nightmare bill for consumers," Hendricks says.

The bill also would pre-empt laws in 29 states requiring companies, institutions and agencies to notify individuals about security breaches compromising their data. It sets national criteria for data protection and breach disclosures, and puts banking and Treasury officials in charge of compliance.

Proponents say fewer breaches will result. "If we can protect the data better on the front end, it will diminish the need for law enforcement to chase down the bad guys," says Andrew Barbour, vice president of government affairs for the Financial Services Roundtable, a banking lobbying group.

But critics say the bill tramples states' rights and undermines the consumer-protection role of state attorney generals. "If you have a strong federal standard, that's one thing," says Susanna Montezemolo, policy analyst at the Consumers Union. "But this is a very weak federal standard."

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., says banking and Treasury regulators lack the "ability and the inclination" to expand consumer-protection duties. "It's just not what they do," he says. "They're busy worrying about the financial stability of the world."

Give Judges A Peek At Secrets (LAT)

By Louis Fisher

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

THE JUSTICE Department told a federal judge Monday that a challenge to the National Security Agency's controversial domestic eavesdropping program must be thrown out of court because the secrets involved are just too sensitive.

"The evidence we need to demonstrate … that it is lawful cannot be disclosed without that process itself causing grave harm to the United States' national security," said the government's lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino.

This is not the first time the Justice Department has invoked what is known as the "state secrets privilege." It was used, for instance, to dismiss the case of an FBI whistle-blower, and again to derail the case of an African American CIA officer who charged discrimination in the agency. It was used in the case of Khaled Masri, the German citizen who alleges he was detained while on vacation and held for five months in Afghanistan, where he was shackled and beaten before being released as a case of mistaken identity.

DOJ_NMG_0033789

Each time, the courts have agreed to dismiss the proceedings simply because the Justice Department says that trying the cases would reveal state secrets.

But that's not the way it has to be.

The fact is that the branch of government that runs the courtroom and decides questions concerning privilege and the introduction of evidence is the judiciary, not the executive branch. Judges have a constitutional duty to function as neutral referees to allow each side to present its case fairly. A court that automatically accepts the government's argument about state secrets, without ever looking at the documents in question, aligns the judiciary with the executive branch and eliminates any chance of a fair trial.

The "state secrets privilege" reached the Supreme Court in 1953 in United States vs. Reynolds, a case in which the widows of three civilians who died in the crash of a B-29 bomber sought damages. They asked the government to give them the accident report and the statements of three surviving crew members. Lower courts held that the government must surrender the secret documents to the trial court or lose the case. The judge would examine the documents in his chambers to determine if the government's demand for secrecy was valid.

Refusing to release the documents, the government lost at the district and appeals court levels. But when the case got to the Supreme Court, the justices reversed course and accepted the government's argument about state secrets — without ever looking at the documents. Even having the judge examine the evidence alone in his chambers could jeopardize national security, the majority ruled. When the documents were declassified in the 1990s, it became evident that the Supreme Court had been misled: The documents contained no state secrets.

In his authoritative 1940 treatise on evidence, John Henry Wigmore concluded that the executive branch is entitled to protect state secrets but that in cases in which classified information is at issue, it is up to the judge to decide whether such evidence qualifies as legitimately secret, and thus legally privileged. A court that "abdicates its inherent function of determining the facts upon which the admissibility of evidence depends will furnish to bureaucratic officials too ample opportunities for abusing the privilege," Wigmore warned.

I believe that Wigmore was right and that the Supreme Court decided the Reynolds case wrongly. Some federal judges agreed, and they have continued to recognize their obligation to examine disputed documents in their chambers before passing judgment on matters of evidence and privilege.

In 1971, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit argued that "an essential ingredient of our rule of law is the authority of the courts to determine whether an executive official or agency has complied with the Constitution and with the mandates of Congress which define and limit the authority of the executive."

Claims of executive power "cannot override the duty of the court to assure that an official has not exceeded his charter or flouted the legislative will," the court said.

The executive branch may assert a right to keep its secrets, but this must not be viewed as an absolute right, only a privilege granted by the court when appropriate. Otherwise, even in the age of terrorism, there can be no judicial independence and no fair trial for Americans who would challenge their government.

Louis Fisher is the author of the forthcoming "In the Name of National Security," which analyzes United States vs. Reynolds.

Wrenching Changes On The Line (NYT)

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

The road back to prosperity will be a long and hard one for American automakers. Companies like Ford and General Motors groan under the weight of their history, manifested in the legacy costs that are a result of decades of promises to support workers and provide them with health care in their old age.

Foreign companies like Honda and Toyota have a double advantage. In the United States, their much newer manufacturing plants have hardly any retirees. Overseas, their workers can rely on national health care systems. Meanwhile, for American automakers, the costs are going only in one direction. In 1999, General Motors spent $3.6 billion to provide health benefits to 1.2 million workers, retirees and dependents. By 2005 the cost had ballooned to $5.3 billion for 1.1 million.

At the same time, vehicle production has been falling. G.M., Ford and the parts maker Delphi have all offered thousands of buyouts as part of efforts to restructure their inefficient manufacturing businesses, trimming payrolls to become more competitive.

DOJ_NMG_0033790

But that means fewer workers supporting armies of retirees, a demographic challenge not unlike the one facing the Social Security system.

The United Automobile Workers union has already made concessions on the superior health insurance its members receive. But slashing benefits is a short-term approach, and an insufficient answer when G.M. lost $10.6 billion in 2005.

In an ideal world, America would join the overwhelming majority of developed countries and hammer out some kind of national health care system. Failing such a sudden and unlikely onset of sanity, creative solutions are needed. Sen. Barack Obama has proposed striking a bargain with American automakers to help them with retiree health care costs in exchange for higher fuel efficiency standards. While we have some questions about how to make such a system work, it is at least a worthy new idea — one of a very few in a field desperately in need of them.

OTHER NEWS:

May Retail Sales Rose 0.1%, Signaling A Slowing Economy (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lukewarm retail sales last month suggest that higher gasoline prices and the weakening housing market are taking a toll on consumers and slowing the economy.

Adding to concerns about inflation, wholesale prices climbed again in May.

The Commerce Department yesterday said retail sales rose only 0.1% in May from the previous month, after growing 0.8% in April, as spending patterns took a turn toward thrift. Consumers spent more on filling up their gas tanks -- primarily because pump prices shot up -- but less on new vehicles. Grocery stores saw gains, but sales at restaurants and bars were flat. Consumers also cut back on home furnishings, building materials and garden supplies, a possible byproduct of weaker home sales and remodeling activity.

Overall, retail sales in May were 7.6% higher than the year before.

Excluding the volatile auto, gasoline and building-materials sectors, retail sales rose a sluggish 0.4% in May, the third consecutive month at that pace. When stacked against recent readings on underlying inflation, "consumer spending is barely rising, which indicates that rising gasoline prices and lower consumer confidence is curbing discretionary consumer purchases," wrote Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. "While gasoline prices have leveled off thus far in June, the plunge in stock prices could be another negative holding down consumer spending this month."

After expanding at a 5.2% annual rate in the first quarter, consumer spending is widely forecast to slow to a 2% to 3% pace in the current quarter as consumers grapple with higher gas prices, rising interest rates and slower appreciation in housing prices. Yesterday's report was taken as confirmation of slower growth. Michael Moran, chief economist at Daiwa Securities America Inc., said "activity seems to have been dampened by high energy prices, but consumers remain active." (Japan may delay ending its zero interest-rate policy. Article on page A6.)

Meanwhile, the Labor Department reported that wholesale prices rose 0.2% in May after a 0.9% jump in April, and were 4.5% higher than a year ago. But strip out food and energy, and "core" producer prices rose 0.3% in May after increasing by 0.1% in each of the previous two months.

Several economists noted that producer prices tend to be volatile and often don't translate into higher prices for consumers. That showed up in the May numbers. The 0.2% increase in wholesale prices was far smaller than the 2% jump in the cost of oil and other raw materials, suggesting businesses often have little choice other than to absorb the higher costs.

Fletcher Steele, president of Pine Hall Brick Co., Winston-Salem, N.C., said the company raised prices 8% at the beginning of the year, but he doesn't believe his customers would tolerate another increase this year. "They've got projects started that they've locked in costs on. We need to give them several months' notice," Mr. Steele said. Meanwhile, the company is looking to save money by heating another one of its production facilities with sawdust instead of natural gas.

Nonetheless, economists said yesterday's reports, pointing to slower growth and somewhat heightened inflationary pressures, would make Federal Reserve policy makers more likely to raise the target for short-term interest rates when they meet later this month.

Retail Sales Fall Flat; Inflation News Mixed (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, June 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0033791

WASHINGTON — Wholesale inflation was mixed in May as overall price pressures eased, but a special measure closely watched by economists ticked up faster than expected, the government said Tuesday.

In addition, retail sales were basically flat during the month, rising 0.1% after a 0.8% reading in April. Consumers showed less appetite for expensive goods such as furniture and automobiles.

The reports appear to bolster Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's recent assessment that the economy is slowing from the breakneck pace of the first three months of the year, though not yet quickly enough to contain price pressures.

Several economists said the wholesale inflation data made it more likely that the central bank will decide to raise interest rates again when it meets June 28-29 in a bid to restrain price increases, though many are waiting for today's release of the government's consumer inflation numbers.

"Clearly … inflationary pressure is still present, and with the Fed governors and presidents wringing their hands over inflation, the market is getting another green light" for a June rate increase, says Jason Schenker of Wachovia.

The Fed has increased short-term interest rates 16 times since mid-2004, raising them from a low 1% to the current 5%. That, in turn, has increased the interest rate on mortgages and other loans. The balance the Fed is seeking is to raise rates to a level that tamps down inflation, without slowing the economy too much or too abruptly.

The Labor Department said Tuesday that its producer price index, which measures wholesale prices, rose 0.2% in May, less than the 0.9% advance in April. The index was helped by a smaller increase in energy prices, though wholesale prices are still up more than 4% from a year ago. A separate measure of core wholesale inflation, which doesn't include food and energy, showed prices rose 0.3% in May — the biggest increase since February.

Further, there were substantial price pressures earlier in the production chain, with core prices for intermediate goods rising 1.1% during the month, and core prices for crude goods up 6.2%.

Moody's Economy.com said in a note to clients that manufacturers have been able to avoid passing on higher energy costs, but noted that with profits starting to level off and wage pressures building, there is increasing risk producers will pass on higher costs.

Carl Steidtmann, chief economist of Deloitte Touche, said one month of sluggish retail sales doesn't necessarily spell a trend, but he adds that Deloitte's own index of consumer spending also points to a slowing.

Core Producer Prices Rise A Little More Than Forecast (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

Higher prices at the manufacturing level helped push overall prices of wholesale goods higher in May, the Labor Department reported yesterday. At the same time, the government said that retail sales were essentially flat in the latest set of economic data to suggest that inflation is creeping higher and the economy is slowing down.

While wholesale prices declined in certain categories like produce, alcoholic beverages and automobiles, they rose elsewhere, resulting in a net price gain for the month. Producers charged more in May for consumer goods like jewelry, drugs and detergents. And the price of many products used in the manufacturing process, like softwood lumber, wiring and processed steel, rose considerably.

Over all, the Producer Price Index rose 0.2 percent in May after posting sharper increases in April and March. But the so-called core rate, which excludes food and energy prices, rose 0.3 percent, compared with 0.1 percent increases the previous two months. That surprised economists, who were expecting a rise of 0.2 percent.

Separately, the Commerce Department reported that retail sales ticked up 0.1 percent in May, compared with a 0.8 percent increase in April.

"Economic activity is doing exactly what the Fed expected," said Kenneth J. McCarthy, chief economist at vFinance Investments. "It's slowing down. It's being influenced by higher energy prices, interest rates and a slowing housing market."

Economic indicators like the Producer Price Index and the retail sales report have taken on added significance ahead of the Federal Reserve meeting at the end of this month. The Fed's policy makers will decide whether to raise short-term interest rates for the 17th time since June 2004, and several Fed governors have said lately that they are concerned about accelerating inflation.

But with many economists of the belief that another rate increase is a foregone conclusion and with overall inflation still relatively low, the slight bump in the price data raised few eyebrows yesterday.

"No alarm bells were set off by today's report," Kenneth Beauchemin, an economist with Global Insight, said. "The increase of the core inflation rate is a slight concern. However, any one month's change has to be discounted somewhat because monthly changes in producer prices are relatively noisy."

DOJ_NMG_0033792

On Wall Street, stocks closed lower yesterday, but the losses were more moderate than on Monday. These followed steep losses in Asian markets. The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note was slightly higher.

Anxiety over another rate increase has helped push stocks down sharply worldwide as investors fear that the higher rates will dampen stock market activity.

Yesterday's report on the Producer Price Index was the first of two major reports on inflation this week. This morning, the Labor Department will report the Consumer Price Index for May, which measures inflation at the retail level and is considered to be a better indicator of the direction of prices.

Most economists will be looking to those figures to see whether inflation is accelerating at a troubling pace.

"On the margin, you've got slightly higher numbers on the core than expected," said James O'Sullivan, an economist with UBS. "But it really wasn't that big of a deal. There's really a lot more focus on the consumer number."

The price report also showed that increases for energy eased last month. Wholesale gasoline prices rose 2.2 percent, after a 12.3 percent jump in April and a 9.1 percent jump in March. The price of heating oil also rose at a much slower rate.

But the numbers suggest that price pressure at the consumer level could accelerate in the coming months. As the price of goods on the production chain rise, those costs are passed along to wholesalers and eventually consumers.

Last month's jump in the prices of goods used in manufacturing like lumber and processed steel "suggests growing inflationary pressures in the production pipeline that could ultimately make their way into prices for final goods," Stuart G. Hoffman and Richard F. Moody, economists at PNC Financial, said in a research note to clients.

Although the price of automobiles fell 0.4 percent in May, that hardly helped sales. Overall retail sales rose 0.1 percent in May, but excluding autos, the increase was 0.5 percent. Auto sales fell 1.6 percent compared with April.

Retail sales by grocery stores in May were up, as were sales at gasoline stations, which rose 1.9 percent for the month and 21.9 percent for the preceding 12 months, reflecting the higher cost of fuel.

The Mark Of The Bust (NYT)

By Martin Mayer

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WHAT may be the most important number in the American panoply of economic statistics appears every Thursday night as an appendix to the weekly statement of the condition of the Federal Reserve System. This generally ignored number — few, if any, newspapers cover its release — has the unusual virtue of accuracy, for it is a simple financial statement derived from an adding machine, not from a computer or a formula.

What the number announces is the quantity of government and agency securities held "for foreign official and international accounts" — that is, for foreign central banks and finance ministries — by the federal reserve banks. It is important because over time it measures the demand for American assets by private enterprise in the world's creditor nations. It is important also because it is very large — last week, about $1.63 trillion. Three years ago, just before the invasion of Iraq, it was about $900 billion. The week George W. Bush took office, it was $693 billion.

Our appetite for imported goods throws some $600 billion to $700 billion a year into the hands of foreign suppliers. The businesses that receive these dollars have two fundamental choices about what to do with them: spend or invest them in the United States, or convert them into their own local currency.

Exporters to America who keep the dollars and use them for American purchases and investments create what economists call an autonomous flow of funds back to the United States, financing the American trade deficit with an American investment surplus.

This produces the argument most closely associated with the new Federal Reserve chairman, Ben Bernanke (though Alan Greenspan believed it, too), that our trade deficit is caused by a surplus of savings that can't be profitably invested in the home countries of our trading partners. Financing for our trade deficit comes before — and actually causes — the deficit itself.

If instead of investing their dollars in the United States, foreign exporters want to take the proceeds of their sales in their own currency, their central banks will in effect sell them that currency for their dollars. Back in the late 1960's, when Great Society deficits and the Vietnam War prompted the first serious sell-off of dollars (and forced the United States to abandon the gold standard because too many holders of dollars, led by President Charles de Gaulle of France, wanted gold), those central banks lent those dollars into the new Eurodollar market, where they traded somewhat separately from domestic dollars.

This created a nightmarish prospect of the United States losing control of its own currency, and in 1971 the Fed chairman, Arthur Burns, negotiated a deal with the European and Japanese central banks. The deal was that they would return to America the dollars they acquired in their own economies, and the Fed would invest the money on their behalf, in absolutely safe government securities, without charge and at the best rates.

DOJ_NMG_0033793

Today, the Fed continues as custodian of the "foreign official holdings" of such government obligations. During the Clinton administration, the Fed agreed to invest in federally guaranteed housing securities for those foreign central banks that wanted a better yield on their dollar reserves than they would get from government bonds, and now more than half a trillion dollars of the total official holdings are invested in agency paper. Foreign official holdings of government paper is a miner's canary number. It tells you if there is big trouble ahead. The most common worry is that the number will shrink suddenly, with foreign governments dumping their dollar holdings, driving down the dollar's value and driving up American interest rates, but that's not a real danger. If the price of our government securities dived, the foreign central banks would have to bear the loss. This would be a budget item for their governments, whose leaders would not like it at all.

What we have to watch out for is a sudden and drastic increase in foreign official holdings. Rapid growth in this number in the late 1960's and 1970's forecast the recessions of the early 1970's and 1980's, and it could happen again.

Recent large increases in foreign official holdings indicate that foreign private investors see fewer attractive places to put their money in the American economy. They could presage a significant fall in the price of American assets, stocks (witness the recent drops in American stock markets) and bonds and real estate and all, and a hard landing for a world economy still floating on the crest of cheap credit.

Martin Mayer, a guest scholar at the Brookings Institution, is the author of "The Fate of the Dollar."

From Sizzle To Fizzle For Investors (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 14, 2006

Stocks and commodities tumbled worldwide Tuesday as investors grew increasingly concerned that rising interest rates could hurt global economies and crimp demand for everything from industrial materials to precious metals.

The Dow Jones industrial average sank 86 points to 10,706, which left it with a 0.1% 2006 loss little more than a month after it was up 8.6% for 2006 (story, 4B).

That's typical of the reversal of fortunes being felt by investors around the world for the same reason. “It's clear central bankers in the U.S. and across the global will slow economic growth,” says Stan Shipley of International Strategy & Investment. “Global interest rates are on the rise.” That is causing a flood of money out of what were once 2006's hot investments:

•Commodities. Gold fell $44.30, or 7.3%, to $562.50 an ounce, which Bloomberg News says was its biggest drop in 15 years. Gold is 20% below its high of a month ago. Other metals fell more: Silver lost 13.0% and palladium, a metal used in jewelry and industry, 12.5%. Silver is off 35% from its 2006 high and palladium 32%.

•Major foreign markets. The Tokyo stock market suffered its biggest drop in two years, as its Nikkei average plunged 4.1%. It's down 19% since its 2006 peak in April. The broad iShares Standard & Poor's Europe 350 exchange-traded fund suffered a 2.7% loss and is off 14% from its early May high.

Alan Skrainka, strategist at Edward Jones, says European investors are worried about the fallout from a slowing U.S. economy. “When the U.S. was growing at 5%, Europe grew at 1%,” he says. “If we slow to 3% — you do the math.”

•Emerging markets. White-hot emerging nations such as China, Brazil and India continue to suffer as investors look for safer bets, Skrainka says. The iShares MSCI Emerging markets ETF fell 2.2% Tuesday, leaving it 26% below its May high. Bombay's Sensex index dropped 4.4% Tuesday and is down 28% in the past month.

A slowing economy will have a direct impact on emerging markets that export the goods, says Jon Noonan, chief strategist at Appleton Partners. “If we get a consumer slowdown, it means that our trading partners will feel it,” he says.

The sell-offs, especially among commodities, are to be expected given the huge run earlier in the year, says Evan Smith of U.S. Global's Global Resources fund. “We're giving back the quick gains made not that long ago.”

And Fred Sturm, manager of the Ivy Global Natural Resources fund, says a pullback will help shake out people who had been speculating on commodities and move ownership from “short-term weak holders to those investors with long-term perspective.”

Tumbling Markets May Be Reflection Of Strong Growth (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

Global stock and commodity prices tumbled again, extending a rout that appears to defy -- but may simply highlight -- the strong pace of economic growth in much of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0033794

The Dow Jones Industrial Average of 30 major U.S. stocks lost 86.44 points, or 0.8%, to 10706.14, surrendering the last of the gains it scored earlier this year. In Japan, the world's second-largest economy, the Nikkei Stock Average shed 614.41, or 4.1%, to close at 14218.60, and other markets were down sharply.

Gold, which often moves in the opposite direction to stocks, also lost ground. The price of a troy ounce, which had recently crossed the $700 mark, dropped $44.30, or 7.3%, to close at $562.50, and the price of silver fell 13%.

Many economists now think the broad reversal in the prices of stocks, bonds and commodities like gold and silver is less a warning signal of an economic downturn than a consequence of the ratcheting up of interest rates by the world's central banks. Indeed, the central bankers' concern is the reverse of a slowdown: that growth may get too hot and could contribute to an upward spiraling of prices -- or inflation.

By raising interest rates, they are making money more "expensive" to borrow and spend, stemming a tide of cheap money that has buoyed the prices of everything from U.S. Treasury bonds to Japanese stocks in recent years. That is tough on investors, because when easy money disappears, asset prices often fall precipitously, and financial bubbles tend to burst.

In Turkey, where stock and bond prices have been battered, Tim Adams, U.S. Treasury undersecretary for international affairs, yesterday offered that analysis, attributing the turmoil more to the end of easy money -- also known as liquidity -- than to the outlook for Turkey's economy.

"We're in a global transition from an era of benign economic conditions and tremendous amount of liquidity sloshing around the world to one in which...central banks are draining some of that liquidity out of the system," he said. "But the underlying fundamentals here are pretty good."

That isn't to say the market turmoil won't be painful. "The fact that we're still in the thick of a global expansion does not mean that we can't have a financial crisis," says Kenneth Rogoff, an economics professor at Harvard University. "Rising interest rates are going to expose some problems."

Scattered minicrises are already unfolding as investors shift their money away from riskier investments. Earlier this year, Iceland and New Zealand both saw their currencies plunge as foreign investors pulled out of high-yielding local-currency bonds. More recently, investors have dumped everything from junk bonds to Russian, Colombian and Japanese stocks. Yesterday, Russia's RTS Index dropped 10.5% and Colombia's stock market slid 9%.

By contrast, the global economy looks poised for a period of more-balanced growth after several years of depending heavily on the free-spending U.S. consumer. Most economists expect the U.S. economy, which spurted ahead at a 5.3% annual rate in the first quarter and now enjoys a low 4.6% unemployment rate, to slow -- to a 3% pace -- as consumer spending tapers off and the Federal Reserve's steady increases in short-term interest rates start to bite. Europe, Japan and emerging economies appear on track to pick up some of the slack. Earlier this week, for example, Japan raised its estimate of annualized first-quarter economic growth, adjusted for inflation, to 3.1% from 1.9%.

In its April economic outlook, the International Monetary Fund forecast world economic growth at an inflation-adjusted 4.9% for 2006 and 4.7% in 2007. The forecast indicates that for the four years ending in 2007, growth will average 4.93%, the highest sustained rate since 1973. The IMF expects only three of the 180 economies it tracks -- Zimbabwe, Equatorial Guinea and the Seychelles -- to contract in 2006. That would be the lowest number since at least 1980.

Gerd Hausler, director of international capital markets at the IMF, said the recent market volatility hadn't materially changed the fund's forecast. "I think that the prospect of a global economy where the engines of growth are more evenly balanced compared to what we've seen in the recent past should be a source of comfort," he said.

Central banks calibrate their moves to keep the global economy in balance by curbing the inflation that can result if economies grow too fast. Recent data have shown inflation pressures building in the U.S. and Europe, and reappearing in Japan after many years of falling prices.

Federal Reserve officials, including Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, have said in recent days that they will take a hard line on inflation. Markets have taken that to mean they will raise their target for U.S. short-term interest rates to 5.25% from the current 5% at their next policy-making meeting June 28-29. Last week, the European Central Bank raised its short-term rate to 2.75% from 2.5%, and left open the possibility of further increases. Economists expect Japan's central bank to raise its rate from zero later this year.

Taken together, the central banks' moves drastically change the landscape for investors. For one thing, higher interest rates make the dollar a year or 10 years from now worth less today. So even if the economy looks good, and assets such as stocks and bonds are expected to keep making the same dividend and interest payments in the years to come, the present value of that future income falls.

Moreover, when interest rates rise, it becomes more expensive for investors to increase their returns by using borrowed money -- a strategy known as leverage.

DOJ_NMG_0033795

When investors are used to years of low interest rates and cheap money, as they have been until lately, it can take them a while to adjust to the new reality. When they do, prices tend to move quickly. The stock-market crash of 1987, the bursting of the Japanese real-estate bubble in the early 1990s, the Asian financial crisis of 1997 and the Nasdaq meltdown of 2000 all occurred when central banks were raising interest rates.

"The market has to learn again what it means for a central bank to tighten," says Peter Fisher, chairman of money manager BlackRock Asia and a former Fed and Treasury official. As to how investors' changing attitude toward risk will manifest itself this time, "I don't think we know," he said. "Clearly the first accident has been in emerging-markets exposure."

The prevalence of hedge funds and other sophisticated investors in today's financial markets could make those markets more sensitive to the type of risks that appear when central banks take away easy money. That is because many hedge funds' strategies depend on the prices of different investments moving in different directions -- if the fund incurs losses on one, it gains on the other. When financial crises occur, the prices of all assets tend to act in highly unusual ways, confounding the funds' strategies. That, for example, is how the Russian debt crisis in 1998 triggered the downfall of hedge fund Long Term Capital Management.

"These types of events happen every blue moon," says Carlos Asilis, a Miami-based portfolio manager for hedge fund Vega Plus Capital Partners, which has $2 billion under management. "It's hard to model them and it's hard to hedge against them. The best action in this type of market environment is to reduce risks and wait for things to calm down."

To be sure, the march toward higher interest rates could also have an adverse effect on the global economy. Economists and investors in the U.S. and Europe have expressed concerns that central bankers could take rates too high, tipping their economies into recession. That concern is evident in the market for U.S. Treasury bonds, where the yield on two-year notes has risen above the yield on 10-year notes -- an event called a yield-curve inversion that has often, but not always, preceded economic downturns.

Some investors, however, see the central banks' moves as just the right medicine, both for the world economy and for financial markets that had lost their sense of risk. "It's tough love," said Michael Litt, a portfolio manager at Greenwich, Conn.-based asset-management firm FrontPoint Partners LLC. "It feels bad now, but it's very good in the medium and long term."

The 'Noisy Market' Hypothesis (WSJ)

By Jeremy J. Siegel

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

Although the price-weighted Dow Jones Industrial Average approached its all-time high in early May, the large capitalization-weighted indexes -- such as the S&P 500 or the Russell 3000 -- in which most investors hold their "indexed" investments are still substantially below their tech-bloated peaks reached in March 2000. Those of us who have linked our portfolio returns to these popular indexes wonder whether there is a better way to capture the market's return without enduring the wild swings that characterized the last bubble.

Don't get me wrong. Capitalization-weighted indexation has been one of the great innovations in the last quarter-century. It has allowed millions of investors to capture the return on the market at a very small cost, and has outperformed most actively managed mutual funds. The $5 trillion invested in portfolios tracking cap-weighted indexes speaks to its popularity.

But we are on the verge of a revolution: New research demonstrates that it is possible to construct broad-based indexes offering investors better returns and lower volatility than capitalization-weighted indexes. These indexes are weighted by fundamental measures of firm value, such as sales or dividends, instead of allowing the market price alone to dictate how much of each firm should be included in the index.

Strong Appeal

The vast majority of indexes, with the exception of the Dow Jones Averages, are capitalization-weighted. This means that the weight of each stock in the index is proportional to the total market value of its shares. This methodology has strong appeal since the return on these indexes represents the aggregate or "average" return to all shareholders.

Strong support for these indexes also emanates from the academic community. The philosophical foundation of these indexes is the "efficient market hypothesis," which assumes that the price of each stock at every point in time represents the best, unbiased estimate of the true underlying value of the firm.

The efficient market hypothesis does not say a stock's price is always equal to its fundamental value. But the theory implies it is impossible to tell which stocks are undervalued and which are overvalued without either costly analysis or an innate skill possessed only by a chosen few, such as Warren Buffett, Peter Lynch or Bill Miller.

It can be shown that under standard portfolio models, if stocks are priced according to the efficient market hypothesis, then capitalization-weighted indexes offer investors the best risk-return combination. And there is no doubt that capitalization-weighted portfolios have performed very well for investors. Research conducted by Jack Bogle, Charles Ellis, Burton Malkiel and myself has undeniably shown that active mutual fund managers fail, after fees, to keep pace with the market indexes.

DOJ_NMG_0033796

But as indexed investing gained adherents, cracks were found in the efficient market hypothesis. In the early 1980s, Rolf Banz and Don Keim showed that small stocks earned an outsized return compared to their risks. And, earlier, Sanjoy Basu and David Dreman discovered that stocks with low price-to-earnings ratios had significantly higher returns than stocks with high P/E ratios; small stocks with low P/E ratios (small value stocks) enjoyed particularly outstanding returns. The magnitude of these size- and value-based returns could not be rationalized using the standard asset pricing models of the efficient market hypothesis.

This caused schizophrenia in the financial community. Efficient-market believers still dominate the field of financial research, but many practitioners, including moonlighting academics, recommend that investors overweight value and small stocks in their portfolios. Eugene Fama from the University of Chicago and Ken French from Dartmouth's Tuck School built a very successful investment firm based on slicing the universe of stocks into value- and size-based sectors to market to large individual and institutional investors.

Since the 1980s, the finance profession has searched in vain for the reason why small and value stocks outperformed the market. Efficient-market diehards maintain these stocks contain deeply buried risk hidden in the historical data. They predict that one day, when a crisis hits and investors critically need to liquidate their portfolios, small and value-based stocks will crumble while large growth stocks will shine.

But if this is true, the data are unfortunately moving in the wrong direction. In the past decade we witnessed a huge tech bubble, 9/11, a recession, major corporate scandals and wars in Afghanistan and Iraq -- yet not only did small and value stocks survive, they outperformed the big cap, high-priced stocks by wider margins than they had in the past.

Current attempts to explain the hidden risks in value stocks remind me of the astronomers in the 16th century who attempted to save the earth-centered Ptolemaic view of the universe. They were forced to add complicated "epicycles" to the orbits of the planets to rationalize their movements in the evening sky; the model collapsed when Copernicus showed that a simple sun-centered solar system was an easier explanation. As with Copernicus, there is now a new paradigm for understanding how markets work that can explain why small stocks and value stocks outperform capitalization-weighted indexes.

This new paradigm claims that the prices of securities are not always the best estimate of the true underlying value of the firm. It argues that prices can be influenced by speculators and momentum traders, as well as by insiders and institutions that often buy and sell stocks for reasons unrelated to fundamental value, such as for diversification, liquidity and taxes. In other words, prices of securities are subject to temporary shocks that I call "noise" that obscures their true value. These temporary shocks may last for days or for years, and their unpredictability makes it difficult to design a trading strategy that consistently produces superior returns. To distinguish this paradigm from the reigning efficient market hypothesis, I call it the "noisy market hypothesis." * * *

The noisy market hypothesis easily explains the size and value anomalies. If a stock price falls for reasons unrelated to the changes in the fundamental value, then it is likely -- but not certain -- that overweighting such a stock will yield better than normal returns. On the other hand, stocks that rise in price more than their fundamentals become "large stocks" with high P/E ratios that are likely to underperform.

These discrepancies are not easy to arbitrage away on a stock-by-stock basis. The noisy market hypothesis does not say that every stock that changes price does so by more than what is justified by fundamentals. Any particular stock may still be undervalued when it moves up in price or overvalued when it moves down.

New research indicates that there is a simple way that investors can capture these mispricings and achieve returns superior to capitalization-weighted indexes. This is through a strategy called "fundamental indexation." Fundamental indexation means that each stock in a portfolio is weighted not by its market capitalization, but by some fundamental metric, such as aggregate sales or aggregate dividends. Like capitalization-weighted indexes, fundamental indexes involve no security analysis but must be rebalanced periodically by purchasing more shares of firms whose price has gone down more than a fundamental metric, such as sales, and selling shares in those firms whose price has risen more than the fundamental metric.

Robert Arnott, editor of the Financial Analysts Journal and chairman of Research Affiliates, LLC, has published research documenting both the theoretical and historical superiority of fundamentally weighted indexes. It can be rigorously proved that if stock prices are subject to noise, then capitalization-weighted indexes will offer investors risk-and-return characteristics that are inferior to those of fundamentally weighted indexes.

I have long advocated the use of dividends in evaluating stocks. Dividends are the only fundamental variable that is completely objective, transparent and unable to be manipulated by managers who tinker with accounting assumptions. (In the interest of full disclosure, I am an adviser to a company that develops and sponsors dividend-based indexes and products.)

DOJ_NMG_0033797

According to my research, dividend-weighted indexes outperform capitalization-weighted indexes and are particularly valuable at withstanding bear markets. For example, the Russell 3000 Index lost almost 50% of its value between the bull market peak of March 2000 and the October 2002 low. Over this same period, a comparable total market dividend-weighted index was virtually unchanged. A dividend weighted index did have a bear market, but it only corrected by 20%. Moreover, the dividend-weighted index bear market didn't start until March 2002, and it lasted only six months (compared to 24 months for the cap-weighted index). The dividend-weighted index is now about 40% above its March 2000 close, whereas the S&P 500 and Russell 3000 are still not yet back to even. A similar performance occurred in other bear markets.

The historical data make an extremely persuasive case for fundamental indexing. From 1964 through 2005, a total market dividend-weighted index of all U.S. stocks outperformed a capitalization-weighted total market index by 123 basis points a year and did so with lower volatility. The data indicate that the outperformance by fundamentally weighted indexes during the same period is even greater among mid-sized and small stocks.

'Value Cuts'

Furthermore, dividend-weighted indexes had better risk and return characteristics than capitalization weighted indexes in each industrial sector and each country that I analyzed. Dividend-weighted indexes even outperformed "value cuts" of the popular capitalization-weighted indexes such as the Russell Value and Barra-S&P Value that attempt to choose those stocks whose prices are low relative to fundamentals.

With the advent of fundamental indexes, we're at the brink of a huge paradigm shift. The chinks in the armor of the efficient market hypothesis have grown too large to be ignored. No longer can advisers claim that capitalization-weighted indexes afford investors the best risk and return tradeoff. The noisy market hypothesis, which makes the simple yet convincing claim that the prices of securities often change in ways that are unrelated to fundamentals, is a much better description of reality and offers a simple explanation for why value-based investing beats the market.

If you are a fan of indexing, as I and so many other investors are, you are no longer trapped in capitalization-weighted indexes which overweight overvalued stocks and underweight undervalued stocks. Devotees of value investing who are searching for a simple, low-cost indexed portfolio in which to hold their stocks need wait no longer. Fundamentally weighted indexes are the next wave of investing.

Mr. Siegel, the Russell E. Palmer Professor of Finance at Wharton, is senior investment strategy adviser to WisdomTree Asset Management, Inc. This concludes a two-part series.

Global Capital On The Run (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

It is too early to say whether the recent declines in global stock markets signal anything out of the ordinary. Though large, they are hardly unprecedented: 8 percent for the Dow, 19 percent for Japan's Nikkei, 21.7 percent for Brazil's Bovespa (all changes are measured from recent highs, in April or May, until yesterday's closes). But the fact that they've occurred simultaneously suggests herd behavior. Spoiled by years of cheap credit, global investors seem to be reacting to the prospect of higher interest rates by fleeing stock markets almost everywhere. There is danger of a broader financial and economic setback.

The riskiest and most mysterious aspect of the present situation is the increasingly global nature of investment capital. Once, capital was largely compartmentalized by nation. Americans saved and invested in the United States; Germans saved and invested in Germany. This world is disappearing. It is now routine for pension funds, mutual funds and many wealthy investors to move money in and out of American, European, Asian and Latin American stocks and bonds.

The magnitudes are immense. For 2004 the International Monetary Fund reports that:

Â· Americans invested $856 billion abroad, while foreigners invested $1.44 trillion in the United States. Some flows represented "foreign direct investment": buying factories, real estate or entire companies. But most flows involved corporate stocks and bonds, government bonds or international bank loans.

Â· The Japanese invested $414 billion abroad, and foreigners invested $273 billion in Japan.

Â· "Emerging market" countries (China, India, Brazil and many developing nations) received $570 billion in foreign investment and made $935 billion of investments abroad. About $515 billion of the outflow came from governments -- dominated by China and other Asian nations -- that reinvested their trade surpluses, often in U.S. Treasury bonds.

Thirty years ago, these massive global money movements didn't exist. Most countries had extensive "capital controls" restricting how much (or whether) their citizens could invest abroad and how much (or whether) foreigners could invest in their countries. The United States was a major exception.

DOJ_NMG_0033798

A turning point was France's decision in the early 1980s to relax controls, says Rawi Abdelal of the Harvard Business School and author of the forthcoming "Capital Rules: The Construction of Global Finance." The French concluded that controls were so widely evaded by the wealthy that they were impractical, he says. Once France changed, Europe moved to liberalize capital flows. Many other countries gradually joined for fear of losing in the worldwide chase for investment funds.

In theory, liberalization benefits everyone. Capital flows to the most productive investments. Savers earn higher returns. Countries with good investment opportunities expand more rapidly. Huge capital inflows have clearly helped China by financing new factories with modern technology. In many ways, the world economy seems healthy. In 2006, the IMF predicts the fourth consecutive year of growth exceeding 4 percent.

But there's a rub: Global finance has created new risks. At least two stand out.

First, huge trade imbalances. The United States is running massive deficits, counterbalanced by big surpluses in China, Japan and other Asian countries. These imbalances occur in part because countries with trade surpluses can recycle their export earnings -- heavily in dollars -- rather than buying imports or selling dollars for other currencies, leading to a dollar depreciation. That would lower the American trade deficit by making U.S. imports more expensive and U.S. exports less expensive. Most economists consider today's massive imbalances unsustainable.

Second, worldwide financial crises. Global investors may move in herds, first pouring money into some countries -- or investments -- and then withdrawing abruptly. That's what happened in the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis. Capital flight plunged countries into deep recessions; investors suffered large losses. There are now fears that hedge funds and others may be similarly overexposed in some markets. (Hedge funds are lightly regulated pools of money, mostly from big and wealthy investors. They are estimated to control more than $1 trillion in financial assets.) Some economists, most prominently Stephen Roach of Morgan Stanley, consider the recent stock market declines a healthy sign. They signal a retreat from blatantly speculative behavior. A prolonged period of cheap credit pushed too much money into risky investments. Some investors put money into emerging-market stocks and bonds; others preferred commodities (gold, copper). Housing was the small investor's favorite. The result: a series of "bubbles" that are best punctured sooner rather than later.

Roach welcomes higher interest rates. Last week the European Central Bank raised rates; so did government central banks in South Korea, South Africa, Turkey, Thailand and India. The Federal Reserve has been raising short-term rates since June 2004 and may do so again in late June. Sure, says Roach, stock, commodity and housing prices may weaken. Some investors will lose. But the damage to the "real economy" of production and jobs will be modest.

This seems plausible. But so is something more menacing. Losses in one market prompt investors to sell in others. Global investors influence local investors; any whiff of panic spreads. As stock markets and housing prices sag, consumer and business confidence ebb. Economies elsewhere that depend heavily on huge exports to the United States weaken. They can't generate stronger domestic spending. High oil prices hurt.

We really don't know much about the interconnectedness of global financial markets. The presumption that we do is just that -- a presumption. They are too new and changing too fast. We can see the promise and the peril, but we cannot know which will prevail.

Former Reagan Aide Wins Va. Senate Primary (AP-Y2)

By Bob Lewis

AP2, June 14, 2006

James Webb, a former Reagan administration Navy secretary who left the Republican Party over the Iraq war, won the Democratic nomination Tuesday for the right to take on GOP Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record) in the fall.

Webb defeated lobbyist and longtime Democratic Party activist Harris Miller after a bruising primary in which voters decided between a traditional and unabashed liberal (Miller) and a former Republican (Webb) whose populist campaign was aimed at so-called Reagan Democrats — namely, rural, white moderates.

With all but one precinct reporting, Webb had 83,156 votes, or 53.5 percent, compared with 72,352 votes, or 46.5 percent, for Miller. Except for the Washington suburbs, turnout was low across Virginia, a state unaccustomed to primaries. The last Democratic Senate primary was in 1994.

Allen is seeking a second term and also pursuing a 2008 bid for president. He had no GOP challenger.

Four other states also held elections Tuesday, including primaries for governor in Maine and South Carolina; a Democratic runoff for the nomination for lieutenant governor in Arkansas; and referendums on constitutional amendments in North Dakota.

Both Democratic candidates in Virginia sought to tie Allen tightly to Bush, particularly over Iraq. But Webb was seen by some as having particular credibility on military issues because of his background as a decorated Marine lieutenant in Vietnam and later Navy secretary. Webb, who endorsed Allen six years ago, underscored the point by campaigning in desert combat boots.

DOJ_NMG_0033799

"We need leadership that will not just follow an administration blindly, but is capable of independent thought," Webb told supporters Tuesday night in Arlington.

Webb, 60, referred to Miller in a televised debate as "the anti-Christ of outsourcing," claiming that Miller, as a lobbyist for a major Internet-industry organization, helped drive technology jobs overseas. Also, a Webb flier contained a caricature of Miller with a hooked nose and cash spilling from his pockets. Miller, who is Jewish, called the brochure "despicable"; Webb said it was not anti-Semitic.

Webb's triumph was a victory for Senate Democratic leaders, many of whom either endorsed him or sent him campaign donations. Party strategists calculated that Webb offered the only chance to mount a credible challenge to Allen in the fall, when Democrats hope to win six seats to gain control of the Senate.

Webb said such support was key to his victory. "Everywhere I went, I had to face a room where people wondered if I really was a Democrat," he said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

Miller put nearly $1 million of his own money into the campaign and outspent Webb by more than a 2-to-1 ratio.

In South Carolina, Republican Gov. Mark Sanford easily defeated a political newcomer for the nomination for another term. In the Democratic primary, state Sen. Tommy Moore beat Florence Mayor Frank Willis.

The state's GOP primary for lieutenant governor was headed to a runoff between incumbent Andre Bauer and challenger Mike Campbell, the son of Carroll Campbell, a popular former governor. The race had been energized by news that Bauer at least twice avoided speeding tickets — once after he was caught going more than 100 mph.

In Maine, two little-known Democrats competed for the chance to take on two-term Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe (news, bio, voting record). The candidates were separated by less than 500 votes early Wednesday, and it was unclear when a winner would be determined. Snowe had no GOP challenger.

In the state's Republican primary for governor, Chandler Woodcock narrowly led fellow state Sen. Peter Mills. On the Democratic side, Gov. John Baldacci easily prevailed against a little-known computer specialist.

In Arkansas, former Clinton administration official Bill Halter defeated state Sen. Tim Wooldridge in a runoff to determine the Democratic nominee for lieutenant governor. Halter faces Republican state Sen. Jim Holt this fall.

In North Dakota, voters approved two constitutional amendments — one to remove gender, age and residency references in the constitution's definition of state militia, the other to give the Legislature more authority to regulate how corporate shareholders vote for boards of directors.

Webb Wins Democratic Primary For Senate (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

James H. Webb Jr., a Reagan Republican-turned-Democrat, defeated longtime party activist Harris N. Miller in the Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate in Virginia yesterday, according to unofficial election results.

With more than 99 percent of precincts reporting, Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, had 53 percent of the vote, while Mr. Miller garnered 47 percent, according to unofficial results posted on the Virginia State Board of Elections Web site.

Mr. Webb will face Republican incumbent Sen. George Allen, a possible presidential candidate in 2008 who has more than $7 million in his campaign war chest.

Last night, Mr. Webb told supporters gathered at the Hilton Crystal City Hotel at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport that voters want someone who is not going to follow the Bush administration "blindly" like Mr. Allen.

"I stand here today because you believed in a vision, not just my vision, a vision for this country," Mr. Webb told supporters after winning the party's nomination.

"Many of you called on me months ago because you wanted a leader to carry that vision to Washington. ... Too much was at stake, and the time had come to bring this country on a different course," he said. "That is a call I am glad I answered."

Meanwhile, Mr. Miller told supporters gathered at the Sheraton Premier Hotel at Tysons Corner to back Mr. Webb and focus on unseating the politically tested Mr. Allen.

"Jim Webb is going to be a great United States senator, and I am going to help him beat George Allen," Mr. Miller said.

Political observers said the race between Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen will be interesting to follow.

"That could be a knock-down, dirty fight," said Toni-Michelle Travis, a political science professor at George Mason University. "Webb is somebody that has those military credentials that could really put Allen in his place."

DOJ_NMG_0033800

Except for the D.C. suburbs, turnout was paltry across Virginia, a state unaccustomed to primaries. The last Democratic Senate primary was in 1994. An estimated 3.4 percent of the state's 4.5 million registered voters voted in the primary for the Senate.

In other primaries in the state yesterday, Republican Tom M. O'Donoghue beat challenger Mark. W. Ellmore in the 8th District Republican primary. Mr. O'Donoghue had 69 percent of the vote to Mr. Ellmore's 31 percent, early returns showed. The winner will challenge eight-term Rep. James P. Moran in November.

Democrat Andrew L. Hurst defeated challenger Ken Longmyer in the 11th District for their party's nomination to run against Republican Rep. Thomas M. Davis III. Mr. Hurst had 55 percent of the vote to Mr. Longmyer's 45 percent, unofficial results show.

The campaign between Mr. Webb and Mr. Miller heated up last month, when Mr. Miller, 54, a former president of the Information Technology Association of America, and Mr. Webb, 60, a best-selling author who earned the Navy Cross, the Silver Star, two Bronze Stars and two Purple Hearts in Vietnam, began trading barbs about each other's loyalty to the Democratic Party.

Mr. Miller, a McLean resident and former chairman of the Fairfax County Democratic Party, railed against Mr. Webb for supporting President Bush and Mr. Allen in 2000, and repeatedly criticizing former President Clinton.

Mr. Webb, a Falls Church resident, retaliated by knocking Mr. Miller for contributing more than $5,500 to Republicans in Congress, including House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, when he worked as a lobbyist on Capitol Hill.

They also jockeyed for political endorsements, which stressed a local versus national split in the Democratic Party that more often than not put ideologues behind Mr. Miller, the conventional Democrat, and the "anyone but Allen" pragmatists behind Mr. Webb.

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat, helped both candidates raise more than $220,000.

Both painted Mr. Allen as political lackey who voted 97 percent of the time with Mr. Bush. They said Mr. Allen rubber-stamped failed policies that caused the national debt to balloon, led to the deaths of U.S. troops in the Iraq war and caused the president's job-approval ratings to plunge.

They also said Mr. Allen was more concerned with campaigning across the country for a presidential bid than representing Virginians on Capitol Hill. Both said they supported civil unions for homosexuals.

Mr. Webb's campaign centered on foreign policy and national security issues. He touted his early public opposition to the war in Iraq as an example of the leadership he could bring.

Mr. Miller called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a higher minimum wage and stiffer sanctions, including jail time, for employers who hire illegal aliens.

Virginia Democrats Back Ex-Navy Secretary In Senate Race (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — James Webb won the Democratic Senate nomination in Virginia on Tuesday night, securing his role as the challenger to the incumbent Republican, George Allen, in this fall's midterm election.

With all but one precinct reporting, Mr. Webb, a former Republican who served as Navy secretary during the Reagan administration, had 83,002 votes, or 53 percent. His opponent in the primary election, Harris Miller, a former lobbyist who spent about $1 million of his own money on the race, had 72,263 votes, or 46 percent.

National Democratic Party leaders had pinned their hopes on Mr. Webb as the more viable challenger to Mr. Allen, a popular incumbent who is also considered a potential 2008 presidential candidate.

Indeed, the primary played out against the backdrop of the next presidential race. Both Mr. Webb and Mr. Miller began their campaigns after Mark Warner, the former Democratic Virginia governor and a potential presidential contender, decided not to challenge Mr. Allen. And in the final hours of the race, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004 and another possible candidate in 2008, appeared with Mr. Webb.

With a campaign slogan — "Born Fighting" — that emphasized his independence and his national security experience, Mr. Webb had come under fire from his opponent as having dubious Democratic credentials. Mr. Miller, a party stalwart well known in heavily Democratic Northern Virginia, had repeatedly campaigned on the fact that Mr. Webb had endorsed both Mr. Allen and President Bush in 2000.

Mr. Webb had campaigned against Mr. Miller for his liberal spending on the race, at one point distributing fliers that showed Mr. Miller with money flowing from his pockets and a hooked nose. Mr. Miller, who is Jewish, denounced the image as anti-Semitic; Mr. Webb denied intending a slur.

DOJ_NMG_0033801

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and a champion of Mr. Webb's, credited his independent streak and his aggressive campaigning for the victory.

"People wanted a candidate who spoke his mind, who said what he thought, who was going to shake Washington up," Mr. Schumer said in an interview after the election results were in. "I think this is going to be quite an interesting race."

Mr. Schumer said that with Mr. Webb's victory, he expected the Virginia race to become more competitive and to put the balance of the Senate into play.

"I think people want change, and George Allen has been part of the status quo," Mr. Schumer said.

Dick Wadhams, the campaign manager for Mr. Allen, said, "We hope that Senator Schumer and John Kerry and Tom Daschle and Harry Reid campaign all day every day in Virginia for Jim Webb."

Mr. Allen, a former Virginia governor and the son of a renowned coach of the Washington Redskins, was first elected in 2000.

Webb Wins Democratic Nomination In Virginia (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Virginia Democrats yesterday chose Vietnam War hero James Webb to challenge Sen. George Allen (R), siding with their party's national leadership, which had declared the former Republican to be the only candidate with a chance to beat Allen in November.

Webb's support from Democratic senators such as 2004 presidential nominee John F. Kerry (Mass.) swamped the textbook campaign of his opponent, former lobbyist Harris Miller, who used $1 million of his own money to question Webb's commitment to the Democratic Party's core principles.

In other primaries, Democrat Andrew Hurst, a lawyer, defeated Ken Longmyer, a retired Foreign Service officer, for the chance to run against Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R) in the Nov. 7 general election. Republican Tom O'Donoghue, a military veteran, beat Mark Ellmore, a mortgage broker, and will run against Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D).

Webb, who was outspent 3 to 1, tapped into national anger over the Iraq war and a desire among Democrats to reach out to moderates who have drifted to the Republican Party over social issues and national security. Webb captured almost two-thirds of the vote across the populous suburban counties in Northern Virginia.

"In too many cases, our leaders are not equal to the challenges they face," Webb said to a screaming crowd at the Crystal City Hilton as he accepted the nomination and promised new leadership in Washington. To Allen, he said: "I wonder, George, what leadership? It's not leadership to follow this administration blindly 97 percent of the time."

The springtime squabble between Democrats produced a near-record low turnout that a state election official described as "dismal." Polling places across Virginia reported being empty for long stretches, even though voting was open to all of the state's 4.5 million registered voters.

Webb now faces the challenge of raising millions of dollars in an attempt to oust Allen, a popular ex-governor who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008. Allen has more than $7.5 million in the bank and a long history of winning in a state that usually votes for Republicans in federal contests.

Allen, the son of a beloved Washington Redskins coach by the same name, became a darling among conservatives as governor in the mid-1990s, when he abolished parole, toughened education standards and changed the welfare system. He left office in 1997 with strong approval ratings and beat incumbent Charles S. Robb (D) in the 2000 Senate race.

Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said the Republicans look forward to running against a "very fractured, divided Democratic Party" and "having John Kerry . . . campaign with Mr. Webb."

But Allen is running for reelection in the midst of national frustration with congressional corruption scandals, the war in Iraq and rising gas prices. Webb vowed to make Allen answer for those issues as an insider and a Bush administration loyalist.

It was just that contrast that national Democratic leaders hoped to stoke. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said Webb made a powerful connection with voters.

"He's an original, and that makes a difference to people," Schumer said after Webb's victory.

Miller campaigned on the strength of his 30-year ties to Virginia's Democratic establishment. In his concession speech just after 9 p.m., Miller congratulated Webb and promised to support the party's efforts to defeat Allen.

"Let me tell you what George Allen's worst nightmare is: a unified Democratic Party," Miller told the crowd gathered last night at the Sheraton Premiere Tysons Corner hotel. "The Democratic Party is stronger tonight because of this contest."

DOJ_NMG_0033802

Webb was a halting, unpolished candidate, never having run for public office. But his rÃ©sumÃ© as a former Republican and an early critic of the Iraq war appeared to be as tantalizing to the state's rank-and-file Democrats as it was to the party's national leaders.

"I think he can give Allen a run for his money," said Harry Massey, 50, of Baileys Crossroads, who works for a trade organization in Rosslyn. "He's pro-choice. He's antiwar. And he is certainly more receptive to the downstate voters."

Others disagreed.

"Miller seems like a centrist, and that's the way Virginia Democrats can win," said Brenna Copeland, 30, who cast her ballot at the Lyon Park Community Center before heading to work.

Election officials said just over 3 percent of voters went to the polls, far less than the 16 percent who voted in the 1996 primary between Republican Sen. John W. Warner and former Reagan budget director James C. Miller III.

"I just don't understand," said Jean Jensen, secretary of the state Board of Elections. "It's dismal. It's not even very high in Fairfax County," where both candidates live.

Democrats first turned to Miller after Mark R. Warner (D) decided to build on his popularity upon leaving the governor's office to pursue the White House rather than to oppose Allen. Warner urged Miller, a longtime friend, to run.

But what initially seemed like a clear path to the nomination became muddied for Miller in February, when Webb indicated that he would take a break from his lucrative writing career to seek the nomination.

"I don't wake up in the morning wanting to be a U.S. senator," Webb said at the time. "I wake up every morning very concerned about the country. We need to put some focus back in our foreign policy, a different focus."

His decision sparked a brief but fierce fight within Virginia's Democratic Party. For three months, party traditionalists who backed Miller clashed with young and passionately antiwar bloggers, who had helped to persuade Webb to jump into the Senate race.

The contest also divided many of the state's power brokers and political leaders -- who backed Miller early -- from their counterparts at the national level, who saw in Webb a war hero with an antiwar message that would be the perfect challenge to Allen's support for Bush.

"With Jim Webb as the Democratic nominee in Virginia, we have an opportunity to give George Allen a real run for his money," Schumer said.

From the beginning, though, Miller rejected the notion that Webb was more electable.

He quickly attacked Webb's longtime association with the GOP, contending that Webb was still a Republican at heart and questioning his dedication to Democratic principles. Miller repeatedly reminded voters that Webb endorsed Allen in 2000 over Robb and backed President Bush that year as well.

"When we were fighting in the trenches to defeat George Bush and George Allen in 2000, you weren't just voting for them; you were endorsing them," Miller said to Webb during a contentious debate on a Virginia Beach television show in May.

Miller also questioned Webb's commitment to traditional Democratic policies, such as affirmative action and support for women's rights. He pointed to some articles Webb has written, such as one in which Webb wrote that affirmative action has brought about "a permeating state-sponsored racism."

Webb strongly denied the contention that he opposes affirmative action, saying he supports the program for black people but takes issue with broader diversity efforts that do not offer preferential treatment for the economically disadvantaged.

Throughout the campaign, Miller was able to distribute his criticisms widely, thanks to a lead in fundraising that he never relinquished.

Webb fought back. The former Marine, who won several medals for valor during Vietnam, responded angrily during interviews and debates to the suggestion that he was not a legitimate Democrat.

Webb said he had "made a mistake" in supporting Allen and Bush in 2000 but realized it only after the Sept. 11 attacks and the decision to invade Iraq, which Webb criticized in a Washington Post opinion piece in 2002.

In the two Northern Virginia congressional primaries, the candidates also argued about who was best equipped to beat an entrenched incumbent.

Longmyer, 68, and Hurst, 36, spent much of their campaign criticizing the Bush administration. Longmyer, who has run against Davis before, said he had the experience to mount a successful campaign. Hurst said Longmyer has raised too little money in the past to be a serious challenger.

Ellmore and O'Donoghue focused their campaigns to oust Moran on border security and the need to stay the course in Iraq. Ellmore called himself the real conservative; O'Donoghue stressed his military background.

Webb Will Try To Turn Past GOP Loyalty Into Advantage (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0033803

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

For months, James Webb has dreaded the endless questions about his past support of Republican Sen. George Allen. But last night, after officially claiming the nomination to try to return that Virginia Senate seat to the Democratic Party, it was one of the first things Webb brought up.

"I supported George Allen six years ago because I thought he'd provide leadership," Webb told a cheering crowd in a Crystal City hotel. "I'm still waiting for the first concrete example."

With that, the man who cast his first vote for a Democratic presidential candidate only two years ago made it clear that, in the fall, he will try to turn to his advantage the positions and past alliances that dogged his primary campaign this spring.

He supported Allen and George W. Bush in 2000. He's proud of Ronald Reagan -- he was a prominent member of the administration -- and couldn't abide Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. He has questioned affirmative action and supports gun owners. But he also thinks that the war in Iraq was a mistake and that Congress is overwhelmed by special interests and doesn't do enough for the little guy. In all of these ways, he thinks he's like most Virginians.

His first appeal was to people like himself. "It's time to welcome home those Democrats who left for a time, the Reagan Democrats, the conservative Democrats, whatever labels we give them," Webb said. "It's time to welcome them home."

They may be the ones who can deliver Webb to the Senate in the fall, but they are not the ones who gave him his victory yesterday. Although Webb has portrayed himself as the candidate who will appeal to conservative voters in southwest Virginia and bring out new military supporters in the Tidewater, it was the tried-and-true Democrats from Northern Virginia who provided his margin of victory yesterday. More than 42 percent of all the votes were cast in the Washington suburbs, and Webb won an overwhelming majority of them.

It may have been the first election in which all Virginians used electronic voting machines, but some precincts could have been counting on an abacus. Voters south of the Rappahannock River largely stayed home, and the loyal Democrats who turned out there voted mostly for the loyal Democrat on the ballot, longtime party activist Harris Miller.

But in Northern Virginia, where turnout was only miserable compared with pathetic, voters appeared to listen to the plea of national Democratic leaders that Webb is the one they wanted in a fight with Allen. Jurisdiction after jurisdiction in the region gave Webb a 20-point margin.

Those national Democrats who went out on a limb for Webb -- 2004 presidential nominee Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Senate Democratic campaign committee Chairman Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.) chief among them -- were breathing a sigh of relief. They had tossed out the traditional neutrality that comes in a primary in the hopes that, if nothing else, Webb could keep Allen spending money to defend his seat in Virginia rather than burnish his presidential ambitions in Des Moines and Manchester, N.H.

But what Democrats have at this point is more a rÃ©sumÃ© than a candidate. On paper, the 60-year-old Webb is a Vietnam War hero who's against the war in Iraq, a Republican military specialist who has renounced his old party and brings instant national security credibility to Democrats. He's a noted author, screenwriter and journalist, beloved by the liberal blogosphere yet fluent in the language of the commonwealth's rural heart.

On the stump, he can be hesitant and uninterested in domestic policy questions. He hates the demands of fundraising -- "odious" is what he calls the process -- and it shows; he has not been very successful at it. Some find his rawness appealing while others just find it raw.

"Every candidate grows, and Jim will continue to grow," said his campaign adviser Steve Jarding, who managed Mark R. Warner's gubernatorial bid five years ago. "This is a guy that 100 days ago people thought was a Republican and 99 days ago was asking for money from people he didn't know.

"He doesn't have to worry about proving to everyone in the room now that he's a Democrat. He's been ratified."

National Democrats are still not ready to move Virginia into the top tier of races that they think will help give them a majority in the Senate.

Allen has never lost a statewide race, and he has a huge advantage in fundraising: He has raised more than $10 million. And as withdrawn and shy as Webb sometimes can be, that's just how outgoing and gregarious Allen is on the stump.

Democratic Gov. Timothy M. Kaine said at the outset of the campaign that Allen has an important political skill. "You'll see him at some event talking to someone, and he seems like there's nothing he'd rather be doing than talking to that person at that time," Kaine said.

That's not a description that would be applied to Webb as this point. But the man who made his campaign slogan "Born Fighting" shows signs of taking the battle to Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0033804

"We, at the moment, have not a lot of money, a candidate who's never run for office and 2,500 rag-tag rebels who volunteered for . . . " The crowd's cheers kept Webb from finishing the sentence. "I like those odds," he finally concluded.

So Virginians will choose between the cowboy-booted Allen and the combat-booted Webb.

Showdown at Macho Gulch.

Clinton Booed On Iraq (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, June 14, 2006

Angry boos greeted Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) at a liberal conference yesterday when she opposed fixing a date for withdrawing American forces from Iraq.

The sour audience response, at the Campaign for America's Future conference, hints at the 2008 presidential front-runner's shaky standing with anti-war Democrats, who wield increasing power in the party.

Clinton's speech packed the room with a crowd billed as the nation's largest gathering of progressives. But, although the left-leaning audience raucously cheered her domestic agenda, there was only a sprinkling of applause mixed with jeers when the senator refused to disavow her vote authorizing the Iraq war, as Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) did later in the day, renewing questions about possible fallout from her assiduous appeals to centrist voters.

"Our job is to do everything we can to help this [Iraqi] government succeed," Clinton said to the silent audience. She rapped President Bush's "open-ended commitment" to keeping U.S. troops in Iraq but added, "Nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain" for leaving.

At that, shouts erupted from the audience, dissipating only as Clinton turned back to the Democrats' need to pursue alternative sources of fuel in response to high energy prices. When the senator, whose hawkishness on national security has alienated many liberals, urged Democrats to reach out to "people who may not yet agree with us," a chant flared up in the hall: "Bring the troops home!"

Clinton was not the only 2008 hopeful to stray yesterday from the nascent Democratic orthodoxy of a quick exit from Iraq. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack also dismissed calls to set a troop withdrawal date at a briefing that likely previewed his remarks to the liberal conference. As The Hill reported last month, Clinton and Vilsack have both also declined to echo their party's calls for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

This year's conference has become a breakthrough moment for the Campaign for America's Future. Having started as a small-scale progressive push for a greater voice in Clinton administration policy, the Campaign has grown during the Bush presidency into a thrumming factory for Democratic policy.

"The Campaign has been very helpful and effective in a whole series of campaigns dealing with access to healthcare, the cost of student loans, the minimum wage, corporate corruption," Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) said in an interview before addressing the conference on education. "They have used peoples' connection with those issues as organizing tools … in all different kinds of congressional districts."

Campaign co-director Roger Hickey cast his group and its allies, from MoveOn.org to USAction, as a winning counterweight to the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) and other centrist forces.

"The lesson we drew from the Clinton administration is that the progressive wing of the Democratic Party … needs to be better organized in order to be heard, especially given the influence of groups like the DLC and corporate influence in general," Hickey said.

Yet Democratic unity was a pervasive theme of the conference, which opened with a new Greenberg Quinlan Rosner poll that the Campaign touted as proof of the electorate's realigning away from conservatism and toward progressivism. In fact, the poll showed a generic preference for Democrats over Republicans but a continued advantage for political conservatives over progressives.

"What we're seeing now is incredible unanimity among Democrats and increasingly among Americans who have rejected all the signature issues of the Bush presidency," Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), who has appeared at several past Campaign conferences, said in an interview.

DLC senior fellow Marshall Wittmann pointed out that Democrats have difficult work ahead, even as many party leaders cast plummeting Republican approval ratings as a harbinger of victory in the fall midterms.

"The danger to the Democratic Party right now is, they're lurching to the left and leaving behind the middle," Wittmann said. "It's to Hillary's credit that she's steering a centrist course even if it upsets some on the left, because that's the only way the party is going to be back in control of Congress and win the White House."

DOJ_NMG_0033805

A column by author Norman Solomon questioning the Campaign's labeling of Clinton as a "progressive leader" made the rounds yesterday among bloggers who attended the conference. "In the interests of truth-in-labeling, shouldn't Hillary Clinton be described as anti-progressive?" Solomon wrote.

Hickey, meanwhile, reiterated the Campaign's view of liberals as Democratic leaders — "The Democratic Party is a big tent, but the vast majority of Democrats are progressives" — and recalled last year's successful fight against Bush's Social Security plan.

"There was a time when the DLC supported privatization of Social Security. You don't hear them talking about that very much because we have basically won that battle," Hickey said. "There may or may not be [the] same debate on foreign policy, with the DLC saying the party ought to support the administration on Iraq."

Hickey cited Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) as the "epitome" of centrist compromise. Lieberman's surging Democratic primary foe, Ned Lamont, tied his evening fundraiser to the conference.

Clinton's speech may have laid bare the Democrats' internal fault lines over the war, but Democratic overconfidence became another contentious conference issue. While Campaign co-director Robert Borosage warned in The Nation this week that "nothing could be more pernicious" than Democrats' expecting to take back Congress on the strength of low presidential approval, the air was thick with anticipation of a new majority.

The Congressional Progressive Caucus, led by California Democratic Reps. Barbara Lee and Lynn Woolsey, hung a hopeful banner on its exhibition table: "If the House majority flips in November, half of chairs of 20 standing House Committees will be Progressive Caucus members. PLUS, An additional 31 Congressional Progressive Caucus members will be subcommittee chairs."

Progressive Caucus policy adviser Bill Goold said the conference was "a golden opportunity" to connect left-leaning lawmakers with grassroots liberal networks outside Washington. Goold pointed to the group's series of ad hoc hearings on U.S.-Iranian relations, the latest of which will take place next week.

The ultimate goal, Goold said, is to "develop an alternative Democratic national-security strategy," separate from but "supplementary to" the security plan that Pelosi and other party leaders unveiled this spring.

"It's a very hard thing to modulate," said Matt Bennett, communications director on Gen. Wesley Clark's 2004 presidential campaign and a co-founder of the new centrist group Third Way. "On the one hand, you definitely don't want to measure drapes. On the other hand, you've got to look confident and got to be able to talk to people about what will happen if they vote for you."

Clinton, in her speech, similarly called on Democrats to amplify their talk of an affirmative agenda, as did House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who proudly recalled her own vote against the war in Iraq.

When Clinton called U.S. troops "the best we have to offer," she received a few small cheers and loud cries of "No!" from the conference audience. Pelosi made her own plea to support the troops and received a thunderous ovation.

Anti-war Activists Jeer Hillary Clinton (AP-Y2)

By Devlin Barrett

AP2, June 13, 2006

Anti-war activists at a liberal gathering booed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Tuesday for opposing a set date for pulling U.S. troops from Iraq. Facing down the jeers, Clinton said Democrats need to have "a difficult conversation" about the war.

Another potential presidential candidate, Sen. John Kerry, spoke to the group later in the day and offered an emphatically anti-war appeal.

"Sometimes this is a difficult conversation, in part because this administration has made our world more dangerous than it should be," said Clinton, D-N.Y.

Kerry, who was widely criticized as the party's standard-bearer in 2004 for being too cautious in his criticism of the war, said Tuesday that politicians "cannot have it both ways."

In remarks that could have been aimed at Clinton, Kerry said: "It's not enough to argue with the logistics or to argue about the details. ... It is essential to acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake. ... It was wrong, and I was wrong to vote for that Iraqi war resolution."

Kerry's speech featured some of his strongest comments to date, including a call to "end a war in Iraq that weakens the nation each and every day it goes on."

The Massachusetts senator is offering an amendment to withdraw troops from Iraq by the end of this year.

While Clinton received loud cheers for her swipes at the Bush administration, many in the crowd jeered her stance on the Iraq war. She voted for the war but has since harshly criticized the Bush administration's handling of the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0033806

"I do not think it is a smart strategy, either, for the president to continue with his open-ended commitment, which I think does not put enough pressure on the new Iraqi government," said Clinton, before turning to the anti-war liberals' core beef with her.

"Nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain. I do not agree that that is in the best interests," said Clinton, prompting loud booing from some at the gathering.

Clinton has been seen as the early favorite among potential Democratic candidates for president in 2008, but she is increasingly at odds with anti-war liberals over her past vote and current position on Iraq.

After addressing Iraq, Clinton quickly turned to the 2006 election, saying her party needs to speak to middle-class Americans and overcome disagreements.

"If we're going to win in November then we have to be smarter, tougher, and better prepared than our opponents, because one thing they do know how to do is win and we have to reach out to people who may not be able to agree with us," she said.

"We have to talk about the range of issues that are on their minds that they talk about around the kitchen table," Clinton said.

Before speaking to the group, another potential presidential candidate, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, questioned whether Congress had done its part in asking tough questions.

"Congress has a responsibility here," Vilsack said, in a subtle criticism of potential 2008 rivals like Kerry and Clinton. "If the tough questions aren't being asked by the administration, the checks and balances system of our government requires that the other branch of government asks the tough questions."

Speaking at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies, Vilsack cautioned against rushing for a quick exit from Iraq now.

"I personally don't think now is a time to say on a date certain we are leaving," he said.

Clinton And Kerry Show Democratic Divide On Troop Withdrawal (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Robin Toner

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — At the moment that the White House is again trying to cast them as weak on national security, Democrats are debating their stance on the war in Iraq with new intensity, with some of the party's leading figures — including potential 2008 presidential candidates — sharply divided over whether the United States should set a deadline for bringing troops home.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, faced boos and shouts of "bring them home" from an audience of liberal Democrats here on Tuesday as she argued against setting a deadline, wading into what she called a "difficult conversation." Thirty minutes later, the same crowd applauded wildly as Senator John F. Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, the party's 2004 presidential candidate, implored the Senate to back his call for a six-month deadline for withdrawal, and said he regretted his initial support for the war.

"It is essential to acknowledge that the war was a mistake — to say the simple words that contain more truth than pride," Mr. Kerry said, adding: "It was wrong and I was wrong to vote for that resolution."

With President Bush making a high-profile visit to Baghdad, and his chief political adviser, Karl Rove, having unleashed a sharp attack on Democrats over the war, Republicans said Democratic infighting over Iraq would hurt Democrats as the midterm elections approached.

On a day when Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared on Capitol Hill to press the administration's message that Iraq was making progress, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, described Democrats as "all over the lot" on Iraq.

His Democratic counterpart, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, said that the war would prove a burden for Republicans, given its unpopularity and the perception that the White House has no withdrawal plan. .

Representative Barney Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat, said the House Democratic caucus shared "a pretty universal disgust" with the Bush administration's management of the war.

He estimated that 50 percent or more of the caucus supported the position of Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who has called for a speedy pullout of American combat troops.

That division was on dramatic display before thousands of liberals at a "Take Back America" convention on Tuesday.

Mrs. Clinton, while well received on other issues, found herself talking over some boos when she argued against a deadline for troop withdrawal.. "I have to just say it — I do not think it is a smart strategy either for the president to continue with his open-ended commitment, which I think does not put enough pressure on the new Iraqi government, nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain," Mrs. Clinton said. "I do not agree that that is in the best interests of our troops or our country."

DOJ_NMG_0033807

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader, was warmly applauded when she reiterated her support for the Murtha proposal.

Both the Senate and the House have scheduled extensive debates and voting this week that will deal with American policy in Iraq. On Thursday, House Republicans will present a resolution that declares the war in Iraq to be a critical part of the "global war on terror" and declares, "It is not in the national security interest of the United States to set an arbitrary date for the withdrawal or redeployment" of troops.

Democrats scoffed at the Republican resolution as pure tactics — "a political not a policy statement," in the words of Representative Steny H. Hoyer, the Democratic whip.

But Democratic leaders in the House and Senate are scrambling to produce their own, unifying resolutions on Iraq, that would go beyond the language they embraced last year, calling for 2006 to be a year of "significant transition" in Iraq.

In the Senate, a variety of amendments are expected to be offered this week to a major defense bill — including Mr. Kerry's proposal for a withdrawal of most American combat troops by the end of the year, combined with a summit to find a political and diplomatic solution to Iraqi's internal strife.

A vote on a Kerry-style amendment could create a hard choice for Democrats in the Senate: antagonize the party's antiwar base or provide fodder for Republican attacks. Senate Democratic leaders, not surprisingly, were seeking a less stark alternative to put before their members — including a possible call for a "responsible redeployment" of American troops starting this year.

Liberal Activists Boo Clinton (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) drew boos and hisses from an audience of liberal activists yesterday as she defended her opposition to a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq, and later she received an implicit rebuke from Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) for failing to acknowledge that her support for the war was a mistake.

Clinton's and Kerry's appearances at the Take Back America conference at the Washington Hilton put on vivid display the Democratic Party's divisions over the foreign policy issue that dominates this year's midterm elections, and the two possible 2008 presidential candidates offered a preview of the debate that could dominate the battle for the party's nomination.

Clinton and Kerry supported the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing the Iraq war. Kerry recently renounced that vote, but Clinton has never done so. She finds herself in opposition to a majority of Democratic activists and is the target of passionate criticism from some of them.

Clinton won repeated applause through most of her speech, which dealt at length with domestic issues but also sharply criticized President Bush's handling of the war. But the audience turned against her when, in what she called a difficult conversation, she restated her long-standing position about timetables for withdrawing U.S forces.

"I have to just say it," she began. "I do not think it is a smart strategy either for the president to continue with his open-ended commitment, which I think does not put enough pressure on the new Iraqi government, nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain. I do not agree that that is in the best interest of our troops or our country."

Clinton finished on a more positive note, with an exhortation about winning the November elections that brought audience members to their feet cheering. But within minutes, as she worked the rope line on her way out of the hotel ballroom, she was the target of protesters, who chanted "Bring the troops home" and "Stop the war."

Later, after Clinton's departure, Kerry delivered a fiery denunciation of the war that was continually interrupted with cheers and applause, and he repeated his call for "a hard and fast deadline" for withdrawing troops. At one point, Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee, appeared to be directing his comments at the woman who leads early national Democratic polls for 2008.

"Let me say it plainly," Kerry said. "It's not enough to argue with the logistics or to argue about the details or the manner of the conflict's execution or the failures of competence, as great as they are. It is essential to acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake, to say the simple words that contain more truth than pride. We were misled. We were given evidence that was not true. It was wrong, and I was wrong to vote for that Iraqi resolution."

Kerry struggled throughout the 2004 campaign to square his vote for the resolution and his later opposition to an $87 billion funding bill for the troops. As if to drive home the point that he thinks Clinton and others who share her views are in a similarly untenable position, he told the audience yesterday: "One of the great lessons of life is that you cannot change the future if you're not honest about the past. And we cannot have it both ways in the war in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0033808

Spokesman David Wade said Kerry's remarks were not directed specifically at Clinton.

Even before Clinton arrived for her speech, it was clear that she faced a potentially hostile audience. Roger Hickey, co-director of the Campaign for America's Future, the conference's sponsor, admonished the audience to be friendly to the morning speakers. "We owe them our courteous attention," he said. As the audience waited for Clinton to arrive, some passed out anti-Clinton literature to reporters.

The Campaign for America's Future, a leading liberal group, has battled with centrist Democrats over the direction of the party.

Clinton and Kerry spoke just as the news was breaking about Bush's secret trip to Baghdad. Administration officials have seized on the formation of the new government in Iraq and the killing last week of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, to mount an offensive to turn around public perceptions about the war that threaten to damage Republicans in the November elections.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who called the war a "grotesque mistake," challenged the administration's claims of progress during her appearance at the conference.

"As we talk about a new direction for America, I think one place that it is very clear that we need a new direction is in the war in Iraq," she said.

Pelosi joined Kerry in calling for a timetable to pull out the troops, saying she supports a plan outlined earlier by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.).

One Clinton adviser dismissed questions about whether the senator had sought to draw dissents from the crowd as a way to burnish her credentials as a strong-on-national-security centrist. "She had enough respect for her audience not to pander or duck the issue," said strategist Howard Wolfson.

Democrats Are Still Divided Over The War In Iraq (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, June 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Democratic Party's split over the Iraq war cracked into view Tuesday as liberals hissed New York Sen. Hillary Clinton's opposition to setting a date for U.S. troops' withdrawal and cheered Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's call to bring them home by the end of the year.

The intra-party division has haunted Democrats from the start of the war and bedeviled Kerry during his 2004 presidential run. The lack of a harmonizing party message comes as public opposition to the war has been strong and congressional elections are about five months away.

"We can't have it both ways," Kerry declared to a gathering of liberal activists in Washington. "Tell Hillary!" a member of the audience shouted back.

Clinton, speaking at the same gathering, which was sponsored by the Campaign for America's Future, criticized President Bush for "his open-ended commitment," but the New York senator added: "Nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain. I do not agree that that is in the best interest of our troops or our country."

Her Iraq remark, a brief reference in an otherwise well-received speech on her broader view of the party's agenda, provoked boos and calls of "Bring the troops home!"

The disagreement was all the more illustrative of the Democratic Party's division since it featured two potential rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. It also comes as Republicans in Congress are preparing to launch their own debate with Democrats on the war. House Republican leaders have scheduled floor action for Thursday on a resolution that equates the fighting in Iraq with the war on terrorism.

The emerging debate holds political peril for both parties. A majority of Americans oppose the war and call it a mistake. But Republicans believe they'll benefit from last week's killing of al-Qaida leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and by the final appointments to the Iraqi Cabinet. They also argue that Democrats alienate voters when they propose deadlines for withdrawing troops to appease the party's left wing.

"There's a lot of angst about Iraq," said Republican pollster Whit Ayres. "But when the debate occurs around whether we should withdraw troops immediately, we're playing on Republican turf."

Kerry calls for U.S. troops to withdraw by the year's end, arguing that the Iraqi government will move decisively to take over security and government functions only when faced with a deadline. The Massachusetts senator plans to introduce an amendment to a defense policy bill on Thursday that would set such a timetable.

But the cheers Kerry heard from liberals Tuesday morning weren't being echoed by all his Democratic colleagues later in the day.

DOJ_NMG_0033809

"I think just a naked date, without it being attached to what our plan as to how you would succeed in leaving something better, would not be the most appropriate way to go," said Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was negotiating with Kerry and other senators to find a compromise that could win a majority of Democratic votes. Some Democrats are pressing for a withdrawal date of December 2007.

Kerry told reporters he's willing to change his amendment and the specific deadline "if I can get 20 or 30 Democrats who can agree on a date that is a few months different."

He also downplayed his differences with Clinton. "We're united in the notion that you have to change directions," he said.

Democratic strategists argue that the party is better served by presenting a broad alternative to Bush rather than focusing on specific policies.

"What will drive the big vote in November around this issue is general discontent around the course of the war and desire to change direction," said Tad Devine, a Democratic media strategist who helped Kerry's 2004 campaign. "Democrats need to have a very simple message: `We need to change course.' The fundamental question of what we do is a question of governing, not of campaigns."

House Democrats complained Tuesday that the Republican war resolution to be debated Thursday was a political maneuver designed to paint Democrats into a corner. It links the war in Iraq to the war on terrorism, but most conflict in Iraq rises from sectarian violence and nationalist resistance from insurgents.

"It's a political statement, not a policy statement," said Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who's the second-ranking House Democratic leader as party whip.

Kerry said the House resolution "once again misinterprets the war on terror and poses a false choice for Americans."

House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio said the debate is a legitimate one.

"Many of us believe that Iraq is part of the war on terror, and if they (Democrats) don't believe that, they can vote no," he said. "I am sorry that some people have to make an uncomfortable decision."

Liberal Groups Treat Hillary To Jeers, Cheers (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer And Alison Hoover

The Washington Times, June 14, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was treated to both heckles and cheers yesterday by liberal activists in a mixed day for the New York Democrat on the campaign trail.

Yesterday morning, Mrs. Clinton spoke at the "Take Back America" conference, held at the Washington Hilton. Protesters upset with Mrs. Clinton's vote to authorize the Iraq war in 2002 stood outside the hotel with a sign that read, "It takes one bomb to raze a village."

Before Mrs. Clinton arrived, event organizer Robert Borosage asked the crowd to be respectful toward her and the other speakers, saying, "We owe them our courteous attention."

Mrs. Clinton took the stage to a standing ovation with only a few scattered boos from the crowd. However, when she said that "it is not a smart strategy" to set a deadline for withdrawal of troops from Iraq, Mrs. Clinton was loudly booed by the audience. At the end of her speech, the crowd began to chant, "Bring them home."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Sen. John Kerry followed Mrs. Clinton and were treated to enthusiastic applause in their calls for an immediate withdrawal of American troops from Iraq.

"Have you had enough of a war that is failing to make America secure?" Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, asked the crowd.

The bulk of Mr. Kerry's speech dealt with Iraq, including the announcement of his intention to introduce legislation in the Senate this week calling for an up-or-down vote on troop withdrawal.

"A war in Iraq founded on a lie can never be true to America's character," said Mr. Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

Mrs. Clinton received a warmer response later in the day when she promised a group of pro-choice activists that she would continue blocking Senate confirmation of President Bush's nominee for Food and Drug Administration commissioner in protest of the FDA's failure to make a decision on over-the-counter sales of Plan B emergency contraception.

Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach was nominated to the post in March, but Mrs. Clinton and Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat, have placed a hold on his nomination.

"We will continue to hold that nomination until the FDA issues a decision on Plan B: yes or no," Mrs. Clinton told the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association.

"The FDA's 2004 decision not to approve over-the-counter sales was politically motivated," Mrs. Clinton said, while accepting the group's public-service award at yesterday's luncheon. "Increasingly, I see Washington being turned into an evidence-free zone where inconvenient facts are totally denied or dismissed ... where the beliefs and values of Americans take a back seat to the ideological agenda of a select few."

DOJ_NMG_0033810

However, it was revealed this week that the FDA's former chief told a court under oath that his agency intended to allow over-the-counter sales of Plan B last year, but delayed the move while determining how to limit those sales to adolescents.

Former FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford said he had reserved the right to decide whether to loosen the sales restrictions, but he said his Aug. 26 announcement was to work out how to enforce restricting nonprescription sales to women 17 and older. Girls 16 and younger still would need a prescription.

"There was no -- no talk of denial, there was talk of trying to get straight what the enforcement procedures would be," Mr. Crawford testified in a May 24 sworn deposition in a lawsuit against the FDA.

The transcript of his testimony was released late Monday by the Center for Reproductive Rights, which has sued to force the agency to allow over-the-counter sales for all ages.

Mrs. Clinton also used her luncheon speech luncheon to push for two related measures in the Senate.

The Unintended Pregnancy Reduction Act would expand Medicaid coverage of "family-planning services," Mrs. Clinton said, while the Prevention First Act would require health insurance coverage for contraception and require federally funded hospitals to provide emergency contraception to rape victims. Some Catholic hospitals do not provide such contraception, which they view as inducing abortions.

Democrats Not Finding Unity On Iraq Party Leaders Offer Markedly Different Visions On How To End War (SFC)

By Marc Sandalow

San Francisco Chronicle, June 14, 2006

Washington -- In a span of 90 minutes Tuesday, three prominent Democrats offered competing visions of how to proceed in Iraq and displayed how difficult it will be to turn what was once the Republican Party's strongest asset into its electoral downfall.

As President Bush was returning from his surprise visit to Baghdad, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, a leading contender for the Democratic Party's 2008 presidential nomination, told a gathering of nearly 2,000 liberals that the war was a "strategic blunder," but warned it would not be in the nation's interest to "set a date certain" for withdrawal.

She was followed by House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, who told the same group the war was a "grotesque mistake," and that troops should be withdrawn "at the earliest practical date."

And moments later, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's standard bearer in 2004, said he had made a mistake by voting to authorize the president to use military force in Iraq, and called for a "hard and fast deadline" for troop withdrawal.

Democrats have put aside many differences in their common yearning to gain seats in the 2006 midterm congressional elections. Yet when it comes to the war that has polarized the nation, and by some accounts is shaping up as the biggest issue in the November election, Democrats are struggling to speak with a single voice.

A USA Today/Gallup poll released Tuesday found that most Americans considered the killing of al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi a "major achievement" and suggested that opinion which has turned steadily against the war remains volatile.

The poll found that 51 percent of Americans still say it was a mistake to go to war in Iraq, a drop from nearly 60 percent at the end of last year. The new poll found that 48 percent believe the war is winnable, up from 39 percent in April.

And the Democratic disagreements on display Tuesday came on the eve of debates in the House and Senate over the future of the war, which leaders hope will clarify the different views of the two parties.

After months of negotiating, Democrats have united around a common call that 2006 be a "year of significant transition" in Iraq, a statement so broad that it would be hard for anyone, the president included, to disagree. By comparison, a resolution written by Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Petaluma calling on Bush to "develop and implement a plan to begin the immediate withdrawal" of troops, has attracted just 35 co-sponsors.

Strategists have given Democrats mixed advice; some have called on Democrats to exhibit spine by demanding a swift pullout, while others have warned the party risks a backlash if they are seen either as weak or as trying to exploit violence for political purposes.

The conflict was evident Tuesday as Clinton, long a favorite of the party's left, spoke before liberals at the "Take Back America" conference in the ballroom of a Washington hotel.

"I have to just say it: I do not think it is a smart strategy either for the president to continue with his open-ended commitment," she said, "nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain. I do not agree that that is in the best interest of our troops or our country."

DOJ_NMG_0033811

Many in the crowd cheered. Many booed. Hecklers began yelling "bring the troops home." And when Clinton had finished speaking, she was met by a loud chants of "bring the troops home, now!"

By contrast, Kerry who like Clinton is believed to be eyeing a possible presidential candidacy in 2008, delivered an unambiguous indictment of Bush's conduct of the war, displaying clarity and rhetorical resolve that was often missing during his losing campaign against the Republican president in 2004.

Kerry called Iraq and Vietnam, the "two most failed foreign policy choices" in the nation's history, and made a biting contrast between Bush's surprise visit to Iraq early Tuesday and the president's lack of combat duty in Vietnam.

"Now, I fully understand that Iraq is not Vietnam. After all, President Bush is even there today," Kerry said.

Kerry, who earned two purple hearts and a silver medal in Vietnam, went on to draw parallels between the current conflict and the war he protested as a returning veteran in the early 1970s.

In both conflicts, Kerry said, the U.S. intervened "based on official deceptions" and to fight "a larger global war under the misperception that the particular theater was just the latest battleground."

"And as in Vietnam, we have stayed and fought and died even though it is time for us to go," Kerry said. "It was right to dissent from a war in 1971 that was wrong and could not be won. And now, in 2006, it is both a right and an obligation for Americans to stand up to a president who is wrong today."

The largely anti-war crowd cheered Kerry, as they did Pelosi when she reminded them that in 2003 as the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, she had warned that the intelligence did not support the threat being made by the administration.

Pelosi said she stood by the plan promoted by Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., which calls for a redeployment of troops "over the horizon" as soon as is practically possible.

"There are only two directions to take in Iraq: the president's plan of stay the course and let a future president sweep up after you, or the Murtha plan to change the direction of that course. I support the Murtha plan."

Some party leaders say that Democrats are united in their resolve that the U.S. should not set up permanent military bases in Iraq, and that Bush has botched the execution of the war.

And they insist their differences are being blown out of proportion.

On NBC's Today show Tuesday morning, Democratic Party chairman Howard Dean was shown two quotes, one from Pelosi supporting the Murtha plan and one from Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 ranking House Democrat, who said in response to Murtha's plan that "a precipitous withdrawal of American forces in Iraq could lead to disaster, spawning a civil war, fostering a haven for terrorists, damaging our nation's security and credibility."

"I see no difference between what Steny Hoyer just said and what Nancy Pelosi said," Dean responded.

Clinton Opens Debate On Family Planning (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton moved on Tuesday to shift the debate over abortion rights to the subject of access to family planning services, saying that the nation's focus should be on preventing unwanted pregnancies.

Mrs. Clinton's remarks, made to members of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association in Washington, reflect the degree to which Democrats around the country are trying find a middle ground on the polarizing issue of abortion rights since their party's defeats in the November 2004 elections.

"Let us unite around a common goal of reducing the amount of abortions," the senator said. "Not by making them illegal as many are attempting to do, or overturning Roe v. Wade and undermining the constitutional protections that decision provided, but by preventing unintended pregnancies in the first place through education, contraception, accessible health care and services, empowering women to make decisions."

Mrs. Clinton, a potential candidate for the presidency who is up for re-election in the Senate from New York this year, also used her speech to take a jab at Republicans who, while adamantly opposed to abortion rights, have resisted efforts to pay for programs providing greater access to contraception and other family planning services.

Specifically, Mrs. Clinton criticized the Bush administration for failing to provide adequate money for government family planning programs, as well as for refusing to approve over-the-counter sales of Plan B, an emergency contraceptive.

Mrs. Clinton said that the Food and Drug Administration's refusal to approve the Plan B contraceptive was a prime example of the "Washington Republican war on contraception."

"Let's really understand what we're up against," she continued. "This is not just about Roe, this is not just about choice, this is about contraception, family planning and, most profoundly, women's roles and responsibilities and rights."

DOJ_NMG_0033812

Mrs. Clinton's advisers say that shifting the debate to family planning is a way for the Democratic Party to gain an upper hand over Republicans. "It's time to go on the offensive," one of Mrs. Clinton's advisers said. Her advisers noted how Republicans have put Democrats on the defensive in the debate on this issue, particularly on a procedure that anti-abortion groups call partial-birth abortion.

But the campaign of one of Mrs. Clinton's Republican opponents in the New York Senate race, John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, accused her of engaging in empty political rhetoric.

"It's very good to be talking about a middle ground in the abortion debate," said Kevin Collins, a spokesman for the Spencer campaign. "But she has never supported any limit or restriction on what can be a gruesome procedure, partial-birth abortion."

Mrs. Clinton began talking about a need for compromise more than a year ago, shortly after the 2004 elections, when some Democrats began arguing that the party's poor showing stemmed from the fact that it was seen as too liberal on social issues.

Speaking to abortion rights supporters in Albany in January 2005, Mrs. Clinton said both sides in the debate needed to work together to prevent unwanted pregnancies and ultimately reduce abortions, which she called a "sad, even tragic choice to many, many women." Mrs. Clinton made her remarks on the same day as the annual anti-abortion campaigners' rally in Washington marking the Roe v. Wade anniversary.

On Tuesday, she echoed that sentiment. "There is a lot of common ground we can find together," she said.

In making the case for reducing abortions, rather than outlawing the procedure, Mrs. Clinton noted that her husband's administration managed to reduce teenage pregnancy by nearly one-third through an ambitious campaign that focused on family planning.

"Why did that happen?" Mrs. Clinton said. "Well, it happened because people came together instead of pointing fingers at each other and, you know, walling each other off in our respective camps."

Citing a recent study by the Guttmacher Institute, which is a nonprofit corporation with headquarters in Washington and New York that researches reproductive health, Mrs. Clinton noted that a poor woman is four times as likely to experience an unplanned pregnancy as a higher-income woman.

"High-income women have quick, convenient access to contraceptives; low income women do not," she said. "And the result is often and increasingly becoming unintentional, unintended pregnancy."

Rove Rallies NH GOP Before Midterm Election (MUL)

By John Distaso

The Manchester Union Leader, June 14, 2006

MANCHESTER – When he sharply accused key Democrats this week of "cutting and running" on the Iraq war, Karl Rove was in a broad way urging New Hampshire Republicans to stand by President George W. Bush during this key mid-term election campaign.

ROVE

Bush's approval ratings are at a low ebb. Democrats in New Hampshire and across the country believe the GOP is vulnerable. But Rove, Bush's long-time political adviser, returned to basics on Monday, verbally drawing a clear bright line between the two parties in trying to rally the faithful.

In his 20-minute speech to the New Hampshire Republican State Committee's annual dinner, Rove focused on taxes, spending and national security.

He sharpened the differences between the two parties with vintage "red meat" rhetoric.

"They're for higher taxes," he said of the Democrats. "We're for lower taxes.

"They're for more spending. We're for less spending."

The Democratic National Committee said Rove and the Republicans "are recycling their tired and despicable partisan attacks" and have no "real solutions."

If Rove appeared particularly feisty, it may have been because he had just received good news. According to news reports, when Rove landed in Manchester, he was told by his attorney that he would not be indicted in the Valerie Plame/CIA leak special counsel investigation.

In his speech Rove reminded the crowd economy was already sputtering when Bush took office and was further damaged by the 9/11 terrorist attacks and corporate scandals.

"In the 90 days after 9/11, the American economy lost 1 million jobs," he said. "Then we had corporate scandals, which caused concern about our markets."

DOJ_NMG_0033813

Bush's remedy was to cut taxes "and give people back more of their own money," said Rove. "We have cut taxes every single year this President has been in office" in a host of areas, including income, capital gains and dividends, and Bush temporarily eliminated the death tax.

"We're on our way to cutting the deficit in half by 2009," he said, by cutting taxes and limiting spending.

Democrats , he said, "voted against budget restraint. They voted against the tax cuts.

On foreign policy, Rove said the war in Iraq is a difficult but necessary part of the global war on terrorism.

"The President decided we will no longer tolerate attacks on the people and territory of the United States of America, and we were right to do so," he said.

Rove said Islamic radicals aim to spread their influence from Indonesia to Morocco, continue terrorizing the United States and destroy Israel.

Rove read quotes supportive of removing Saddam Hussein made by Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry in 2002.

"I guess you can say he was for the use of force before he was against the use of force," Rove said. He noted that Kerry now supports the withdrawal of American troops.

For The GOP, A Base Hit Isn't Enough (WP)

By Sarah Chamberlain Resnick

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

The inside-the-Beltway crowd has been chattering about the need for Republicans to reconnect with the "conservative base." Columnists, talking heads and other so-called experts have been going on at length about the need for the GOP to motivate this base to save our congressional majorities in the fall. While this may make for interesting banter on the Sunday morning talk shows, the reality is that Republican majorities in the House and Senate do not rest on the base alone. While keeping that segment of the party motivated is certainly an important factor in the November midterms, it isn't enough. To maintain our majorities, particularly in the House, our party must reach out to independent and swing voters.

A recent Cook Political Report/RT Strategies poll gave Democrats an 11-point generic ballot advantage on the question, "Which party would you like to see in control of Congress?" Not surprisingly, by a margin of 87 percent to 8, self-identified Republicans say they prefer Republican control. By similar margins, self-identified Democrats prefer Democratic control. The 11-point advantage for Democrats is due not to an unmotivated base but to a dramatic shift among independents against Republican control of Congress. By a greater than 2-to-1 margin (46 percent to 21 percent), independents say they prefer Democratic control of the House.

Against this backdrop, it's not surprising that Democrats are pinning their hopes of retaking the House on what has been dubbed the Northeast Strategy, which targets Republican incumbents in such blue states as New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and New Hampshire. According to the New York Times, independent analysts say at least a dozen races in these states will be competitive. And Republican incumbents in closely divided or blue-leaning, Northeastern districts rely heavily on independent voters to provide the margin of victory on Election Day.

In what may be the cruelest of ironies, if Republicans are punished by independent voters in the midterms, it will be the centrist, independent Republicans from the Northeast who will be the most likely victims. For Democratic strategists and left-wing interest groups hoping for a Speaker Pelosi, a Republican legislative agenda that plays only to the conservative base this year is a dream come true.

For Republicans to hold the House, we must win back disaffected independent swing voters. To do this, Republicans in the House must pursue a legislative agenda that reflects the values and priorities of average Americans. In the poll cited above, independents list their top five concerns as jobs and the economy, Iraq, health care, gasoline prices, and education. Independent swing voters want more than just empty rhetoric and divisive wedge politics -- they want results.

Centrist Republicans in the House are showing leadership on the issues independent voters care about. Nancy Johnson of Connecticut and Fred Upton of Michigan have spearheaded the effort to protect critical investments in education and health-care programs during this year's budget process. Efforts to curb skyrocketing gas prices through tough new legislation on price gouging have been championed by Heather Wilson of New Mexico. Mike Castle of Delaware and Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania have led the way on ethics reform designed to restore and protect the integrity of the legislative process. On issue after issue, centrist Republicans in the House are fighting for an agenda that offers common-sense solutions to the problems facing our nation. Republican leadership in Washington should support and encourage these centrist efforts to reach out to independent swing voters.

In 1994 a Republican tidal wave brought our party into control in the House and Senate. Success at the polls that year didn't rely solely on a motivated conservative base. From 1992 to 1994 the Republican percentage among independents had grown by 10 points -- from 46 percent to 56. The Republican Revolution was a two-pronged effort relying on both a motivated conservative base and efforts to reach out to independent swing voters. To maintain that majority in 2006, we'd do well to remember the lessons of 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0033814

The writer is executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, an organization of moderate Republicans that includes a number of members of Congress and other officials.

Laura Bush Stumps For Kean, And Things Go Smoothly (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

LAKEWOOD, N.J., June 13 — The last time someone from the White House came to New Jersey to campaign for State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., things did not go according to plan.

Vice President Dick Cheney arrived in Newark then to show his solidarity with Mr. Kean, but Mr. Kean was late after taking the usually traffic-clogged Route 1 from Trenton rather than the speedier New Jersey Turnpike, prompting speculation that he did not want to be photographed with Mr. Cheney.

Almost three months later, when a far more popular administration figure — Laura Bush, the first lady — arrived here on Tuesday for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean's candidacy for the United States Senate, everything appeared to run smoothly.

Mr. Kean and Mrs. Bush appeared on stage together, under a big, white tent just a few miles from the Shore, and Mr. Kean delivered, almost verbatim, the same speech from his primary night celebration a week ago.

First, he repeated his line that his Democratic opponent, Senator Robert Menendez, was not running against President Bush, but against Mr. Kean. He repeated his opening quotation from Robert F. Kennedy, and his closing one from Ronald Reagan. In between, he repeated the same lines that generated tremendous party enthusiasm a week ago.

"The people of New Jersey can no longer afford a Hudson County party who puts politics first and people second," he said. "We need to elect a new United States senator who will bring a true moral compass to office."

Mrs. Bush did not refer specifically to Mr. Menendez. Instead, in remarks that lasted 10 minutes and were occasionally interrupted by people shouting, "We love you, Laura!" she praised Mr. Kean's record in Trenton, and his pedigree as the son of a popular governor and grandson of a congressman.

"For Tom, public service is a family tradition, and let me tell you, there is nothing wrong with that," she said, before leaving the stage with Mr. Kean to the strains of Brooks and Dunn's "Play Something Country."

There is no word yet on when, or whether, President Bush will visit New Jersey to campaign, since he remains unpopular in the state. "We haven't had that conversation yet," Mr. Kean said when asked that question.

Still, the fact that Mrs. Bush came to support Mr. Kean so early in the election season is the latest indication of how optimistic the national Republican Party is that it can put a New Jersey Republican in the Senate for the first time in three decades.

Polls foresee a tight race, each camp indicates that up to $20 million might be needed to win, and political heavyweights from both parties have paid a visit. Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani dropped by for Mr. Kean, and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois came on behalf of Mr. Menendez.

Mr. Menendez, with $6.4 million on hand, still has a significant advantage in fund-raising, according to the most recent financial filings, far more than Mr. Kean's $1.8 million. Lawrence E. Bathgate II, a former finance chairman of the Republican National Committee who was the host of Tuesday's fund-raiser on the grounds of his law office here, estimated that the event would bring in $500,000 for both Mr. Kean and the state Republican Party.

Mr. Bathgate is no stranger to festive Republican fund-raisers in his backyard. Twenty-years ago in August, he was the host of a similar event — tent and all — for a candidate running for New Jersey governor. That candidate, of course, was Mr. Kean's father, and the special guest was Mrs. Bush's father-in-law, who was vice president at the time.

In N.Va., Chance Help From DeLay (WP)

By Annie Gowen

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

One congressional primary candidate in Northern Virginia got some last-minute help from one of his district's newest voters, former House majority leader Tom DeLay, the Texas Republican who recently took up official residence in Alexandria.

Mark Ellmore, a candidate for the GOP nomination in the 8th Congressional District, said he had a chance meeting with DeLay on Sunday. DeLay, under indictment on campaign money-laundering charges in Texas, offered his support.

DOJ_NMG_0033815

Ellmore, who lost to Tom O'Donoghue in the GOP primary to face Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D) in November, called DeLay's office Monday morning.

DeLay's staff members set up an automated call from their boss that went to 8,000 voters in the district -- which includes Alexandria, Arlington County and part of Fairfax County -- urging them to the polls to support Ellmore.

Problem was, in the intro, DeLay said "Northern California" instead of "Northern Virginia."

"It had to be done rapid-fire, and unfortunately it was just an error," Ellmore said. "People got the gist of the message. That Mark Ellmore -- as Mr. DeLay said -- is most capable of competing on the next level."

He said he welcomed DeLay's support -- regardless of what the majority of left-leaning voters in the district might think of the former Texas congressman.

"Look," Ellmore said, "I have zero political clout. I was honored."

Giuliani Lays Out Energy Strategy In N.Y. (AP-Y2)

By Beth Fouhy

AP2, June 13, 2006

Stepping up his political visibility as he contemplates a run for president, former Mayor Rudolph Giuliani laid out an energy strategy Tuesday that calls for more use of nuclear power and ethanol.

Speaking to the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank, Giuliani called for a comprehensive effort to wean the nation from petroleum. The Republican said there was no national strategy to do so, but avoided criticizing President Bush and congressional leaders.

In his State of the Union address, Bush also called for reducing the nation's reliance on foreign oil, in part through increased use of alternative fuels.

Giuliani said the best way for the U.S. to end its reliance on foreign oil is to diversify its own sources of energy.

"I think you can be independent by being diversified, the way many of you are familiar with a terrific portfolio," he said.

Giuliani said nuclear power has had a remarkably safe track record despite lingering concerns about the accidents at the Three Mile Island and Chernobyl nuclear plants in the 1970s and 1980s.

He urged governors and state legislators to make it easier for nuclear power plants to get operating permits.

He also called for more hybrid cars and tax incentives for ethanol, a fuel distilled from corn and mixed with gasoline. Backers have long argued that ethanol reduces dependence on foreign oil and reduces greenhouse gases.

Ethanol is especially important in Iowa, a corn producing state that is also home to the caucuses that begin the presidential nominating process.

Last month, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, outlined an energy plan that called for a massive expansion of ethanol use.

Giuliani Says Nation Lacks Energy Policy (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

Challenging fellow Republicans in Washington, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani said yesterday that the Bush administration lacked an energy policy and that greater reliance on nuclear power, ethanol-based fuels and hybrid vehicles was more realistic than President Bush's goal of independence from foreign energy sources.

Mr. Giuliani, who is considering a presidential bid in 2008, did not criticize Mr. Bush by name, and some of his ideas reflected Republican orthodoxy about increasing energy supply. Yet in a speech to conservative thinkers from the Manhattan Institute for Policy Research, Mr. Giuliani implicitly accused the White House of doing little to expand energy sources. Afterward, too, he expressed concern about global warming, saying that "everyone accepts the fact that it's happening and it has an impact."

"I can't imagine how you can achieve anything in government without a plan," he said in his remarks at the Princeton Club, referring to the nation's long-range energy needs. "This is an area where we haven't had a plan in a very, very long time."

Mr. Giuliani, whose consulting firm, Giuliani Partners, advises energy companies and a liquefied natural gas project on Long Island Sound, called for easing and hastening permits for more nuclear power plants, natural gas ports and oil refineries. He said the nation could not afford another 30 years without a far-sighted energy policy.

"We've been sitting there for a generation, just hoping there'll be some magic solution," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0033816

His comments come as some of the leading Democratic presidential prospects, including Al Gore and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, have been highlighting environmental issues, particularly the need to move away from dependence on fossil fuels.

Asked by an audience member what his advice to Mr. Bush would be, Mr. Giuliani called for fixed numerical goals and deadlines to build more nuclear power plants, encourage use of hybrid cars, and increase the supply of ethanol and other resources. Ethanol is an economic priority in Iowa, which has the nation's first presidential caucuses.

While Mr. Giuliani has spoken recently on immigration and terrorism, he has mostly avoided giving presidential-style addresses this year. He said yesterday he would make a decision about a presidential bid after the 2006 elections.

Yet he also did not fuss yesterday when an audience member asked how he would approach education as president. He spoke forcefully in favor of school choice and vouchers, saying education was "a major civil rights issue" in cities that had failing public schools.

He did not explicitly propose a program of federal vouchers, but he said he would emphasize the idea in office and urge local districts to "go to a choice system and break up the monopoly" of public school education.

Many political analysts regard Mr. Giuliani as a popular national political figure who would nevertheless be a long shot for the presidency, because he would face real challenges winning the Republican Party nomination. He supports abortion rights, gay civil unions and gun control measures, three positions that are unacceptable to many Republican primary voters.

Political advisers to Mr. Giuliani say they believe that national security, terrorism, the economy, and perhaps Iraq will dominate the 2008 race, and that Mr. Giuliani is in the Republican mainstream on those issues. They also note that, in large part because of leadership after the 9/11 attacks, Mr. Giuliani is in first or second place in most public opinion polls surveying the 2008 race; only Senator John McCain tends to do as well.

In recent months, Mr. Giuliani has applied his political muscle to raising money for Republican candidates for state and federal office, as well as defending President Bush's Iraq strategy and tax cuts.

Given how rarely he has publicly disagreed with the White House, Mr. Giuliani's complaints about federal energy policy were intriguing.

During the speech — in which he relied on a slide show instead of prepared remarks and rambled at times — Mr. Giuliani was relentlessly skeptical while also being short on specific solutions. He questioned the notion of energy independence that Mr. Bush and many Democrats have floated, yet his own alternatives were fairly general.

"The idea of energy independence for the United States is maybe the wrong paradigm — I don't know if we can ever be independent," he said. But he added, "I think you can be independent by being diversified," arguing that Americans needed to depend more on home-grown fuels and energy resources.

Mr. Giuliani repeatedly touted hybrid cars and said they needed "to be heavily supported and effectively moved forward." (It did not escape reporters' attention, however, that a large Escalade was idling outside for him.)

At the same time, he sounded a skeptical note about energy conservation, saying it was "helpful but not really very, very effective" in dealing with energy. He said decreasing demand could harm the economy, though he did not go into detail.

Energy analysts said that while his remarks had a theatrical call-to-arms quality, many of his ideas were familiar.

"There's not a lot here that's different from what Dick Cheney would say," said Ashok Gupta, director of the air and energy program at the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group in New York.

"Giuliani is focused so much on supply, instead of dealing with demand and energy efficiency and conservation," Mr. Gupta said. "To pass anything through Congress, you need a balanced message."

Yet Myron Magnet, an audience member and the editor of City Journal, a Manhattan Institute publication, praised Mr. Giuliani's plan as "absolutely coherent."

Later yesterday, Mr. Giuliani was host of a reception at the Four Seasons to raise $2 million for his political action committee, Solutions America.

It drew 200 donors and friends, as well as Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

From the White House to Graceland

Bill Clinton was supposedly the biggest presidential Elvis Presley fan ever -- the Secret Service even code-named him "Elvis." But did he ever undertake a diplomatic mission to Graceland?

DOJ_NMG_0033817

No, sir! Instead, George W. Bush will become the first sitting president to visit the King's Memphis home when he and Laura escort Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi there June 30. The White House yesterday announced the plans for the awesomest road trip ever (except that they'll probably fly), slated for a day after the two heads of state and close pals meet in Washington. A little less conversation, a little more action . . .

The trip had to have been Koizumi's idea. The 64-year-old PM is well known as the most serious Elvis disciple of today's world leaders. He shares a birthday (Jan. 8) with the rock icon, and his brother once ran the Presley fan club's Yokohama chapter. In 1987, he was one of the key players in erecting a bronze statue of Presley in Tokyo. He's sung Elvis tunes poolside at Bush's Crawford ranch and dazzled Condi Rice with his knowledge of Elvis trivia at a G8 dinner. And in 2001, he released a 25-song compilation CD called "Junichiro Koizumi Presents: My Favorite Elvis Songs." It was sold only in Japan, and all proceeds went to charity.

Surely he had made the grand Memphis pilgrimage before? "This is his first time visiting Graceland as prime minister," a Japanese Embassy spokesman said. "I cannot confirm that he hasn't been there before."

Jack Soden , CEO of Elvis Presley Enterprises, said the only precedent for such a visit is when Jimmy and Rosalynn Carter stopped by, several years after he left office. "We're very excited," he said. "It will be another very fun day at Graceland."

Let's Move Along, Folks. It's Just a Little Typoe.

A campaign breakfast or presidential launch? A recent e-mail from Rep. J.D. Hayworth 's reelection campaign invited supporters to join the Arizona Republican, his wife and "The Honorable Dan Quayle , 44th President of the United States."

Whoa! How did we miss this? Mr. Potatoe Head running in 2008?

Well . . . no. Quayle was actually the 44th vice president, but a typo dropped the "vice" and started a buzz among startled GOPers who thought Quayle wanted to be the next -- that would be 44th -- president.

"We did have a couple people wondering if this was his big announcement," said Todd Sommers , Hayworth's campaign manager. A correction was quickly issued; at press time, the only heart-pounding element at the June 24 event will be the coffee.

Surreal Estate

Buyer: Tucker and Susan Carlson

Listing price: $ 3,995,000

Details : The host of MSNBC's "The Situation With Tucker Carlson" is bringing his show to Washington and will soon close on a 1939 fieldstone colonial in the Palisades. The couple made a killing last year when they sold their Alexandria home and moved to New Jersey for the show's launch; now they're moving their four kids into a six-bedroom, 7 1/2- bath home with a huge family room, back yard and heated pool.

Hey, Isn't That . . . ?

· Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton at the liberal schmooze fest for Peter Beinart , author of "The Good Fight." The Clintons book-ended Monday night's party at the Georgetown home of hosts Mark Penn and Nancy Jacobson. Hillary was in and out early; the former prez arrived an hour later after picking up an award from the National Association of Broadcasters.

· Sugar Ray Leonard maintaining his fighting weight at a steak restaurant. The former champion boxer, with his brother and sister-in-law Sunday at Morton's in Bethesda, ate salmon; his tablemates chose crab cakes and Porterhouse.

Strapped States Try New Route, Lease Toll Roads To Foreign Firms (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

ELKHART, Ind. -- Its official state motto is "the crossroads of America." Yet Indiana is about to turn over its entire toll road for the next 75 years to two foreign companies, making it more expensive to drive.

The decision to hand the Indiana Toll Road to an Australian and Spanish team for $3.8 billion at the end of this month has blown up into one of the biggest brawls here in a generation. It has unsettled the state's politics in the months before the November elections, pitting a governor who was President Bush's first budget director against the people of northern Indiana, which the highway passes through.

The decision also places Indiana at the leading edge of a nascent trend in which states and local governments are exploring the idea of privatizing parts of the United States' prized interstate highway system. The idea goes beyond projects, such as Northern Virginia's Dulles Greenway, in which states have turned to private companies to build or widen toll roads. Now, they are considering selling or leasing some of the best-known and most-traveled routes across America.

The trend started 1 1/2 years ago, when Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley (D) pushed through a 99-year lease of the Chicago Skyway, nearly eight miles of elevated highway across the South Side, for $1.8 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0033818

Since then, a New Jersey lawmaker has proposed selling a 49 percent interest in the New Jersey Turnpike and the Garden State Parkway. New York Gov. George E. Pataki (R) is trying to persuade the legislature to let investors rebuild or replace the Hudson River's Tappan Zee Bridge. In Houston, Harris County officials are studying leasing 57 miles of toll roads.

Locally, Virginia transportation officials announced last month that they would lease a debt-ridden toll road outside Richmond, the Pocahontas Parkway, to a private firm for $522 million.

Half a century after President Dwight D. Eisenhower persuaded the nation to build the interstate highway system, the allure of privatization is a rethinking of the relationship between the government and its roads. It reverses the view of highways as a public responsibility, ingrained since the first half of the 19th century, when states took over roads, bridges and canals that had gone bankrupt in private hands.

The Bush administration advocates the new view. "We are like a poker game," Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta said in an interview. "We are inviting more people to the table and saying, 'Bring money when you come.' " Such eagerness for private investment stems from the financial strains on an overburdened highway system at a time when the White House and the Republican-controlled Congress want to curb domestic spending. The interstate system is decaying, and traffic congestion has worsened. Inflation in the price of building and improving roads is rampant.

Most significantly, money from federal and state gasoline taxes that pay for roads are falling further behind the need, with no political appetite in an era of record gas prices to increase the rates. According to U.S. projections, the part of the federal Highway Trust Fund devoted to roads is to run out of money for the first time in its history in 2009.

In response, the administration persuaded Congress last summer to take steps to make it easier for the private sector to finance new roads -- and take over existing ones. Lawmakers removed several legal barriers to charging tolls on interstates and gave private investors new access to tax-free bonds for transportation projects.

Mineta has been urging U.S. financial institutions to get involved. "This type of dialogue really didn't exist two years ago," said Mark Florian, a managing director at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which was paid $19 million to negotiate the Indiana deal and has discussed similar possibilities with officials in more than 35 states.

Still, skepticism abounds: Will companies take good care of highways? Will toll roads become too expensive to drive? Will investors pluck profitable routes, leaving others to crumble? What will happen to public toll-road workers -- including 600 in Indiana who have been promised interviews by the new operators, but not the same job?

In Elkhart, resistance to such change runs deep. At a rest stop here on a recent day -- at Milepost 77 near the midpoint between Illinois and Ohio -- both Indiana drivers and interstate truckers were almost uniformly against what the state has done. "I heard that foreigners were going to lease it, and that sounds like a bad deal to me," said Kreig Eberle, 36, a truck driver from Chillicothe, Ill., who uses the toll road nearly every day. "I think it is kind of baloney. Indiana ought to run it itself."

Dankia McLaren, 22, a kitchen designer from nearby South Bend, said: "It is sad. . . . It is just going to make it more expensive to drive."

The passionate opposition has astonished the architect of the deal, Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. (R), Bush's first budget director.

Daniels said he had his "little epiphany" about the toll road in 2004, after he returned from Washington and was campaigning for governor. At a barbecue in rural western Indiana, a veteran of the state highway department came over and said: "You understand it's a joke, don't you."

The joke, he told Daniels, was that the state for years had a list of promised transportation projects that would never be built. Running on a platform of economic development, Daniels immediately viewed a roads program as a means of creating jobs and attracting business to spur Indiana's sagging economy.

Soon after taking office last year, the governor ordered his staff to compute the price of the pent-up projects -- $2.6 billion more, it turned out, than the state could afford -- and propose ways to pay for them. Of more than 30 options, Daniels said in an interview, generating money by leasing the 157-mile Indiana Toll Road was the only "real bold stroke that could substantially close this huge gap."

In the shower one morning, he came up a name for his plan: "Major Moves," borrowed from the title of a Hank Williams Jr. country song. The governor announced Major Moves in September, saying the state was open for bids on the toll road to raise money for a 10-year transportation plan.

Late in January, he invited legislators, builders, manufacturers, mayors and trade union leaders to his office in Indianapolis to disclose that the winning bid was $3.85 billion, more than enough to fund the state's road projects. The crowd burst into applause. "Everybody thought, that was that," Daniels recalled. "We can stop dreaming and start digging all these big projects."

But, Daniels had not anticipated what he calls "the x-word" -- for xenophobia -- or the protests or the bumper stickers that say, "Keep the Toll Road, Lease Mitch."

DOJ_NMG_0033819

"This was an authentic, spontaneous, very emotional reaction," the governor said, "and no interest group caused it."

The proposal stirred up one of the biggest fights the Indiana legislature had ever seen, with rallies and expensive media campaigns on both sides, and the governor unable to change minds at jammed town hall meetings in communities along the toll road where opposition was most fierce.

"Never in my legislative career will I ever again be faced with a [bill] quite like this," said the chief sponsor, state Rep. Randy Borror (R) of Fort Wayne, who walked the statehouse with thick notebooks filled with figures showing how much transportation money each legislator's district would get from the plan.

The winning bidders were Macquarie Infrastructure Group of Sydney, the same firm that controls the Dulles Greenway, and Cintra Concesiones de Infrastructures de Transporte S.A. of Madrid. Under the lease, the companies got the right to raise tolls -- which have not been increased in two decades -- for cars and trucks right away, and eventually to keep pace annually with inflation. The 103-page lease spells out the companies' responsibilities in meticulous detail, including clearing snow and road kill within specified times, and granting state police the right to patrol.

Steve Allen, Macquarie's chief executive, said the company, which operates toll roads in nine countries, has an incentive to improve the highways to attract more drivers. Since it took over the Chicago Skyway, he said, the company has built electronic toll booths sooner than required and made lane changes that reduce backups.

Indiana legislators were not reassured. Daniels and his allies made big compromises: extra money for each county along the toll road, a postponement of higher rates for cars until electronic tolls are installed, job-training money for economically depressed Gary. Even so, the plan passed the state House by one vote.

Three months after the legislation squeaked through, feelings remain raw.

"The whole thing stinks," said state Rep. B. Patrick Bauer, the House Democratic leader. The two companies, he said, "got a heck of an unbelievable deal. We got a bad deal."

Daniels's approval ratings have plummeted, from about 50 percent early last winter to 37 percent in the most recent polls. Borror said the issue "complicates the election" for state legislators in November.

"There are going to be a lot of states that fail at this," Borror said, "because they underestimate the amount of work it takes to get this bill passed." Even so, Daniels said, "I don't believe we'll ever [again] be able to do any one thing that will be as transformative and positive for the future of this state."

Israeli Missiles Kill 10 In Gaza (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

GAZA, June 13 — Eight Palestinian civilians were killed and more than 40 wounded Tuesday by an Israeli missile strike on Islamic militants riding in a van that Israeli officials said was carrying rockets to launch at Israel. Two men in the van were also killed, including a man the Israelis consider an important rocket maker.

The officials said the strike had prevented more of what has been a rising number of Palestinian missile attacks launched from Gaza. But the civilian casualties further inflamed Palestinian rage over eight deaths last week on a beach from what residents said was an errant Israeli shell. Seven of the dead were from one family.

In a news conference in Tel Aviv, Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, announced Tuesday that an investigation into the deaths on Friday showed that Israel was not to blame.

"We have enough findings to back up the suspicion that the intention to describe this as an Israeli event is simply not correct," he said, citing films, data on where and when the shells landed, and a piece of shrapnel taken from a victim. "The accumulating evidence proves that this incident was not due to Israeli forces."

The account was quickly disputed by officials from Human Rights Watch, who cited contrary evidence from an investigation of their own.

In the attack on Tuesday, one missile struck a van and killed two members of Islamic Jihad and apparently wounded a third. But a second missile fired shortly afterward hit the curb just in front of a house whose occupants had emerged to see what had happened, and members of the Mughrabi family and their neighbors were killed.

Two children and three medical workers died in the second explosion, after the first had destroyed the yellow Volkswagen van of a noted Islamic Jihad rocket maker, Hamoud Wadiya, who was killed. Israel said Mr. Wadiya was transporting Katyusha rockets to launch at Israel, and rockets were seen in the wreckage.

The Katyusha is a factory-made weapon of longer range and much greater accuracy than the crude Qassam rocket that Palestinian militants build in machine shops with explosives mixed in cooking pots.

DOJ_NMG_0033820

The Katyushas, Israel says, have been smuggled into the Gaza Strip from Egypt and represent a significantly enhanced danger to Israeli cities.

Since Israel withdrew from Gaza 10 months ago, scores of Qassam rockets have been launched from Gaza; Israel says there were 100 rockets fired last month. Between June 2004 and March 2006, eight Israelis, including three children, were killed in the attacks, the Israeli military says.

Israel says it has been forced to go after the launching sites because the Palestinian authorities have done nothing about them.

Palestinian militants say they launch the rockets in response to Israel's continuing campaign to capture or kill Palestinian militants from Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades.

After Tuesday's attack, a weeping Hekmat Mughrabi said her 30-year-old son, Ashraf, had died in her arms. Ashraf ran to the door after the first explosion, trying to calm children playing on the roof, she said. "He was shouting to the kids, 'Don't be afraid, don't be afraid!' " and had not even finished his sentence when the second missile hit, she told The Associated Press.

An angry Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, called the Israeli actions "state terrorism" and accused Israel of trying to "wipe out the Palestinian people."

Mr. Abbas, whose aides feel his support for talks is being undermined by the civilian death toll, said, "Every day there are martyrs, there are wounded people, all of them innocents, all of them bystanders."

The deaths are bound to make it harder for Mr. Abbas and the United States to persuade Hamas, which controls the Palestinian Authority, to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Palestinian-Israeli agreements, which are based on a permanent two-state solution.

Mr. Abbas will also find it more difficult to get Hamas to accept a referendum proposal that would at least implicitly recognize Israel.

There was pandemonium on Tuesday at Al Shifa Hospital, where the dead and the wounded were brought. Gunmen surged through the courtyard, firing weapons into the air, and banging on the door of the morgue to retrieve the bodies of their colleagues or family members.

They grabbed stretchers and paraded the corpses in impromptu marches around the hospital yards and into the streets, bearing the black banners of Islamic Jihad and the yellow ones of Fatah and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, to which Ashraf Mughrabi belonged.

In a gruesome scene, one Islamic Jihad militant smeared the blood of his dead colleague onto his rifle and lifted it high into the air. Amid the acrid smoke of burning tires, women shouted, "Death to Israel! Death to the occupation!"

After the explosion on the beach in Gaza on Friday, Hamas said it was abandoning its 16-month cease-fire with Israel, though Israeli officials insist that Hamas had started firing its own Qassams toward Israel a week before.

Human Rights Watch, which has been investigating the Israeli shelling in Gaza on Friday, said of the deaths, "The evidence we have gathered strongly suggests Israeli artillery fire was to blame." It called on Israel to open an independent investigation rather than relying on its own military.

An American expert working with Human Rights Watch, Marc Garlasco, is a former Pentagon official who did bomb damage assessment for the American military in Kosovo and worked for the Defense Intelligence Agency.

He said that he had visited the beach the day after the explosion, and that the crater size, the shrapnel and the location of injuries on the bodies all pointed to "a shell dropping from the sky, not explosives under the sand."

In an interview in Gaza, he said he had found shrapnel "consistent with a 155-mm. Israeli shell fired from a M109 howitzer," including one piece stamped "155mm."

Defense Minister Peretz and other Israeli military officials offered a different analysis.

They contended that the explosion on the beach occurred between 4:57 p.m. and 5:10 p.m. They based that on an array of films, not specifically identified but shown at the news conference in Tel Aviv. One film taken from seaward showed what the officials called normal activity on that stretch of beach, with the time stamped as late as 4:57. A later film stamped at 5:15 showed an ambulance arriving from a hospital about five minutes away.

Brig. Gen. Hezi Levy, Israel's surgeon general and one of the investigators, said that they had accounted for all but one of the shells fired that day, and that none of them had exploded during this time. He said the one unaccounted-for artillery shell was fired "much" before 4:57. Later, another military official specified that that shell was launched at 4:30.

"There is no chance that this shell caused such damage," the general said.

The news conference, however, did make clear that shelling had occurred near that time and place. The last shell fell, according to a photograph of the site marked with the artillery hits, at 4:48, several hundred yards north of the site of the deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0033821

General Levy said that four of those injured were taken to Israeli hospitals and that the single piece of shrapnel extracted from one of them did not match any munitions used that day.

The officials said they also reviewed other recent bombardments in the area and ruled out the possibility that an Israeli shell had landed there earlier and might have been set off by the Palestinian family.

Mr. Peretz and the others refused to speculate on what could have caused the explosion, though military officials have contended that Hamas may have planted land mines against Israeli commandos.

Mr. Peretz did not rule out the possibility of allowing outside experts review Israel's evidence, as Human Rights Watch demanded. But the army's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, said he did not see the need.

"What we are doing is very, very, very professional," he told reporters. "We don't need the assistance of anyone."

Israeli Airstrike Kills 11 Palestinians (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

GAZA CITY, June 13 -- An Israeli airstrike here Tuesday killed 11 Palestinians, including nine civilians, in the deadliest such attack this year.

Later in the day, the Israeli military said an internal investigation showed that it was not responsible for a deadly explosion on a Gaza beach last week that Palestinian officials have called a war crime.

Tuesday's airstrike occurred just before noon when an Israeli military aircraft fired one missile at a minibus near a busy intersection, killing two gunmen from the radical Islamic Jihad movement. Military officials said the car was transporting homemade missiles of the kind Islamic Jihad has been firing into southern Israel, a near-daily occurrence that has picked up in the past week.

Witnesses said a second missile, fired seven minutes later as a crowd gathered to help the wounded, sprayed shrapnel into the tin-roofed home of Ashraf al-Mughrabi, a 31-year-old barber who was standing outside his front door. The blast killed him instantly, as well as his 6-year-old son, Maher, and his 13-year-old nephew, Hisham. Nisreen al-Mughrabi, Ashraf's wife, was severely wounded.

Also killed in the explosion were four Palestinian medics who had rushed to the scene from the Mohammed al-Dura Children's Hospital a block away after hearing the first blast. Hours later, an angry funeral procession led by armed men from the Fatah party that Ashraf al-Mughrabi belonged to paraded to his home, bearing aloft his body on a makeshift stretcher, along with his son's body.

"They were like family, our comrades," Leila Fatoum, 39, an assistant administrator at the hospital, said of her colleagues.

The strike highlighted the sharp surge in the Israel-Palestinian conflict in recent weeks and came at a time when Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert have pledged to seek ways to return to peace talks, which were abandoned more than five years ago.

According to U.N. humanitarian monitors, the Israeli military has killed 32 Palestinians since the beginning of this month, fewer than half members of armed groups at war with Israel. An additional 109 Palestinians have been wounded, the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs reported.

Over the same period, Palestinian rockets have wounded 11 Israelis, one gravely, according to Magen David Adom, Israel's emergency service. The Israeli military reported that 38 rockets were launched toward Israel from Gaza in the 24-hour period before Tuesday's airstrike.

The armed confrontation between Israel and the Palestinian militias, including the armed wing of the radical Hamas movement now running the Palestinian government ministries, has coincided with a worsening internal conflict among the Palestinian parties. Deep partisan divisions within the security services have split its more than 70,000 members into rival camps, a combustible situation made worse by delays of more than three months in payment of salaries because of economic sanctions.

Fighting between Hamas and Fatah cooled Tuesday after security forces dominated by Fatah loyalists ransacked the Palestinian parliament and cabinet offices -- institutions controlled by Hamas -- in Ramallah the previous day.

The past five days have been particularly volatile ones in the territories.

On Friday, eight civilians picnicking on a beach here were killed in an explosion that Palestinian witnesses said was the result of an Israeli artillery shell. Israel has been firing artillery into Gaza, sometimes hundreds of shells a day, to put down the steady Palestinian rocket fire.

Six members of the Ghaliyah family perished in the blast, and Abbas later adopted the family's 11-year-old girl, Huda, whose desperation in the minutes after the explosion were caught on video and turned her into a symbol of the conflict for many Israelis and Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0033822

But Israeli defense officials said Tuesday that an internal investigation found that the military was not responsible for the explosion. In a news conference in Tel Aviv, Maj. Gen. Meir Kalifi, who led the inquiry, said it concluded that artillery shells that the Israel Defense Forces fired Friday afternoon could not have landed in the area where the family was picnicking.

"I can say, I can rule out, in a definite and unequivocal manner, the possibility that any kind of firing from the IDF during these hours, or others, is the source that caused the damage," said Kalifi, who is deputy commander of Israel's land forces.

Using maps to illustrate his points, Kalifi said that the military fired six artillery rounds toward the beach during the time in question and that all but the first landed more than 500 yards from the site of the fatal explosion. He said the investigation could not determine where the first shell landed, but he said it was fired at the same trajectory and in the same direction as the five others.

Kalifi also said that shrapnel taken from a Palestinian woman being treated for her wounds in Soroka Medical Center, in the Israeli city of Beersheba, did not come from a 155mm artillery round -- the kind fired that day.

Although Israeli military leaders did not officially accuse the Palestinians of responsibility for the explosion, military sources have indicated privately in recent days that the blast was the result of land mines that Hamas gunmen laid along the beach to prevent Israeli commandos from entering the area from the sea.

But a human rights investigator specializing in military affairs raised doubts about those claims during a news conference in Gaza.

Marc Garlasco, a senior military analyst with New York-based Human Rights Watch, said he had not compiled enough evidence to say definitively that the Israeli military fired the fatal shell. But he said shrapnel gathered at the site, the wound patterns on Palestinians treated in Gaza hospitals and the characteristics of the crater left by the blast indicated that the victims were killed by a 155mm artillery shell that fell on the beach.

"It is my contention that the most likely scenario is that the blast was the result of Israeli shells coming down on the beach," said Garlasco, whose military experience includes seven years with U.S. military intelligence.

Garlasco was in Gaza to investigate the Palestinian rocket fire and Israeli response. His presence here at the time of the explosion, he said, was coincidental.

He said he examined the site a day after the explosion and acknowledged that wind and the number of people who trampled the area after the blast made conclusions difficult. Nevertheless, he said shrapnel he found lodged in a car near the explosion and other samples collected by the Palestinian bomb-disposal unit made clear it was from a 155mm shell.

He said the size and depth of the crater -- roughly seven feet in diameter and six to eight inches deep -- suggested it was from a falling shell. He said he compared it with other craters left by Israeli artillery on the beach, a frequent target because of its use by Palestinian rocket launchers, and the sizes were similar.

Garlasco also said most of the 30 people injured in the explosion suffered from wounds to the torso and head, while a land mine generally does the most damage to the lower body. But he said he could not rule out that the shell had been left on the ground.

Gaza Conflicts Gain Deadly Momentum (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, June 14, 2006

GAZA CITY, GAZA AND JERUSALEM

Hours after the Israeli military announced Tuesday that it was not responsible for the deadly explosion on a Gaza beach Friday, two more Israeli army missiles struck a van near Gaza's Jabalya Refugee Camp Tuesday, killing 11 people, including two children and two paramedics who arrived after the first strike.

Israeli military officials say the car was carrying Islamic Jihad militants who were on the way to launch Kassam rockets into southern Israel, which has come under a shower of rockets in recent days.

The cross-border arms volley - as well as worsening strife among Palestinians - has gained a deadly momentum since late last week, setting up a dynamic that may put prospects for dialogue among all the parties further out of reach.

Late Monday night, Palestinians loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah party set fire to the parliament building and other West Bank cabinet offices - many of them unused by Hamas cabinet ministers, including Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, because most are barred by Israel from leaving Gaza. On the same night in Gaza, Hamas gunmen tried to storm a compound run by the Preventive Security Service, which is closely affiliated with Fatah.

Some Palestinians eyeing the spiraling violence blame Fatah, the mainstream faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), previously led by the late Yasser Arafat, for refusing to accept the ascent of Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0033823

"It never entered the mind of Fatah that they should accept the Hamas success in elections, so they will do whatever they want to topple the Hamas government," says Abdel Sattar Qassem, a political scientist at An-Najah University in the West Bank city of Nablus. "We have the additional, internal factor that the US and Israel are pressuring Fatah to topple Hamas," he charges. "Every day, Fatah is doing something to create chaos in the street, so things will deteriorate as long as Hamas is in power. Israel, the US, and also Fatah have an interest in that."

Of course, it is Hamas - not Fatah - that is lobbing Kassam rockets over the border, something Israeli leaders hoped would be less justifiable once Israel pulled troops and settlers out of Gaza, as it did last August. Since the beach attack Friday, which killed seven members of the Ghaliya family, more than 80 Palestinian rockets have fallen on Israel, causing two serious injuries.

After an investigation, the Israel army said Friday's bloodshed was not the result of a misfired shell, as previously reported, but of explosives laid by Hamas with the intention of attacking the Israeli navy, which patrols the coast. Palestinian officials said such an explanation was highly unlikely.

Who is actually at fault may never be entirely clear, and may matter little now: Palestinians blame Israel and say their "farms have been turned into graveyards" in the words of Ghassan Ghabil, who sat at the mourning tent for his uncle and cousins killed in Friday's bloodshed on the beach.

Israelis lay responsibility at the feet of Hamas and other like-minded militants, who have stepped up rocket attacks nearly a year since the disengagement plan was carried out. Hamas has declared its cease-fire with Israel over, but Hamas spokesmen declined to say what that might mean, insisting that such questions are in the realm of the organization's military wing, the Izz ed-Din al Qassam Brigades.

On Monday, Palestinian parliament members began their session as usual - divided. They sat half in Gaza, half in the West Bank, patched together by videocameras that broadcast with a strange, jumpy lag that makes it seem as if the other territory may as well be thousands of miles away.

But the division that doesn't feel business-as-usual is the yawning ideological divide, separating Palestinians who support forging a two-state solution with Israel from Palestinians who see no chance of permanent peace with the Jewish state.

Moreover, there has been a decline in the usual respect between what, in Palestinian terms, could be considered "both sides of the aisle" - Fatah and Hamas.

Hamas, which holds 74 seats of the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC), had called an emergency meeting to pass a law to try to prevent Fatah's Abbas from holding a referendum, which he announced by presidential decree over the weekend.

Angered by this affront to the president's authority, Fatah legislators staged a walkout from the meeting. "Fatah withdrew from the session because this is an illegal meeting," says Ashraf Juma, a PLC member who was pursued by reporters on the plaza outside Gaza parliamentary meeting hall. "The parliament has no right to discuss the referendum and try to ban it. Today's session means they are confusing executive and legislative powers."

Mr. Juma says that despite the difficulties, Abbas will succeed in his plans to hold the referendum on July 26. The referendum is meant to gauge Palestinian support for the prisoners' document, which some people say implies support for a two-state solution. Prisoners from Hamas and Islamic Jihad say Abbas has extrapolated too much, and have withdrawn their names from the document.

"There is a determination by President Abbas to go ahead with the referendum," says Juma, "and we know from experience that if he wants something to happen on time, as he did with the elections, it will happen."

Analysts say that it isn't really the meaning of the prisoners' document - or even the question of whether Palestinians support a two-state solution with Israel - that is most at stake. Some observers say Abbas would use the results of the referendum to declare that most Palestinians support a return to peacemaking with Israel. Afterwards, Abbas could dismiss the government and call new elections.

After the Fatah walkout, Hamas legislators decided to postpone the vote until June 20 in order to give compromise talks - what Palestinians call the "national dialogue" - more time. But amid daily gun battles, a short-lived spate of kidnappings, and the protest resignation Tuesday of the single Christian government minister in the Hamas-led government, the sounds of dialogue are becoming harder to hear.

The Abbas-Hamas Problem (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 14, 2006

AS PRESIDENT BUSH WAS PREPARING to pay a surprise visit to Iraq, where he arrived Tuesday and where the news lately has broken his way, U.S. interests were taking a beating on another front in the Middle East. Unhappily for the president, the bad news from the West Bank and Gaza — the site of the proposed Palestinian state that he envisions existing alongside Israel — is also bad news for the U.S. mission in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0033824

For some time, progress toward the elusive objective of an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement has been frustrated by the schism between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement and Hamas, the rejectionist Islamic party that took control of the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet in elections in January. The split also has endangered international humanitarian assistance to ordinary Palestinians.

Hamas refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist. Such recognition was the price former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat had to pay to be taken seriously by the Jewish state and by the United States, and it paid dividends in the 1993 agreement signed on the White House lawn and the creation of the Palestinian Authority. Abbas, Arafat's heir, has tried to put Hamas on the defensive with his proposal for a July 26 referendum on a two-state solution. Hamas views the proposed referendum as illegal.

Deadlock gave way to open conflict after the death last week of eight Palestinian civilians on a beach in Gaza, initially attributed to a wayward Israeli artillery round. (On Tuesday, Israeli military officials suggested that the blast was caused by an explosive device buried in the sand at some earlier time by either Israelis or Palestinians.) On Monday, Fatah followers ransacked and set fire to the offices of the Hamas-led government in Ramallah on the West Bank and briefly kidnapped a Hamas lawmaker. In Gaza, Hamas fighters attacked a building belonging to a Fatah-dominated police force. Abbas announced a state of alert in all of the Palestinian-ruled territories and ordered a security crackdown.

A Palestinian civil war would be a geopolitical as well as a humanitarian disaster. It would invite further military involvement by Israel, which drew Palestinian ire Tuesday with an airstrike on suspected militants in Gaza that killed eight civilian bystanders. And it would increase support in Israel for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's suggestion that Israel unilaterally draw new Israeli-Palestinian boundaries.

The Bush administration, which has reacted cautiously to Olmert's proposal, may need to urge both Israel and Abbas to exercise restraint in the next few days — and not only to preserve its options in that arena. There is also an Iraq connection.

It's simplistic to argue, as some critics of U.S. foreign policy do, that anti-Americanism in Iraq and the Middle East is grounded exclusively or even primarily in resentment of Israel. But it's equally simplistic to ignore the fact that the Palestinian cause has been embraced — sometimes sincerely, sometimes cynically — by millions of Arabs and Muslims. A bloodbath in the West Bank and Gaza — even a fratricidal one — would have ominous echoes for the United States elsewhere, including Iran and, yes, Iraq.

U.S. Sanctions 4 Chinese Firms For Aiding Iran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a sign of the Bush administration's focus on constraining Tehran's ability to produce nonconventional weapons, the Treasury Department sanctioned four Chinese companies, saying they had aided Iran's ballistic-missile programs.

The U.S. moves underscore the complexities Washington faces as it seeks to contain Iran. The Bush administration depends on China to support multilateral talks to freeze Tehran's nuclear program and is concerned about Beijing's support of Iran's weapons development.

"The companies targeted today have supplied Iran's military and Iranian proliferators with missile-related and dual-use components," said Stuart Levey, the undersecretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence.

The four Chinese state-owned companies are Beijing Alite Technologies Co., LIMMT Economic and Trade Co., China National Precision Machinery Import/Export Corp., and China Great Wall Industry Corp., or CGWIC. The U.S. also cited CGWIC's Torrance, Calif., U.S. subsidiary, G.W. Aerospace Inc. The Treasury froze the companies' U.S. assets, and barred U.S. companies, banks and individuals from doing business with them.

The State Department had sanctioned all four companies for aiding Iran's weapons programs, but the earlier measures had banned only the U.S. government from dealing with the firms. The Treasury said the companies supplied dual-use technologies and financial support to three Iranian companies the U.S. believes are developing missile systems: Shahid Bakeri Industrial Group, Shahid Hemmat Industrial Group and Aerospace Industries Organization, or AIO.

The Treasury described the AIO as a subsidiary of Iran's Ministry of Defense and the overall manager of Iran's missile programs. Many of Iran's missiles are based on designs supplied by North Korea.

Many world powers hold differing interests in its dealings with Iran. China depends on Iran for oil and natural gas. The two countries have developed a close military relationship. Tehran and Beijing are wary of the Bush administration's efforts to promote democracy and free media within their borders. Beijing, concerned about its own domestic standing, is unlikely to support a U.S. policy toward Iran that encourages regime change.

DOJ_NMG_0033825

Some Democrats See A Political Motivation In Bush Focus On Iran (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, June 14, 2006

Some Democrats on Capitol Hill say that the White House's recent focus on Iran is a political ploy aimed at boosting the president's low approval ratings.

The rhetorical exchanges between Washington and Tehran about Iran's alleged effort to obtain nuclear weapons has cooled somewhat as a floated compromise on the thorny issue has not been outrightly rejected by the Middle Eastern country.

Still, Democrats point out that the Iran situation could be a win-win for Bush. If he brokers a deal Bush can claim victory, and if it falls apart it would set up an opportunity for the president to talk about homeland security and terrorism in the lead-up to the election.

While Democrats are quick to point out that keeping nuclear weapons out of Iran's hands is extremely important, some of them say that politics are playing a significant role in the administration's foreign-policy initiative. For those Democrats, the situation is reminiscent of the period before the vote on the war in Iraq.

Many administration critics remember when then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card was asked why the administration waited until after Labor Day to try to sell the American people on military action against Iraq in 2002. Card replied, "From a marketing point of view, you don't introduce new products in August."

House Democrats, who have high hopes of gaining the majority this fall, are much more vocal about their concern that the administration's approach toward Iran is a political stunt than their counterparts in the upper chamber.

Rep. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.), a centrist and a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said that some of his Democratic colleagues have mentioned to him that they are concerned the current situation with Iran "looks a lot like the whole scenario prior to the use-of-force vote on Iraq."

"People suspect [Bush is] doing it for political reasons rather than national-security reasons," Taylor said. "There's definitely concern among my colleagues. There's a concern that [administration officials] see a vote on use of force on Iran as a Hail Mary pass before November elections."

Taylor added that it is a fair question to ask whether the debate on Iran is political.

"At best they misled me and at worst they lied to me about weapons of mass destruction" in Iraq, he said. "There could be a vote on use of force in Iran, [but] I want them to be forthright with the American people."

Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), another member of the Armed Services Committee, said, "The whole issue of diplomacy is to engage in dialogue and to understand that there are going to be rhetorical flourishes on all sides."

But Abercrombie said there are election concerns in play: "It is to give the appearance of reasonableness on part of the U.S. while winking at the [conservative] base."

Meanwhile, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), ranking member of the House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, said that the administration's earlier approach to Iran's alleged nuclear-weapon ambitions was "absurd."

"When they said those cowboy words, it had a detrimental effect on foreign policy," Murtha added. "We are the most unpopular country in the world."

Murtha, a Marine veteran and a hawk, has become an outspoken critic of the war in Iraq. He emphasized that the United States has no other alternative in Iran than the diplomatic path. Military action would be out of the question, he said. "Iran is three times bigger than Iraq."

The House this spring passed a bill imposing greater sanctions on Iran, causing several Democrats to object to it as a stepping-stone to war.

"By sanctioning foreign countries and companies that have economic relations with Iran, this bill sanctions the very countries we need for a strong diplomatic effort," said Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.)

"I feel a sense of déjà vu this morning," he said at the time.

In his floor address, Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) said, "I know it is an election year, and I know President Bush's ratings are at an all-time low. … Nevertheless, I call upon my colleagues and the president to resist the temptation to start yet another war … and I define bombing from 40,000 feet as war."

But a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) said that Iran is not a problem exacerbated by the GOP.

"Virtually the entire world recognizes the potential threat that exist with Iran," said Ed Patru, an NRCC spokesman. "Democrats can't understand the concept of conducting foreign policy and prosecuting the war on terror without polls and focus groups."

He charged that the Democrats have for decades voted to undercut the military and weaken the defense community.

DOJ_NMG_0033826

Democrats are not the only ones raising concerns about the timing of the Iran discussions. In April, Texas Rep. Ron Paul, one of six House Republicans to vote against the Iraq war, said, "It is frightening to see how easily Congress, the media and the people accept many of the same arguments against Iran that were used to justify an invasion of Iraq."

The intelligence failures before the Iraq war prompted Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to seek greater transparency from the Bush administration about possible threats posed by Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Reid, at a bloggers convention in Las Vegas over the weekend, said that he wants to prevent possible misuse of intelligence as the administration deals with the crisis and that he plans to introduce legislation next week on the issue. His bill would require a new national intelligence estimate for Iran, as well as an unclassified summary that could form the basis for a public debate about possible action if Tehran continues to seek nuclear weapons.

But Reid said in a short interview that he does not think Bush would intensify the rhetoric on Iran to gain approval ratings.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said several factors are in play when it comes to the administration's position toward Iran. One is political, to prove that it can handle international relations and that the circumstances demand diplomatic action.

"The reality in Iraq has forced them to reconsider what they can do in Iran," Reed said. "This is the only practical action they can take now rather than talking about regime change."

Larry Sabato, the director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, said Democrats should tread cautiously on Iran: "Democrats have a great issue in Iraq, but on Iran complaints about politicizing could backfire. Almost everybody views Iran as a big problem and solidly very anti-American."

The White House did not comment for this article.

Global Image Of The U.S. Is Worsening, Survey Finds (NYT)

By Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 13 — As the war in Iraq continues for a fourth year, the global image of America has slipped further, even among people in some countries closely allied with the United States, a new opinion poll has found.

Favorable views of the United States dropped sharply over the past year in Spain, where only 23 percent said they had a positive opinion, down from 41 percent last year, according to the survey. It was done in 15 nations, including the United States, this spring by the Washington-based Pew Research Center.

Other countries where positive views dropped significantly include India (56 percent, down from 71 percent); Russia (43 percent, down from 52 percent); and Indonesia (30 percent, down from 38 percent). In Turkey, only 12 percent said they held a favorable opinion, down from 23 percent last year.

Declines were less steep in France, Germany and Jordan, while people in China and Pakistan had a slightly more favorable image of the United States this year than last. In Britain, Washington's closest ally in the Iraq war, positive views of America have remained in the mid-50-percent range in the past two years, down sharply from 75 percent in 2002, before the war.

Support for the fight against terrorism led by the United States is also down, Pew found.

Although strong majorities in several countries expressed worries about Iran's nuclear intentions, in 13 of 15 countries polled, most people said the war in Iraq posed more of a danger to world peace. Russians held that view by a 2-to-1 margin.

"Obviously, when you get many more people saying that the U.S. presence in Iraq is a threat to world peace as say that about Iran, it's a measure of how much Iraq is sapping good will to the United States," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center.

The latest declines came after a year in which anti-American sentiment had slightly receded, aided by good feeling over aid for tsunami victims and political progress in Iraq.

The polling was conducted before the completion last week of the Iraqi government or the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

These were some other findings:

{paragraf}After Hamas's victory in the Palestinian elections, Germans, in a reversal, said they sympathized more with Israel than with the Palestinians. Support for Israel also rose in France, to 38 percent from 20 percent.

{paragraf}After the immigrants' riots and job protests in France, people in every country but one — the United States — said they held dimmer views of the French. The number of Americans favorably impressed by France rose to 52 percent, from 29 percent in 2003, when the French angered many Americans by refusing to back the war in Iraq.

{paragraf}Only 75 percent of Americans had heard reports of abuses at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and at the American naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, while 90 percent of Western Europeans and Japanese had heard about them.

DOJ_NMG_0033827

Many respondents distinguished between their largely negative feelings about President Bush and their feelings about Americans in general.

Majorities in 7 of 14 countries polled, not including the United States, had favorable views of Americans, led by Japan, at 82 percent, and Britain, at 69 percent. But majorities in just two countries, India and Nigeria, expressed confidence in Mr. Bush.

After a tumultuous year in Iraq and Afghanistan, the fight against terrorism is now backed by more than 50 percent of people only in Russia and India, while support has virtually collapsed in Japan, the poll found. People in the United States were not asked this question. But as leading powers seek ways to contain the Iranian nuclear program, the poll found strong majorities in Western Europe, Japan, and India sharing underlying American concerns. The percentages of people in Britain, France and Spain who view Tehran as a threat have roughly tripled in three years.

More than 9 in 10 Americans, Germans, Japanese and French opposed Iran's acquiring nuclear arms.

Pew surveyed 16,710 people from March 31 to May 14 in Britain, China, Egypt, France, Germany, India, Indonesia, Japan, Jordan, Nigeria, Pakistan, Russia, Spain, Turkey and the United States. The margin of error was two to four percentage points in every country except Britain and Germany, where it was six points.

U.S. Warms To Hague Tribunal (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. is quietly beginning to accept the International Criminal Court, the Hague tribunal that President Bush repudiated in 2002, as the White House seeks to temper criticism that it considers itself unbound by international law.

That new approach will be on display today, when the ICC's chief prosecutor reports to the United Nations Security Council on his investigation into alleged war crimes in Darfur. The U.S., which now considers the ICC perhaps the only chance to bring Darfur war criminals to justice, will attend the briefing. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton, for years among the ICC's harshest critics, will send a deputy.

The move comes as the Bush administration softens its stance toward multilateral diplomacy on many fronts, seen most recently in the decision to offer negotiations with Iran.

U.S. officials concede they can't delegitimize a court that now counts 100 member countries, including such allies as Australia, Britain and Canada. While insisting the Bush administration will never allow Americans to be tried by the court, "we do acknowledge that it has a role to play in the overall system of international justice," John Bellinger, the State Department's chief lawyer, said in an interview.

That is a far cry from the tone President Bush took during his 2004 re-election campaign, when he blasted the court during a presidential debate. "It's a body based in The Hague where unaccountable judges and prosecutors can pull our troops or diplomats up for trial," he said. "I just think trying to be popular, kind of, in the global sense, if it's not in our best interest makes no sense."

In a May speech, Mr. Bellinger said "divisiveness over the ICC distracts from our ability to pursue these common goals" of fighting genocide and crimes against humanity.

When the ICC opened in 2002, Washington treated the independent war-crimes tribunal as a threat. President Bush signed legislation cutting aid to certain countries that refused to immunize Americans from court proceedings -- and authorizing the use of military force to free any Americans, should they ever be arrested by the court.

Bush administration officials felt the tribunal was at odds with their vision of international law and multilateral institutions. They prefer that countries apply their own versions of international law in their own courts. One example is the Iraqi Special Tribunal, which the U.S.-backed Baghdad regime favored over an international court to prosecute ousted dictator Saddam Hussein.

The ICC represents a different model, one it traces to the international tribunal at Nuremberg that tried Nazi war criminals.

The ICC was conceived at a 1998 U.N. conference in Rome, six years after the Security Council established a war-crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the first of several ad hoc courts for specific conflicts. Delegates hoped a single, permanent court for crimes against humanity would help institutionalize emerging doctrines of international law -- and would be less expensive than setting up a court from scratch for each future war zone.

The U.S. delegation managed to impose some checks on the court's power, but failed to force a requirement for Security Council approval before the court could launch a prosecution. Nevertheless, in December 2000 the U.S. signed the treaty establishing the court. President Clinton said that while the treaty had "significant flaws," signing it symbolized America's commitment to punish war criminals, and allowed Washington "to influence the evolution of the court."

DOJ_NMG_0033828

But along with such treaties as the Kyoto Protocol on climate change and the Antiballistic Missile Treaty, the incoming Bush administration considered the ICC treaty, known as the Rome Statute, an impingement on U.S. sovereignty. Mr. Bolton, then an undersecretary of state, personally signed the letter renouncing the treaty. During Mr. Bush's first term, Mr. Bolton orchestrated a diplomatic campaign to obtain immunity agreements from foreign governments, pledging not to cooperate with the ICC should it pursue an American.

The U.S. position began to force conflicts with allies. Several, including Mexico, have refused to sign U.S. immunity agreements. That has led to cutoffs of some military assistance, including a program that brings foreign military officers to the U.S. for training.

But some officials now say the immediate loss of military relations is a greater concern than the speculative danger that the ICC could pursue an American for war crimes. In recent weeks, officials from the Defense and State departments have been briefing congressional staffers on proposals to loosen the limits on foreign aid.

At the same time, ICC Chief Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo -- a prominent Argentine lawyer who has taught at Harvard and Stanford -- "seems to be going to great lengths to avoid stirring up the ire of the United States," says a Bush administration official who monitors the court.

In particular, the official said, Washington took note when in February Mr. Moreno-Ocampo rejected complaints activists had filed with the ICC accusing the U.S. of atrocities in Iraq. "The death of civilians during an armed conflict, no matter how grave and regrettable, does not in itself constitute a war crime," Mr. Moreno-Ocampo wrote, absent such factors as the deliberate targeting of civilians.

In Darfur, militias backed by the Sudanese government are accused of systematically attacking thousands of villages. It is that case that the U.S. is looking to see what Mr. Moreno-Ocampo can deliver.

The U.S. has called the Darfur militia campaign "genocide," and last year proposed establishing an ad-hoc international court for atrocities there. But European Union countries argued that the ICC was created precisely for such situations as Darfur.

Sudan is not an ICC member, so under the Rome Statute, the court could only act there if requested by the U.N. Security Council. With Britain and France refusing to consider alternatives to the ICC, Washington had to choose which it considered worse: lending the ICC the prestige that would come with a Security Council referral, or leaving atrocities in Darfur unpunished.

When the referral came before the Council in March 2005, the U.S. abstained, allowing investigations to proceed.

In an interview at the time, Antonio Cassese, the Italian jurist who headed a U.N. inquiry on Darfur, called it "a turning point" for both the fledgling court and the U.S.

Secretary of State "Condoleezza Rice deserves a lot of credit" for "a wise and well-balanced position," Mr. Cassese said. "She did not give in to those people...who are ideologically opposed to the ICC."

U.S. Military Broke Law By Transporting Convicted Marine Through Irish Airport (AP)

By Shawn Pogatchnik, Associated Press

AP, June 14, 2006

DUBLIN, Ireland – The U.S. military violated Irish law by transporting a convicted U.S. Marine through Shannon Airport without government permission, Foreign Minister Dermot Ahern announced Tuesday.

The episode – discovered when a cleaner spotted the man, in handcuffs and military fatigues, on the plane at the airport – underscored Irish suspicions that the U.S. military also could be ferrying munitions and terrorism suspects through this officially neutral nation.

U.S. Ambassador James Kenny confirmed that a U.S. Marine, who had been convicted of stealing by a U.S. military tribunal in Kuwait, was being transported Sunday under guard on a Defense Department-chartered aircraft. He said the military should have sought written permission from Ireland's Justice Department to bring the convict into Irish airspace but failed to do so.

“We regret that this incident happened and are reviewing procedures closely with Irish authorities to ensure that this does not happen again,” said Kenny, who pledged that all future U.S. military and chartered troop transports refueling in Shannon would be “completely transparent and in conformity with Irish law and the wishes of the Irish government.”

Ahern, who summoned Kenny for an explanation Monday night, said: “This failure, though inadvertent, is unacceptable. It is a matter of gravest concern to the Irish government.”

He said the legal breach was particularly sensitive because of widespread suspicions that the Central Intelligence Agency was using Shannon – a strategically located, trans-Atlantic refueling point – for transporting al-Qaeda and Taliban suspects. Both the Irish and U.S. governments have denied this.

DOJ_NMG_0033829

Ireland's practice of permitting U.S. military troop carriers bound for Iraq to refuel at Shannon has been deeply controversial. This is the first time, however, that the government has formally accused U.S. authorities of overstepping the limits of Irish neutrality.

The Irish government has defended its help for U.S. military flights on the grounds that Ireland permits aircraft from any country to land here, as long as they are not carrying weapons. A battalion of Irish soldiers was deployed around the airport's perimeter in February 2003 after protesters vandalized two U.S. aircraft.

About 330,000 U.S. troops traveled through Shannon in 2005, a record high, and paid Ireland's airport authority $34 million in taxes and other fees for the access. In March, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice reassured Ahern that the CIA was not using Shannon as a transit point for the so-called "rendition" of terrorism suspects.

But opposition politicians and human rights activists have demanded that Irish police be permitted to search CIA- and Defense Department-chartered aircraft to confirm whether suspects or U.S. munitions are on board.

Mark Kelly, director of the Irish Council for Civil Liberties, said the case of the Marine convict "highlights the need for an effective system of monitoring and inspection of suspect flights, which is the only way of ensuring that, even inadvertently, Ireland will not collude in future rendition flights."

Sinn Fein, the party linked to the outlawed Irish Republican Army, called for the government to ban all U.S. troop carriers and CIA aircraft from Irish airspace. Sinn Fein lawmaker Aengus O Snodaigh said the United States was "a law onto itself when it comes to human rights violations."

US "not Ready" For Chávez Oil Ban Threat (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, June 14, 2006

A Venezuelan embargo on oil exports to the US would lead to an immediate 15 per cent surge in world oil prices and crimp economic growth in the short term, according to a US congressional investigation.

The study by the Government Accountability Office, Congress's non-partisan investigative agency, obtained by the Financial Times before its release this month, warns that the US is inadequately prepared for a potential loss of oil from Venezuela. The investigation was requested 18 months ago by Senator Richard Lugar, Republican chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, reflecting growing concerns about the reliability of Venezuelan oil supplies.

Mr Lugar, who has described energy as a national security issue, introduced legislation in March that called on the US to expand its international co-operation on energy issues. The findings are likely to embolden his efforts.

Hugo Chávez, president of the world's fifth largest oil exporting country, has threatened to "cut off" oil shipments to the US if Washington continues, as he alleges, to "plot" his overthrow.

Venezuela supplies 11 per cent of US oil imports while Petróleos de Venezuela (Pdvsa), the state-owned oil company, wholly owns five refineries in the US and partly owns four others through its subsidiary, Citgo.

A production shutdown by managers of Pdvsa in a political dispute with the Chávez government cut supplies to the US for three months in early 2003, just before the US-led invasion of Iraq.

Disruption to these supplies, the GAO report warns, would boost oil prices significantly. "A loss of 2.2m barrels a day of crude oil for six months," the report said, "would, all else remaining equal, result in a crude oil price spike of up to $11 a barrel in the early stages of the disruption."

This increase, equal to about 15 per cent over current prices of about $70 a barrel, would cut US economic output by about $23bn, the report estimated.

The warnings from the GAO come as lawmakers from both parties struggle to boost US energy independence in an attempt to address public anger over high petrol prices.

A disruption or cut in Venezuelan oil supplies could also have a political impact. In the past two years, Venezuelan officials have floated the idea of selling Citgo's assets in the US. The Venezuelan-owned refineries' closure, at least temporarily, would be likely to prompt major diplomatic repercussions, the GAO warned. "If closing the refineries was deemed a threat to US national security, Venezuela could potentially face sanctions by the US government."

The draft GAO report is still subject to final revision by the departments of energy or state.

Short-term options available to Washington to mitigate a disruption to Venezuelan oil supplies, the GAO said, could include use of the US Strategic Petroleum Reserve and attempts to persuade other oil-exporting countries to increase output. Industry experts believe, however, only Saudi Arabia, the largest oil producer, enjoys any significant amount of idle capacity.

In contrast to Mr Chávez, lower-ranking Venezuelan officials have insisted that the country is a reliable supplier of oil. In the short term, Venezuela would also find it difficult to shift its oil to other countries for technical reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0033830

Venezuela's heavy crude oil is suited to its refineries in the US. But Mr Chavez's suggestions that he could divert oil exports to China are unrealisable, analysts say, because Chinese refineries are not configured to process Venezuela's heavy crude. Transport costs would also be much higher.

A cut in oil exports would also lead to economic ructions in Venezuela, a factor that casts doubt on the probability of such a scenario. Mr Chávez is dependent on oil for his political survival. Oil accounts for half of Venezuelan government income and 80 per cent of export revenue.

Nevertheless, the GAO also warned of long-term consequences for the US. "The US government's programmes and activities to ensure a reliable long-term supply of oil from Venezuela have been discontinued," it said.

Venezuela is currently almost doubling tax rates on most foreign-operated oilfields, a move that could discourage future investment and reduce output.

The GAO said Venezuelan oil production had fallen by 16 per cent since 2001, to about 2.6m b/d. Venezuelan officials say output is above 3m b/d.

Members of Congress frequently request GAO studies to help bolster the case for their policy proposals.

"Oil exporting states wield power for which we must account," he said at the time. "Not working with these states will lead to unproductive political showdowns and conflict. Even in challenging relationships such as Venezuela and Russia, we must explore how to improve our energy dialogue."

Mr Lugar has suggested co-ordination with China and India as they develop strategic petroleum reserves and proposed a western hemisphere energy forum to promote co-operation.

Report Cites U.S. Vulnerability To Venezuela Oil-Flow Disruption (WSJ)

By David Luhnow

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Current high oil prices and a lack of new energy supplies make the U.S. economy more vulnerable than ever to short-term and long-term disruptions in oil supplies from Venezuela, according to a draft report by the Government Accountability Office.

The report tries to measure how vulnerable the U.S. is to both short-term and longer-term disruptions in the flow from Venezuela, where President Hugo Chávez has been a vociferous critic of U.S. policy. It calculates, for instance, that a six-month stoppage of Venezuelan output would lead to a short-term price spike of $11 a barrel of oil and cost the U.S. economy some $23 billion. Such a stark turn is unlikely, however, because Mr. Chávez relies on the U.S. as his biggest buyer of oil and needs the revenue to fund half his government's populist agenda.

Commissioned in 2004 by Sen. Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the report is likely to add to concern in Washington about dependence on foreign oil supplies at a time of high energy prices and rising demand, when even a modest supply shock could cause a further price spike and inflict pain on the U.S. economy. The Wall Street Journal obtained a draft copy of the report, which is due to be released in June.

"In this context, the United States faces challenges in the coming years that may require hard choices regarding energy sources, foreign relations and energy-related diplomacy, and the amount of energy we use," the report concludes.

Perhaps the biggest problem it highlights concerns longer-term oil supplies from the Andean nation. Despite boasting the largest oil reserves outside the Middle East, Venezuelan oil production has fallen to about 2.6 million barrels a day from an average of about 3.1 million barrels a day in 2001, according to U.S. government figures. The Venezuelan government disputes those figures and says output is higher.

While Venezuelan exports to the U.S. have held steady over the past few years, less Venezuelan oil on world markets would increase pressure on international oil prices. The report calls this possibility "a concern for U.S. energy security, especially in light of current tight supply and demand conditions in the world oil market."

The report says Venezuelan output is likely to continue to decline because the country is relying less on private oil companies to boost output and more on state-run oil company Petróleos de Venezuela SA, which has become highly politicized under Mr. Chávez. The company, known as PDVSA, faces a host of problems: It must manage a portfolio of older fields that are in decline, is spending increasing amounts of its budget on social programs and is relying more on other state-run oil firms rather than private companies that are generally more efficient.

With the exception of Canada, virtually all the U.S.'s top sources of oil present headaches of one kind or another for Washington. Mexico, the U.S.'s No. 2 supplier, may have less oil to export in coming years as its production declines and its own economy soaks up more oil. Saudi Arabia sits in the politically charged Middle East, and Nigeria has problems with rebel attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0033831

Venezuela was long considered the most secure source for oil, but that has changed under Mr. Chávez, a fiery leftist who has made operating conditions tougher for foreign oil companies and is using an oil bonanza to help alleviate poverty at home and to cobble together a bloc of anti-American countries in South America. Sen. Lugar, an Indian Republican, has been one of many vocal critics of Mr. Chávez but has recently struck a pragmatic tone about the Venezuelan leader. The senator recently proposed creating a regional council including the U.S., Venezuela, Brazil and Mexico to guarantee the stability of energy supplies.

Crude Calculations In Oil's New Era, Power Shifts To Countries With Reserves (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, June 14, 2006

There is more to today's oil crunch than temporary jolts to supply and demand. What is also roiling the energy world is an enduring shift in the balance of power between the fuel-guzzling West and oil-rich developing countries.

Since World War II, the industrialized world has relied on stable and affordable supplies of crude to fuel economic growth. The U.S., Europe and Japan together needed more oil than they could produce. The developing world had plenty of oil, but little use for it and few alternative markets. So industrialized countries tapped the cheap resources of poor ones.

Now this mutual dependency is unraveling and a new order is taking shape, turning the tables on America, its allies and other big energy consumers. Major exporting nations have concluded that they have more leverage than ever before over consuming countries.

Two forces are behind this change. The accelerating industrialization of the billion-person economies of China and India means that global energy demand is likely to keep growing rapidly for years to come. And just as important, the world's top crude-producing countries are keeping a tighter grip on their spigots.

Saudi Arabia and other oil-rich states have balked at making the large investments Western policy makers think are necessary to meet demand in coming decades, although they plan to expand production somewhat in the medium term. Moreover, these nations are using more of their oil at home to meet surging domestic demand, driven in part by new industries that were once the preserve of the developed world.

"The idea is to use [the] advantage of the availability of energy and build industries on that basis," said Saudi Arabian oil minister Ali Naimi in a recent interview in Riyadh, as the sound of jackhammers pounded through the windows of his office overlooking the booming city. "Any industry that requires intensive energy will be welcome in Saudi Arabia."

In addition, petro-states from Iran to Ecuador are flexing their muscles, brandishing fossil-fuel supplies as a weapon in diplomatic disputes, or tearing up contracts with foreign companies.

Major importing nations are scrambling to adapt. Energy security has emerged as a central foreign-policy concern from Washington to Beijing. Last month, a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee held hearings on how to cope with nations that use oil as a weapon. Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, secretary-general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, said last month that the alliance would consider using force if energy-supply lines were threatened, a major broadening of the group's mandate. "As far as oil and gas is concerned, I think NATO could play a role to defend the sea lanes," he told European parliamentarians.

Major Western oil companies are also struggling to adjust. Ninety percent of the world's untapped conventional oil reserves are in the hands of governments or state-owned oil companies, far more than was the case several decades ago. It doesn't appear that the planet is running out of crude, as proponents of the "peak oil" theory have argued. But some oil experts foresee the big Western oil companies running out of easy-to-tap oil, and most of them are already turning to harder-to-recover reserves.

Royal Dutch Shell PLC and Exxon Mobil Corp. are making gargantuan bets on liquid fuels derived from natural gas. Shell and Total SA of France are extracting fuel from the gooey tar sands of Canada. ENI SpA, the Italian oil major, this month paid $900 million for the right to explore for oil off the shores of Angola. The search for new reserves has become "a nightmare," says Paolo Scaroni, ENI's chief executive officer.

Oil accounts for 98% of the fuel used by the world's cars, trucks and planes. With new crude supplies lagging behind demand growth, a new energy economy is emerging in which a mosaic of other fuels will supplement crude, some energy experts contend. "Bio-diesel," a specially processed vegetable oil that is often mixed with petroleum, and clean-burning liquids squeezed from natural gas are among the resources that will become essential for keeping the world humming, they argue.

"The transition away from oil may take 20 or 30 years, but it has to start now," says Joseph Stanislaw, an energy adviser at Deloitte & Touche USA LLP.

Crude has tripled in price since 2002 due to swelling demand, supply outages and slow growth in output. Oil hit a record of $75.17 a barrel in April, and yesterday settled at $68.56, down $1.80.

PUMPING UP

DOJ_NMG_0033832

A number of oil-rich states have flexed their muscle this year, amid rising prices.

Jan. 1 -- Russia's Gazprom cuts off gas supplies to Ukraine in a price dispute.

April 3 -- Venezuela seizes two oil fields from European oil companies Total SA and ENI SpA.

March 11 -- Iranian interior minister vows to use "any means" to counter threats of U.N. sanctions, citing Iran's proximity to the strategically important oil chokepoint of the Strait of Hormuz. "We have control over the biggest and most sensitive energy route in the world," he said.

May 1 -- Bolivian President Evo Morales orders nationalization of the country's gas fields.

May 15 -- Ecuador announces it will seize an oil field operated by Occidental Petroleum Corp. after a contract dispute.

June 4 -- Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei warns oil shipments will be "seriously jeopardized" if Tehran is punished in its nuclear standoff.

Source: WSJ research

Wealthy industrial nations have weathered oil crises before. A wave of shocks in the 1970s and 1980s, including oil-field nationalizations and the 1973 Arab oil embargo, sent prices soaring and tilted power toward exporting nations. But rich Western nations stayed in the driver's seat because they were the main consumers of exports. And the U.S. and Europe had vast and proven oil reserves in Alaska and the North Sea, which they exploited when developing-world suppliers refused to cooperate.

Three decades later, the Western world no longer has such leverage. Crude-oil production by nations who aren't members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is widely expected to peak around 2010. Outside of Russia and the Middle East, the biggest opportunities today are in deep waters off politically volatile Africa and in the Caspian Sea, not in the West.

The International Energy Agency, the industrialized world's energy-market watchdog, has forecast that world oil demand will rise 37% by 2030, to 115 million barrels a day from about 85 million today. But the oil-producing nations with the greatest pumping potential either will not or cannot tap their resources sufficiently to meet those projections.

The Paris-based IEA has long expected the Saudis, who now supply about nine million barrels a day, to contribute 18 million to 20 million barrels a day toward that figure. In an interview, however, Mr. Naimi suggested that the Saudis are unlikely to go much beyond 15 million barrels due to concerns about depleting reserves too fast and damaging fields by pumping too quickly. Other suppliers, including Mexico and Kuwait, also appear unwilling or unable to meet the expectations of Western planners.

OPEC members have expressed concern that demand projections such as the IEA's may be overstated. The IEA has concluded that because OPEC does not appear to be investing as much in production as expected, global oil supplies probably won't reach the agency's 115-million-barrel target for 2030. "We are likely to see higher prices for years to come," says Fatih Birol, the IEA's chief economist.

Demand patterns have also changed markedly. During the 1970s oil crisis, oil consumption was still concentrated in the industrialized West and in the Soviet Union, which produced more than enough for itself and its satellites. Today, the Saudis and their OPEC allies have many more big, attractive markets, starting with India and China.

Producing nations also face booming demand at home. Gasoline use in Iran, where the capital city is clogged with cars, is rising by 10% a year. Oil demand in the Middle East has risen by 13% since 2003, a growth rate nearly as high as China's. The Middle East was consuming 6.1 million barrels a day at the end of 2005, compared with 6.6 million barrels for China. This soaring demand equaled about one-third of the increase in global crude supplies, including from OPEC.

Saudi Arabia, which sits on a quarter of the world's oil reserves, also intends to consume more crude at home. The world's largest oil exporter is building new industries that rely on petroleum in an effort to leverage its primary resource, much as China did when it harnessed its vast labor supply to become a global manufacturing power. Mr. Naimi says one of his biggest goals is to create export-oriented fertilizer and aluminum industries.

At Turaif Camp in the Arabian Peninsula's northern desert, state-owned metals giant Ma'aden has dug an open-pit test mine for phosphates, an ingredient in fertilizer. Piles of the white mineral glitter in the sun, sprinkled with tiny fossilized sea creatures. Nearby, workers are digging another mine to excavate bauxite, the raw material of aluminum. These mines are part of a $10 billion project that will include a new coastal city with aluminum and fertilizer factories -- all powered by Saudi's huge reservoirs of heavy crude.

Other oil exporters are using their oil resources in more belligerent ways. Last month, Ecuador expelled Occidental Petroleum Corp. over a contract dispute. Bolivia's president nationalized his country's gas fields, dispatching troops to 53 fields and ordering foreign firms to renegotiate contracts. In April, Venezuela seized fields from Total and ENI.

The new supply-demand landscape has left the West increasingly vulnerable. The IEA estimates that the 26 industrial countries that are members of that organization will need to import 85% of their oil by 2030, compared to 63% today.

DOJ_NMG_0033833

This is forcing a rethink of U.S. and European diplomatic and military strategy. For half a century, the energy-security formula had been simple: Protect the oil-supply lines from the Middle East, and the industrialized world would be safe. President Carter codified that thinking in the Carter Doctrine of 1980, which declared Persian Gulf oil a vital national interest and vowed to use military might to defend the region from attack.

When Arab members of OPEC embargoed oil exports in 1973, the West responded by squirreling away strategic stocks of oil for dire emergencies. The oil embargo ultimately fizzled, and the U.S. re-established close ties with Saudi Arabia. After Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, the Saudis swiftly increased production to make up for almost all the oil lost in Iraq and Kuwait. They did the same before and during the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

But the Middle East is no longer the shock absorber it once was. Last fall, when hurricanes devastated U.S. oil facilities in the Gulf of Mexico, the Saudis already were pumping about as much as they could. The U.S. and its allies orchestrated a release of strategic stockpiles to stave off shortages.

Regions outside the Persian Gulf now are capable of supplementing Western supplies. But that means the West must build alliances and deploy ships and troops to protect modest supply routes as far afield as the Caspian Sea, the Andean region of South America and West Africa. Now every oil field matters.

The consequences were clear at a recent NATO conference on energy security in Prague. Addressing NATO officials and oil executives, U.S. Air Force Gen. Charles Wald, at the time the U.S. military's deputy commander for Europe and Africa, blasted the industry for what he saw as lax security around the world. He ticked off crucial pipelines and energy-transportation choke points in his theater. Such vulnerable points include the Oresund Strait between Sweden and Denmark and a pipeline running out of Chad, a small producer.

The energy-security model laid out by President Carter needs an update, said Gen. Wald, who has since stepped down from his post and is set to retire in July. "You just can't call 1-800-dial-the-military," he said. "The oil companies themselves have to start stepping up." During a break in the session, footage of burning oil facilities flashed across the conference hall's screen as the 1960s tune "Eve of Destruction" blared.

Officials in Iran and Venezuela have warned they could disrupt oil supplies if threatened by the U.S. In January, Russia briefly shut off natural-gas supplies to Ukraine, which many observers read as a political warning to independent-minded Kiev.

"The power of [energy] coercion is really equivalent to a military attack," says Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The Indiana Republican says his stance on energy security hardened in August after a diplomatic mission to North Africa. He spent a night in Libya at Tripoli's gleaming Corinthia Bab Africa Hotel, where he saw Chinese, Indian and Western oil-company executives vying for business in the country oil fields, which had been closed to U.S. oil companies for two decades before the U.S. lifted economic sanctions in 2004.

Mr. Lugar is now pushing for a treaty with China and India that would spell out ways for the three nations -- all large consumers of oil -- to cooperate rather than compete in the event of a supply shock. In today's energy world, he said, natural resources "are strategic weapons."

Western oil giants are racing to adjust. Ever since Edwin Drake started drilling for oil in Pennsylvania in 1859, launching the modern petroleum age, oilmen have dreamed up technologies to coax more crude from the ground. Goldman Sachs estimates the industry will spend $660 billion over the next six years on big projects. Just 13% of the oil expected from these efforts will come from "traditional" extraction, the firm said. The rest will involve more-complex technology or resources formerly deemed too costly to extract.

Shell, for instance, is spending heavily on projects that have more in common with mining operations than with the exploration efforts of the previous century. It recently paid $400 million for rights to explore for oil buried deep in Alberta. Companies have rushed to the region to mine its oil sands, a tar-like muck that requires expensive excavation and processing. Shell says it doesn't yet have commercially proven technology to get at the sands, but considers it a risk worth taking.

"I don't know how long exploration will continue to be a major play" for big oil companies, "but 50 years from now it will be that much more difficult than it is today," says Malcolm Brinded, Shell's head of exploration. "You want to get in there now to get access to the best acreage and drill the best wells. You don't want to hang back in a situation like this."

Oil surpassed coal as the dominant source of energy early in the 20th century, and was essential to the development of aviation and motorized transport. The world now appears to be in the first stage of a bumpy transition to a system in which oil, while still the economy's most important fuel, will no longer so thoroughly dominate it.

Henry Groppe, the 80-year-old founder of a Houston-based energy-consulting firm, has watched the industry morph for half a century. He divides oil history into three epochs. The first was a 100-year era of plenty and U.S. control that lasted until 1970, when prices averaged $13 a barrel in 2004 dollars. The second, an era of transition and rising OPEC influence, lasted until 2004 and saw prices average $36 a barrel over that period.

DOJ_NMG_0033834

The current era -- just two years old by Mr. Groppe's reckoning -- looks to be a messy one, with more potential for supply shocks and clashing over resources. Prices are likely to stay volatile as consumers try to outbid each other for constrained and vulnerable flows of crude. Rising prices tend to act as a rationing device, knocking some consumers out of the market altogether.

"We have entered the era of scarcity and price rationing," Mr. Groppe says.

Canada Conservative Gets Aggressive With Big Oil (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, June 14, 2006

OTTAWA, June 13 — Danny Williams may be a multimillionaire and a member of the Conservative Party of Canada, but these days he is being compared to a self-proclaimed revolutionary, the Venezuelan president, Hugo Chávez.

Not that Mr. Williams, the premier of Newfoundland and Labrador, minds.

Since walking out on talks with a group led by Exxon Mobil and the Canadian subsidiary of Chevron over the development of the Hebron oil field this spring, Mr. Williams has never been more popular, at least at home. And he has since bolstered that gain by threatening to propose a new law that would revoke the lease on the property that has been held by the oil consortium for more than two decades.

By taking on Big Oil, which has developed other offshore fields in his province, Mr. Williams is taking quite a gamble. Newfoundland has been Canada's poorest province for more than 50 years, and can hardly afford to lose out on any chance of a windfall from Hebron.

But the fight also illustrates that the era of high prices and concern over energy supplies for the United States has emboldened some caretakers of oil fields enough to demonstrate to major oil companies that there are limits to how much is up for grabs. Indeed, Mr. Williams, who built one of his province's largest personal fortunes through a cable television operation, a law practice and an offshore oil services company, portrays the battle as being fought for the American energy supply as well his province's financial fortunes.

But his current battle with some of the world's largest oil companies over a last major offshore reserve has led critics to label him a revolutionary — kind of a North American version of Mr. Chávez.

To the oil companies involved, even at a time of high energy prices and record oil company profits, Newfoundland's current demands make developing Hebron a financial nonstarter.

"We are prepared to move forward on Hebron on reasonable terms," said Mark MacLeod, the manager of external relations for Chevron Canada, which is based in Calgary, Alberta, and manages the project. "But there were a number of issues we were trying to agree on with the province up front. Perhaps, in retrospect, too many."

Hebron, off the coastline of Labrador, holds an estimated 731 million barrels of oil, roughly the equivalent of two years' production from the oil sands of Alberta. Though the second-largest of the province's four known offshore oil and gas fields, it is the last to be developed. And Hebron has special challenges. Its oil lies in cavities that can be reached only by using special — and costly — drilling methods. The field also contains heavy oil that, according to Mr. MacLeod, sells at a discount of about 20 percent to the lighter oils used for benchmark prices.

After letting the property sit explored but largely undeveloped for more than 25 years, the lease holders, which also include Petro-Canada and Norsk Hydro Canada Oil and Gas, were prompted by high oil prices to begin its development early in 2005. That, in turn, meant dealing with Mr. Williams and his province's relationship with its natural resources.

"In a sense, the oil companies find themselves in a larger scenario involving 500 years of politics in this province," said Christopher Dunn, a political scientist at Memorial University in St. John's, Newfoundland. "It has to be understood in the context of an attitude towards resources in this province that you don't get in other places. There's a feeling of patrimony."

Mr. Williams has walked away before, only to win in the end. He pulled away from talks six years ago with a communications company to acquire a cable operation. In the end, the company came back to the table and agreed to his price of 232 million Canadian dollars. Mr. Williams became widely known as Danny Millions.

Mr. Williams's list of demands for the Hebron consortium included the building of a refinery and the granting of a 10 percent equity stake in the project.

"This was not an attempt to grab more than we deserve," Mr. Williams said. "I have a business background, I understand risk and return."

During the talks, Mr. Williams eventually dropped the refinery and cut his equity demand to 4.9 percent, and he thought a deal was imminent. That is until the oil companies asked for tax credits that, by Mr. Williams's calculations, would have cost the province between 400 million and 500 million Canadian dollars.

From that point on, according to Mr. Williams, the negotiations became divisive, a situation he attributes to Exxon Mobil.

DOJ_NMG_0033835

Exxon Mobil rejects the idea that it played spoilsport, as does Mr. MacLeod of Chevron.

"The decision to suspend Hebron was a unanimous decision of all the parties," said Margot Bruce-O'Connell, a spokeswoman for Exxon Mobil Canada.

While several issues remained unresolved when the negotiations broke down early April, one stood out for the industry side.

"We could not come to terms on the equity issue," Mr. MacLeod said. "We felt we could better meet the province's desire to receive more by an enhanced royalty regime."

While both sides say they are still prepared to reopen negotiations, Chevron quickly began reducing its 60-person operation in Newfoundland. Four days after the talks ended, the senior engineering manager for Hebron was off to another of the company's offshore projects in Australia.

Mr. Williams is now threatening to introduce a law by the end of this year that will revoke the oil companies' lease unless they begin developing the field.

But he takes exception to comparisons in Canadian newspapers outside of Newfoundland of his plan and Mr. Chávez's decision to nationalize foreign controlled oil assets.

"It's not expropriation," Mr. Williams said. "It's use it or lose it."

The idea is not unknown. Alberta, the center of Canada's oil industry, introduced a series of laws in the mid-1970's that essentially give oil and gas leaseholders three years to develop properties or lose their rights.

But Mr. Williams cannot act alone. Unlike oil under the ground, which generally belongs to provinces in Canada, offshore oil is owned by the federal government. In turn, it turns over the management of offshore resources to provinces and shares the resulting royalties.

But Canada's new prime minister, Stephen Harper, another Conservative from Alberta, has indicated that he has no intention of joining Newfoundland's fight. That raises the question of how Mr. Williams can carry out his threat.

If Mr. Williams does succeed in taking back the leases, Mr. MacLeod of Chevron said that the consortium "would not look favorably on it."

While he declined to say what action the companies might take, he added that Mr. Williams would be unlikely to find anyone else interested in developing the property.

"I am not aware of other companies who are itching to get their hands on it," Mr. MacLeod said.

"It's a challenging resource to develop." Peter Fenwick, a fellow at the Atlantic Institute for Market Studies and the former leader of that province's left-leaning New Democratic Party, said that Mr. Williams's showdown could dampen investor interest in the province.

Professor Dunn says he expects that the oil industry will simply try to wait out Mr. Williams.

If so, they should not expect the premier to go quietly.

"I'm independently wealthy, so I'm not in the pay of any particular group or industry," Mr. Williams said. "I'm able to take tough stands. When you take a tough stand against an industry as powerful as oil, you expect a backlash."

Bush To Take No. 1 Elvis Fan On Tour Of Graceland (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, June 14, 2006

Looking for that special gift for Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's last official visit to the United States, President Bush decided to invite the self-described Elvis “maniac” on a guided tour through Graceland.

Koizumi will get to visit the home and final resting place of the King on June 30, a day after he and Bush discuss human rights and the U.S.-Japanese alliance, the Japanese Embassy said.

Thousands of Japanese tourists visit Graceland each year. But this will be the first visit by any sitting president or world leader, said Jack Soden, chief executive of Elvis Presley Enterprises, which manages the estate.

“It couldn't have escaped the prez that the prime minister is an Elvis fan,” Soden said.

Koizumi is to step down in September. He will leave as Japan's longest-serving prime minister and, perhaps, the only leader of Japan to wear his graying hair in an Elvis-like mane.

He and his brother, Masaya, have been members of the Elvis Presley fan club in Tokyo for more than 30 years, Soden said. Both Koizumi, 64, and Presley were born on Jan. 8. Presley, 42, died in 1977 but Koizumi has not forgotten him.

Last year, Koizumi crooned to Bush his favorite Elvis tune, I Want You, I Need You, I Love You at Bush's 59th birthday party at the G8 summit in Gleneagles, Scotland, hosted by Britain's Queen Elizabeth. During a 2003 meeting at Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas, the two men were talking for several hours by the pool when Koizumi started singing an Elvis song.

DOJ_NMG_0033836

In 2001, a Japanese record label produced a charity CD called Junichiro Koizumi Presents My Favorite Elvis Songs. The cover shows a digitally altered image of Koizumi standing by Elvis in Graceland.

Soden said the idea for a visit started with the White House. Aides there were trying to think of a unique Elvis-related gift for Koizumi. It occurred to them that “the best Elvis gift” would be a visit to Memphis. “Of course there is always a king at Graceland,” Soden said. “Elvis is in the garden.”

Somalia's Islamic Militias Reaching Out To The West (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, June 14, 2006

NAIROBI, June 13 -- The Islamic militias that took over the capital of Somalia last week are seeking to solidify their rule while reassuring Western leaders that they do not intend to impose an extremist, Taliban-style government on that battered East African country, diplomats, analysts and militia officials say.

In a coordinated effort including private conversations and public declarations, the Islamic Courts Union is portraying itself as a moderate force capable of stabilizing a blood-soaked land that has endured 15 years without a central government.

A letter sent by militia leaders to foreign governments said they want "a friendly relationship with the international community." The chairman of the militia group, Sharif Ahmed, has made conciliatory comments in interviews with several Western journalists and invited others to visit Mogadishu, long among the world's most dangerous cities but now transformed to peacefulness, militia officials say, by their rule.

"It is my pleasure to invite you to came to Mogadishu and see it yourself what we have achieved," Ahmed said in an e-mail to Western journalists based in Nairobi.

Abdurahman Osman, a Somali-born U.S. citizen representing Ahmed and the Islamic militias, said in an interview here: "They want to open up. They want the world to come to them."

This contrasts starkly with initial reports that the loosely organized militias are dominated by religious fundamentalists bent on delivering a purist vision of Islamic law, including the banning of certain films, the chopping off of robbers' hands and the public execution of murderers.

That image was enhanced by reports over the weekend that militia members in Mogadishu had shut down public viewings of World Cup television coverage, deeming the broadcasts decadent.

The Islamic Courts Union is a coalition with roots dating to the mid-1990s, when religious courts brought a semblance of order to Mogadishu, an impoverished seaside city of 1.2 million people, after the United States and the United Nations ended a troubled military intervention and nation-building experiment and abandoned Somalia to the rule of warlords.

Among the backers of the courts were Islamic extremists, including Hassan Dahir Aweys, who U.S. officials say was an associate of Osama bin Laden and who today is suspected of harboring fugitive members of al-Qaeda.

According to widely circulating reports, the CIA has backed secular Somali warlords in recent years, paying them hundreds of thousands of dollars to help track suspected terrorists. U.S. officials speaking publicly have neither confirmed nor denied this, but the reports have gained wide currency in Somalia and the region.

The triumph of the Islamic Courts Union over the secular warlords on June 5, following months of fighting that killed more than 300 Somalis, has been seen as a defeat for the United States.

The United States and other Western powers have been reassessing the militias, recognizing that the warlords are unlikely to regain power in Mogadishu. Many diplomats acknowledge the popularity of the Islamic Courts Union and say it is not clear whether moderates or extremists such as Aweys are in charge.

"That's one of the things we're trying to figure out," said a Western diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He certainly is laying low."

Others analysts said the militias have not settled on their leadership but, for now, are eager not to be seen as resembling the strict Taliban rule that allowed Afghanistan to become an operational base for bin Laden -- and, after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, a target of the U.S. military.

"They are trying to show their good face," said Mario Raffaelli, the Italian special envoy to Somalia. "It would be wrong to target all these people as extremists."

In testimony Tuesday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Henry A. Crumpton, the State Department coordinator for counterterrorism, said the administration had three objectives in Somalia: finding and eliminating what he called an "enduring, resilient" al-Qaeda cell; helping a U.N.-backed transitional government to "gain traction"; and providing humanitarian assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0033837

In statements since the Islamic takeover of Mogadishu, administration officials have made clear they are prepared to work with whatever groups can help achieve those objectives. "What we'd like to do is establish some kind of viable political actors" on the ground, one senior administration official said.

In that vein, the administration last week announced establishment of a "contact group" of interested outside parties to come up with a coordinated strategy. The U.S.-led group, which includes representatives from the United Nations and Europe, expects to meet Saturday in New York, the official said. "We want to be open-minded to a variety of options," he said.

While encouraged by the letter from the Islamic courts -- which it decided to answer with public statements rather than a private missive -- the administration believes that the courts' leadership is "clearly lying when they say they don't know where al-Qaeda is" in Somalia, Crumpton said. "Our interest is solely in the al-Qaeda fighters," he said. The administration believes there are "a half-dozen or less" senior al-Qaeda leaders currently or recently in Somalia, along with a fluctuating number of "operatives."

The transitional government, led by President Abdullahi Yusuf, was created with U.N. assistance in 2004 and was initially based in Nairobi. In February, it moved to the Somali town of Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu, but it still has little power, few resources and no ability to protect itself against the Islamic Courts Union.

As Western officials and the Islamic Courts Union have traded tentative communications in recent days, officials from the transitional government have pleaded for more international help.

Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi on Tuesday accused foreign governments of dawdling as the militias came to power in Mogadishu. "If we sit, wait and see, the situation for the people of Somalia will get worse," he said, addressing a meeting of regional leaders in Nairobi. "It will be a regional problem. It will be a global problem."

At the request of the transitional government, seven East African nations agreed to impose travel bans and banking restrictions on the Somali warlords in an effort to push them into peace talks.

But officials of the transitional government are seeking much more extensive help, including the partial lifting of the U.N. arms embargo so that the government can import arms for its own defense, an idea given tentative support Tuesday by Louis Michel, the European Union's commissioner for development and humanitarian affairs.

The transitional government also has debated seeking peacekeeping troops from the African Union, despite vehement opposition by the Islamic Courts Union to the presence of any foreign troops.

The transitional government and the Islamic militias have expressed interest in negotiating with each other as well. Analysts say that the government craves the real power that entry into Mogadishu would allow, and that the militias are seeking legitimacy and extension of their authority throughout the country.

The Islamic militias control much of the southern part of the country. But in the north, the regions of Puntland and Somaliland are beyond their reach. It is not clear, however, that the Islamic militias have the military might to move far beyond Mogadishu. And even there, their support is based more on their history of providing legal structures and social services than on firepower.

"You're actually seeing the beginnings of governance," said John Prendergast, a former Clinton administration official who is now an analyst for the International Crisis Group, speaking from Washington. But he added: "The Somali allegiance to any authority is as fickle as it gets. This is very tricky terrain."

US Trading Hostilities For Talk In Somalia? (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, June 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Having failed to defeat Islamist factions in Somalia through covert action - yet unwilling to see the lawless country on the Horn of Africa become a haven for Islamist extremists, including Al Qaeda - the US is preparing for a more diplomatic kind of intervention.

On Thursday, the US will initiate a "Somalia contact group" of interested countries and organizations to begin deliberating on how the international community can help stabilize what experts consider to be a "failed state."

For many Americans, Somalia is best remembered for the 1993 operation to capture a Somali warlord in Mogadishu that ended in the deaths of 18 US soldiers. That incident led to a hasty US pullout - and the 2001 movie "Black Hawk Down."

